GRAND LODGE OF GEORGIA.

The Grand Lodge of this State, held its annual communication, in Milledgeville, on Tuesday, November, 5, A. L. 5839. The annual report, before, us exhibits a very flattering view of the Masonic Institution in that state. From the returns made to the Grand Secretary, by the subordinate Lodges, we find that during the past year, the various lodges under the jurisdiction of the parent Lodge, have admitted within their communion two hundred and seventy-one members.

From the Report of the Committee on communications, we extract the following.

This Grand Lodge, your committee would most respectfully suggest, should feel under the deepest gratitude for the attentions and kindness of our brethren of the craft in other States; and it should, as your committee doubt not it will ever be, the pleasure of this Grand Lodge to return these obliging courtesies. The several communications, your committee are most happy to state, show the cause of Masonry to be onward; and they also afford the gratifying assurance, that the great cause of truth, morality and virtue, with an enlightened people, has but little to fear from a licentious, libellous, and unprincipled opposition.

Your committee beg leave to call the attention of this Grand Lodge to the written communication of the Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge of the State of New York at its last annual communication. The first is the propriety of recognizing as legitimate Free Masons, sojourning brethren, who have been made in Lodges practising the French and Scottish rites. The second is a recommendation, that in every Grand Lodge with which the Grand Lodge of New-York is in correspondence, some well known and respectable brother, of the rank of Past Master, be appointed as the representative of said Grand Lodge, at the discretion and under the warrant of the Grand Master. If these suggestions are deemed important in the Grand Lodge of New York, they are equally so to this Grand Lodge, and demand, your committee would most respectfully submit, its most serious consideration.

In relation to the first proposition, your committee would beg leave to remark, that if, in Lodges practising the rites of the French and Scottish Lodges, the great and fundamental principles of ancient freemasonry are fully preserved, your committee can see no objection, but, on the contrary, great propriety in adopting the suggestions of the Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge of New York. Next in beauty and importance to the great truths, and sublime morality taught and inculcated by our order, is the universality of their recognition and dominion; separated, upon no sectional and sectarian feelings from each other, Masons are every where the same. Its influence is every where felt; and its light, like the light of Heaven, shines upon every nation, and illumines the heart of its children in every clime. But, as your committee are wholly unadvised of the difficulties to be removed deem it, at present, unnecessary to take any further action upon the subject than to request the Grand Secretary of this Grand Lodge to open a correspondence with the Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge of New-York in order to obtain the necessary information to be laid before this Grand Lodge, to enable it to act advisedly upon the subject at its next annual communication.

In relation to the second suggestion above referred to, your committee would beg leave to recommend that the whole subject be referred to the M. W. Grand Master of this Grand Lodge, and that he be clothed with full power and authority to act in relation thereto in such a manner as he may think proper, and for the good of Masonry.

After an interesting and harmonious session of three days the Grand Lodge adjourned.

The following are the Grand Officers, chosen for the ensuing year.

M. W. Philip T. Schley, Grand Master.
R. W. Jonathan Olmstead, }
" E. Ezekiel, } D. G. Masters.

" F. V. Delaunay, G. Treasurer.
" Lucien La Taste, G. Secretary.
" Rev. Ignatius A. Few, G. Chaplain.
" A. H. Hansell, G. Marshal.
" Wm. S. Rockwell, G. S. Deacon,
" E. J. L. Easter, G. J. Deacon.

SPIRIT OF MASONRY.

Though Masonry inculcates all the moral duties and the worship of one God, yet it is not religion. It does not profess to change the heart and make at once a temple from ruin. But Masonry and religion are sisters. Their origin and object are the same. Both came from God; both tend to make men better; and both point to heaven as our final home. I do not say that Masonry alone will carry us there; but he who in heart and practice feels and follows the true principles of Masonry, does all that man can do, to climb the mystic ladder which spans from earth to heaven. A renewed and purified heart makes no man less a mason; for it is the glorious prize for which a true practical Mason strives. Christianity, therefore, is not at war with Masonry. On the contrary, she is the kind angel which takes the Mason where human efforts fail, and bears him on wings of love to that happy region, for which, without divine assistance, he was vainly struggling.

Neither a Mason's nor a Christian's duties are confined to the discipline of his own heart. They range abroad and mingle themselves with all the relations of society. I have wondered that Christians, who are commanded to judge the tree by its fruit, have often been found among the enemies and persecutors of Masonry. Does not this tree yield good fruit? It disarms the bitterest personal animosities, teaches forgiveness and forbids revenge. Is not this good fruit? Actuated by its pervading principles, at some mysterious sign or sound, arms have dropped from the hands of the most deadly national enemies on the field of battle, and those who were ready to pierce each other's bosoms, have embraced like brothers. Is not this good fruit? It fills the heart of the penniless stranger with gladness, wipes the widow's tear, and relieves the needy orphan. Is not this good fruit? Way, therefore, would some good men and Christians cut it down as a barren fig tree? But we are often told, that many Masons lead immoral lives. With sorrow and shame we acknowledge the justice of this charge. Too many forget the sublime principles they have been taught and the solemn obligations they have incurred. But their vices are not the fruit of Masonry; they are noxious weeds she has not succeeded in exterminating. They shoot up spontaneously in the human heart, and not a Mason's nor a Christian's power can destroy the latent seeds. Germinate they will, and all we can do is to nip the rank shoots, and thus prevent their luxuriance from overshadowing virtue's nobler plants. Judged by the standard of pure morality, what society, nay, what man, can stand the test? Would it not be disingenuous and unjust to condemn Christianity, because a single professor, or even a whole church deviate from its pure principles? If Christianity, which changes the heart, cannot extinguish vicious propensities and stop immoral practices, who can expect that Grand result from Masonry which merely professes to discipline the heart? He who would suppress Masonry or Christianity, because vice sometimes rears his hated front within their sacred pale, would extinguish the sun, the source of light and heat, and plunge the world in darkness and death, because noxious vapors sometimes float on his beams. Judge no institution by the practices of its worst members. If its principles be good, instead of obscuring its beneficent beams in eternal night, let us drain those stagnant pools of vice, whence its influence extracts poison and pestilence. Let it shine upon the uncontaminated surface of our hearts, whence will spring up, in beautiful luxuriance, the plants of Faith, Hope and Charity, yielding immortal fruit.—Anonymous.

MASONIC LANGUAGE.

We are told by our adversaries, that we have no mysteries worth inviolable confidence. On this point we shall not dispute with them; and if they believed what they alleged, they would manifest less distemperature of mind, and let us alone. And again, they pronounce our mystic chain of communication, by which strangers become instantly friends, a deception, delusive and useless. If they believed themselves in this too, that they might smile at our weakness; but would never feel that malignant spirit of envy and hatred, that should lead them to threaten an ancient and respectable Society with violence, plunder and extermination. Neither shall we dispute with them on this point; the truth would have little impression upon such cavillists and revilers. But to those to whom I address myself, I will explain the use of this mystic dialect.

The symbolic language, which Freemasonry alone possesses, is a medium of communication, by which a Christian brother—no matter what his mother tongue may have been—gains at once an access to the bosom of the Turk, the Arab, or the Chinese, and reposes there in safety. It is not merely a vehicle, to make known the wants of humanity, to a stranger of an unknown speech; for that language nature herself has bestowed upon all her children, of whatever country or tongue: but it is a language, which informs the stranger, that you have been received into the mysterious order to which he belongs—that you have been tried and accepted as a worthy and deserving brother, to whom, as such, he is thrily bound. And I cannot forbear admonishing every generous and worthy man, who would hear and decide in the spirit of candor and of truth, that this universal tie is not an empty, unmeaning, spiritless obligation; as a free and accepted Mason, having been found worthy to be entrusted with the higher and more essential keys of the Order, I have a claim in every Lodge throughout the globe, to a portion of that charity fund which every Lodge holds in sacred trust, for distressed worthy brethren of all countries: and I should no more be denied my share of it, in the hour of want, on the banks of the Euphrates, the Tigris, the Indus, the Nile, or the Hoang-ho, than I should in the house of my father or my brother. If this be "delusion," then, indeed, is Christian benevolence and brotherly love, "delusion." But call it what you will, it is a theory, in the beauty and practice of which I hope to live and die.

It is no cause of marvel, that the narrow and miserly soul does not understand the advantages of this beautiful and noble Institution; for such have not the heart to enjoy the luxury of doing good. But the intelligent and benevolent mind will comprehend and duly appreciate the benefit of such an universal brotherhood, when I inform him, that the Fraternity in Ohio, have, more than once, furnished the means of restoring the unfortunate soldier, mariner, and adventurer, in Southern America, to the bosom of his wife and children on the continent of Europe.

On the utility of this universal medium of communication, the authors of the Cyclopædias, which I have consulted, speak thus:—"It is certain that its signs serve as a universal language, so that by means of them, people of the most distant nations may become acquainted, and enter into friendships with one another. This must be allowed to be a circumstance of no small importance and utility, to those who travel distant regions, and wish to find associates and friends even among strangers."

SKETCH OF CHARACTER

ETHAN ALLEN IN ENGLAND.

Col. Ethan Allen was a man destined to strike the world as something uncommon, and in a high degree interesting. He was partially educated and obscurely brought up; yet no man was ever more at ease in the polished ranks than he. Not that he at all conformed to their artificial rules and etiquette; but he had observed the dictates of natural good humor. His bearing was total defiance of fashion, and he looked and acted as if he thought it would be a condescension thus to trammel himself. It is well known that in early life, in his own country he acquired an influence over his fellow-men, and led them on to some of the most daring achievements. He seemed to possess all the elements of a hero—a devoted patriotism, a resolute and daring mind, and an excellent judgment.

His conduct as a partisan officer is well known in this country, and was of great service to the cause of liberty in our revolutionary struggle. He was taken prisoner and carried to England, where his excellent sense, his shrewdness and wit, introduced him in the court region. A friend of our earlier life, who was acquainted with this part of the history of this singular man, used to take great delight in telling us some anecdotes of the Colonel, while a prisoner in London. We have before mentioned the firmness with which he resisted the attempts to bribe him from the cause of his country, and the caustic satire with which he replied to a nobleman, who was commissioned by the ministry to make him formal offers to join the British cause in America.

The incident is a striking one, and it will bear a repetition.

The commissioners, among the tempting largesses, proposed that if he would espouse the king's cause he might have a fee simple in half the state of Vermont.

"I am a plain man," said Col. Allen in reply, "and I have read but few books, but I have seen in print somewhere, a circumstance that forcibly reminds me of the proposal of your lordship; it is of a certain other character going to an exceeding high mountain, and showed him all the kingdoms of the earth and the glory thereof and told him that if he would fall down and worship him, this would all be his: and the rascal" added he, "didn't own a foot of them."

His interview with the King at Windsor, is mentioned as highly interesting. His Majesty asked the stout hearted mountaineer if they had any newspapers in America.

"But very few, and those are but little read," was the answer.

"How then," asked the king "do the common people know of these grievances of which they complain, and of which we have been speaking?"

"As to that," said he; "I can tell your Majesty that among a people who have felt the spirit of liberty, the news of oppression is carried by the birds of the air, and the breezes of heaven."

"That is too figurative an answer from a matter-of-fact man, to a plain question," rejoined the king.

"Well, to be plain," answered the rebellious subject "among our people the tale of wrong is carried from man to man, and from neighborhood to neighborhood, with the speed of electricity; my countrymen feel nothing else; 'out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh.' I will add, with great respect to your Majesty, that such a people cannot be put down with the sword."

The King made a long pause, as if impressed with the truth of his remark. At length changing the subject, he asked Col. Allen if he knew Dr. Franklin; and being answered in the affirmative, inquired concerning his experiments with electricity, and expressed a curiosity to experience an electric shock. The British Sovereign seemed to take pleasure in the conversation, which was kept up for an hour, and at length made Col. Allen promise to visit him with his cousin, Dr. Franklin, at his palace in London. Some weeks after that he was reminded of his promise by the nobleman above-mentioned, and an hour fixed for the home-made philosopher of America to explain the mysteries of a new discovery in the royal family. They attended accordingly, and with an apparatus chiefly of his own invention, Franklin exhibited many of those simple and amusing experiments, for which he was so noted, and at which the royal children, even of a larger growth, were much delighted.

In this playful way, Dr. Franklin took occasion to convey instructions as to the properties of this astonishing fluid. While the royal habitation was thus in a most unkingly uproar, the Premier was announced as in waiting. The King seemed for a moment disturbed. "I forgot my appointment with the minister," said he, "but no matter, I will eschew business for once, and let North see how we are employed." Accordingly the minister was ushered in with ceremony, and it was concluded that he should have a shock. Allen whispered to the Dr. to remember how he had shocked us across the waters, and to give him a double charge; whether it was designed on the hint of his friend or not, was not ascertained, but the charge was so powerful on the nerves of his lordship as to make him give way in the knees, at which all, especially the princesses, were almost convulsed with mirth.

Some of Col. Allen's happy retorts at the clubs and fashionable parties are still remembered, and often repeated. On one occasion he was challenged to a glass of wine by the beautiful Dutchess of Rutland, who seemed to have been particularly pleased with his independent manner.

"You must qualify your glass with a toast," observed the lady.

The 'Varmounter' very unaffectedly observed that he was not used to that ceremony, and was afraid he might give offence. If, however, the lady would be so good as to suggest a subject, he would endeavor to give a sentiment.

"Oh," said she, "never mind the subject—any thing will do, so that it has no treason in it."

"Well," says he, "this may do for a truth if not for a toast," and fixing his eyes adoringly on the famed court beauty, he proceeded—

"If anything could make a double traitor out of a good patriot, it would be the witchcraft of such eyes as your ladyship's."

The blunt sincerity with which this was spoken, together with its exact fitness to the occasion and the person, caused it to be long hailed in the 'beau monde' as an excellent good thing, and although it had the effect of heightening for a moment that beauty to which it was offered as a tribute, it is said the fair Dutches often afterward boasted of the compliment as far before all the empty homage she had received from the glittering coxcombs of the city.

A lady once sneeringly asked Col. Allen, in a large assembly, at what time fashionable ladies in America preferred taking the air. He perceived her drift, and bluntly answered—

"Whenever it is necessary to feed the geese and turkeys."

"What," inquired the lady, "do the fine women in your country descend to such menial employments?"

Allen was always aroused at any attempt to depreciate the fair ones of his own country, and with a great deal of warmth replied—

'American ladies have the art of turning even amusements to account. Many of them can take up the subject of your Grace's family history, and tell you of the feats of valor and bursts of eloquence to which your ladyship is probably indebted for your distinguished name, and most of which it is likely would be as new to you as the art of raising poultry.'

The sarcasm produced a deep blush upon the face of the fair scoffler; but it produced for the captive and his countrymen an indemnity against court ridicule for the future.

MISCELLANY.

From the Knickerbocker for September.

A SECOND REMINISCENCE OF THE LATE WAR.

"The King of France, with forty thousand men, Marched up the hill, and then—marched down again!"

'There appered to be some fatality attending almost all our attacks upon America, during the last war.'—MAYNATT.

About the middle of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, the inhabitants of a little village not far from the mouth of the Genesee river were thrown into a tumult of alarm, by the appearance of the British fleet under Sir J. L. Yeo, off their shores. In the general consternation and confusion, various expedients were proposed, rejected, suggested again, for ridding themselves of their unwelcome visitor. Some were in favor of an immediate fortification of their dwellings; others thought it more easy to keep them off shore, and prevent their landing, than to defend their families after they had landed. The proposition was at last suggested, by a timid citizen, 'to retire,' and save what they could in a hurried flight. But stoutly and manfully the good people rejected this shameful proposition, and put their heads together to concoct a plan more agreeable to their sturdy patriotism.

During this time of doubt and uncertainty, it was a moving spectacle to see the 'tremblings of distress' which many of the good people exhibited, as the ships of the fleet slowly neared the shore. Mothers shrieked and clasped their infants to their bosoms in fearful anxiety; the little girls cried, while the larger ones looked to their sweet-hearts for protection in the hour of peril. These latter again bluntly declared that they would not run, but would 'stick by and see fair play. Let the red coats come on; we'll meet 'em!' One young gallant, exasperated at seeing the affliction of his lady-love, swore that the British were 'a set of rascal-heathenish ragamuffins, good for nothing under God's heavens but to scare women and children!' The more sagacious saw in this move the destruction of their stores, and feared for the result.

Determining at last not to yield without a show of fight, the militia were assembled, men and boys, in all three hundred strong, and occupied an elevated position near the lake, whence they could see all the manœuvres of the fleet. Presently a boat was seen to put off from the commodore's ship. Now let the valiant soldiers nerve themselves for the contest! But stop! It is a flag of truce! Now our friends are in a worse dilemma than before, being entirely guiltless of any knowledge of military or naval etiquette, or indeed of military in general, save the regular militia drill. What a predicament! Nobody seemed to know what to do, but every body was of opinion that something must be done. After some deliberation, hastened undoubtedly by the rapid approach of the boat, Lieutenant B—— was delegated to lead a file of men down to the water's edge, and 'find out what was wanted.'

As this lieutenant is a conspicuous character in this reminiscence, it may not be amiss to give the reader a description of his person, in the words of a backwoodsman: 'He was a great favorite among the girls in the village, and had enjoyed a great name in the military line, having commanded a company in New-Hampshire, before he emigrated to the West. A shrewd yet reckless disposition marked all his actions. A man couldn't get round him, no more than he could choke a lion, and yet he was as free, open-hearted a chap as ever kissed a pretty girl afore she knew it.—I've seen him manœuvring the sogers too, when Capt. Shute used to be to the widow's a-Saturday evening, and couldn't attend to the military exercises.' In short, the gallant lieutenant was a universal favorite, particularly among the ladies, who regarded him as their especial guardian and champion, in these troublesome times.

Putting himself at the head of his men, the worthy lieutenant marched rapidly down the hill, and forming a line near the water's edge, awaited the next movement in stern silence. Indeed, he afterward said 'that he wasn't so very sure but the fellows in the boat wanted to play 'em a trick, and if ever there was a time when he felt a great responsibility on him, it was then.' He did not wait long, before he was hailed by the British messenger: 'Is that the way you receive a flag of truce? It is generally the custom to meet without arms, on such occasions.'

'Wal!' said the lieutenant, still maintaining his soldier-like position, without turning his head, 'I didn't know but you might cut up some devilry or other with our people: howsumdever, as you seem to be a pretty peaceable, well-disposed, well-behaved sort of a fellow, my men may right about face a little way.' So turning on his heel, a la militaire, he ordered his men to retire a few rods, and hold themselves in readiness for farther action. By this time, the boat was close in shore, and the messenger, an officer, as appeared from his uniform, was about stepping ashore, when the Yankee interrupted him:

'I say, hello, mister! you don't come on this ground till I know what you're after! So, jest stay in the boat, and say your say out!'

The Englishman, perceiving that it would be useless to oppose this appeal, resumed his position in the boat, and declared his mission, which was, to demand a surrender of the stores that were concealed there, or thereabout, on penalty of instant destruction in case of a refusal. Our officer replied:

'I don't know about that 'ere last part of the business; but I will consult my superiors, and get their opinion on the subject.'

Turning to his men, he ordered them to wait, and not 'let that chap come ashore till he came back; when,' added he, addressing the officer, 'I'll report progress, and let you know how we conclude to act.' So saying, he marched up the hill, and disappeared among the crowd. After some minutes' conversation with the older inhabitants, and a few young leaders in the little army, he resumed his march down the hill, and placing himself in front of his men, who had awaited his return, agreeably to orders, he delivered himself of the following reply to the demand of the British:

'I am ordered by the General to tell you that we shall keep the stores, until the king shall send a force sufficient to take them away. So, if you want 'em badly, you must get 'em the best way you can.'

Somewhat astonished at the reception he had met with, and seeing nothing very inviting in the countenance of the sturdy Yankee, the servant of the king gave the word to his men, and quickly returned to his ship.

While these occurrences were taking place, the crowd on the hill were suddenly dispersed, and the militia, in regular order, filed off, on the left into the brushwood, and marching round to the right appeared again on the hill, in sight of the fleet, but in a different order, so as to present the appearance of a new company just arrived from another quarter. These again in turn filed off, and immediately another body of men came in directly in front, filed off, and disappeared like the former. These manœuvres were repeated again and again; and the motley uniforms of the citizens, with a great noise of drum and fife, contributed not a little to the deception.

After they had continued a considerable time, the lieutenant remarked, probably somewhat fatigued with his arduous duties, that 'the Britishers didn't seem in any hurry about them stores, and he reckoned that they would take time to consider the matter some, afore they tried it!' And so it proved; for the British commander deliberated a long time before making any apparent movement; and after firing a few guns, with no other effect than to waken the echoes of the dense forests which skirted the lake, and elicit a few screams from the females, he sailed leisurely away; to the no small gratification of the Americans, who feared for the success of their ruse. But the final disappearance of the fleet, in the course of the afternoon, quieted entirely the doubts of the most timorous; and they returned to their dwellings sincerely thanking that Providence, or 'fatality,' as the worthy captain has it, which had protected them from the destruction that had threatened them.

The evening was spent in joyous festivity, and the agents of this great 'fatality' were by no means forgotten in the general joy. Lieutenant B—— was the hero of the day, and nobly he bore his honors; gallantly reaping the reward of his labors in the smiles of the ladies whom he had protected. It is even asserted that he was seen to steal various kisses from the lips of these pretty charmers, in the course of the evening.

YANKEEISM.

A young Yankee farmer happened, some six months back, to see a paragraph in one of the New York papers, relative to the arrival and sale of a lot of foreign Canary birds—and immediately began to calculate if he could not make a good spec in the same business. He came to the conclusion that he could undersell the foreign article, and make money by it. He, therefore, procured some dozens of canary birds, set them to breeding, and as soon as their young ones were fit for market, he made a multitude of very handsome small cages, put a bird into each, and packed the whole on a small and most curiously constructed wagon, which was also the work of his own hands, and drove off to New York, whence he arrived in due time, and asked $4 for each cage and bird. From some persons he got what he asked, from others something less; but in no case less than $3 for each bird and cage, and having about three hundred birds, he must have received about $1100, which after deducting the liberal allowance of $100 for expenses and loss of time left him say clear $1000 profit.—Journal of Commerce.

ROMANCE READING.

Perhaps the perusal of romances may, without injustice, be compared with the use of opiates, baneful when habitually and constantly resorted to, but of most blessed power in those moments when the whole head is sore and the whole heart sick. If those who rail indiscriminately at this species of composition were to consider the quantity of actual pleasure which it produces, and the much greater proportion of real sorrow and distress which it alleviates, their philanthropy ought to moderate their critical pride or religious intolerance. [Scott.]

CORRECTION OF TIME.

It may not, perhaps, be generally known, that those who were born before the 20th of February, 1800, should, after that day, reckon their birth days a day later than before. Those who were living before the alteration of the style, in 1751, may recollect that after that alteration, their birth days were reckoned 11 days later. A further alteration of one day took place in 1800, which would, in the usual course, have been a leap year, but had only 365 days. If we suppose a child to have been born on the 31st Dec. 1800, he had lived 4 years, of 365 days each; but as every 4th year should have 366 days, the child was not 4 years old till the 1st of Jan. 1801; and a man born 1st Jan. 1751, was 10 years old on the 12th of Jan. 1761, and was 50 on the 13th Jan. 1801. TEMPER.

The great Duke of Marlborough was as remarkable for good temper as for good conduct and bravery. Being one day overtaken with a shower, as he was riding, he called to his servant for his great coat, which the man not immediately bringing, nor giving any answer, he repeated his order; upon which the fellow muttered, "I suppose you'll stay till I have unbuckled it?" The Duke instead of being angry, said coolly to a gentleman who was with him, "Now, I would not be of that fellow's temper for all the world."

A person meeting a coal merchant, inquired what a chaldron of coals would come to? The coal-merchant began to consider, and knowing that the question was put to him from idle curiosity, deliberately answered—"Sir if they're well burnt, they'll come to ashes."

POPULAR TALES.

THE TOLL GATHERER'S DAUGHTER.

Foaming through the chasms of immense rocks, that seem to have been riven assunder by some giant stroke, the Hudson forms the cataract well known as Glen's Falls, and makes its way over and through the rocks, with a force, which shakes the slender bridge that is thrown across the stream below. At the extremity of this bridge stands, or rather 20 years since, the humble residence of the toll-gatherer. The neatness of the house gave a calm to its lowliness; it was built on a rock, and half hid by a cluster of weeping willows that grew round it; and the traveller, stunned by the noise of the struggling water, that dazzled his sight as it foamed and sparkled in the sun, turned with pleasure to contemplate this simple quiet scene, which seemed the chosen abode of peace and of innocence. Butler, (the name of the owner) had seen better days; he had begun life with bright prospects, but the loss of a leg, and many a woe, beside had brought him, in the decline of life, to the lowly occupation of a toll-gatherer. Yet this lot was not without alleviations; a cheerful and affectionate wife, a lovely and idolized daughter, and a sincere friend and excellent adviser in the Dominie, as the minister of the parish was familiarly termed.

The Dominie was exactly suited to his situation; his talents were not of the first order, nor was his knowledge extensive; but he possessed plain good sense, sound judgement, and that kindness of disposition which loves all, and is in turn beloved by all. His piety was simple, but very fervent; perhaps it was this sincerity that rendered his sermons impressive, for he certainly was not eloquent. His language was not classical, nor his style regular, yet the men's hearts melted and trembled before him. He was never married; indeed his slender salary, although increased by teaching a school, would not allow him the comforts of a home; he therefore resided alternately with the different members of his congregation; and the house was thought blessed while it contained the Pastor. Thus he became intimate with every one of his small flock. He joined with cheerfulness in their moral sports, and shared their sufferings with the same sincerity. Butler was distinguished by the minister's particular favor, and his daughter looked up to the Dominie as to a second father.

The good man had bestowed upon his favorite, all his sum of learning. She was now sixteen, and being pronounced as wise as her instructor, she had quitted the school to aid her mother in domestic duties. As the father was now infirm, and the dame a busy house wife, the task of gathering the toll generally devolved on Letty, for that was her unsentimental name. There was another reason that rendered her appropriate for this duty: In addition to reading and writing, she had acquired a considerable knowledge of arithmetic, which made her tolerably expert in changing dollars to shillings. A knowledge of the Bible, the child's Instructor, and the History of England comprehended all Letty's literary attainments, but they were sufficient to ingraft on her heart a grateful love of God, a strong sense of virtue, and bounding her hopes and wishes to the narrow scene her lot seemed cast in, to give her cheerfulness and contentment.

It was a sultry summer evening: Letty had carried her spinning-wheel to the side of the house, where seated under a large tree, she busily spun, while she listened to the deep roaring of the fall as its slight spray fell around her. She was roused from her employment by the sound of wheels, and looking up, beheld a Gig, dashing violently down the steep hill that led to the bridge, and, in spite of the prohibition, passing over the entrance, it came full speed on the trembling boards. She perceived the driver had lost all command over his horse, who, frightened by the noise of the falling waters, with nostrils extended, seemed to spurn control, and drawing himself up, prepared to jump the bridge—when Letty, running forward, opened the gate. The furious animal rushed through, and before she could retreat, a violent blow from the wheel felled her to the ground. A stranger passing, stopped the horse, while the gentleman, whose life Letty had preserved, jumped from the gig and carried her to the house. She had received a severe blow on the temple, and the effusion of blood was with difficulty stunched: the stranger waited till she recovered, then leaving a well filled purse on the table, he bade them adieu.

A week had elapsed since this accident, when the stranger returned. Letty was sitting up, supported by pillows; illness shed over her countenance a languor, which, though it took from its bloom, gave it an air of refinement, and added to its interest. Even the black handkerchief that bound her wounded brow, set off that snowy complexion, while the drooping eyelid displayed its long dark lashes, that gave a rich expression to a pair of eyes of heaven's own blue. Letty thanked the gentleman in her soft and artless language, for the attention, he had shown her; and expressed her regret at occasioning so much trouble, in such a simple, yet graceful manner, as astonished her visitor.

Mr. Thornley, as he announced himself, became a frequent guest at the cottage, and often condescended to share their humble repast. Indeed, he seemed to forget, in listening to the conversation of an untaught girl, that he had mixed with the learned, the witty and the fashionable. He brought her books, and while he instructed her mind, he won her affection. At length he returned to his party at Lake George; although unconscious of the motive, in every excursion, his steps were directed to Glen cottage, and his spoils, game, fish, or even a wreath of wild flowers, were used as a pretext for the visit. But much as he revered the old man, and admired his daughter, Mr. Thornley never mentioned their names to his gay companions, or led them near the retreat of Butler, who delighted to talk of him to his friend the Dominie; this old man who, as I hinted before, did not possess much worldly wisdom, expressed his impatience to see their new friend, nor did he read in Letty's down-cast eye and burning cheeks, the secret of her bosom.

Meantime, some business called Thornley home, and detained him for some weeks; this convinced him how dear the simple rustic had become to him; he sighed, and wished she was well born—how gladly would he marry her; and his heart swelled with rapture at the idea of passing his life with her; but it chilled to think she was a toll-gatherer's daughter. He determined to forget her, but the next moment he thought of her, so lovely and gentle, he set off for Glen's Falls. His heart beat when he marked the flash of joy that lit up Letty's beautiful eye when she saw him.

Thornley talked of love; although Letty was silent, her blushes plainly told what her lips dare not utter. One day as they were strolling through the woods that lined the banks of the stream, Letty interrupted her lover in the midst of an ardent declaration, by looking up with a blushing cheek, as she innocently said, 'but I am too young to marry.' 'Marry,' said Thornley, with the air of a man just awakened from a dream—'oh! we will not think of that dear Letty;' and throwing his arms around her, continued, 'we can love without marriage;' Letty withdrew from his embrace, and in an earnest tone, 'then, although you love me dearer than life, you do not think of marriage?'

Thornley was disconcerted, but replied, 'my family, dearest girl, is rich and honorable, and —' 'and I am the daughter of a beggar'—said Letty. 'I see it all, vain weak girl that I was: but you, sir, though a great and rich man, should have been a merciful one. Better,' said the poor girl, unable to repress her tears, 'better have left me to die in the road, than to break my heart.' As, choked with sobs, she uttered these words, she hastened from her astonished lover. He followed her, imploring her pardon. Letty stopped, and with an effort that sent the blood to the heart, bade him depart for ever, and not forget that her father, though old and infirm, could protect his child from insult.

There is a dignity of virtue, that even in the simple words of Letty, awed her dissolute admirer. A woman of polished education, might have expressed her sentiments in finer and more touching language; but she could not have shown greater firmness and dignity of mind, than did the humble rustic.

Letty walked, or rather ran home, and throwing herself on her bed, literally lifted up her voice, and wept bitterly. Violent agitation, working on a mind excited to great emotions, produced a fever, which jeopardized her life for some days. Her parents, and her friend, the minister watched by her bedside in sorrow.

Her life was granted to their fervent prayers. Letty recovered, but she was no longer the cheerful being who had gladdened the hearts of her friends. The minister related her history to a lady in the neighborhood, who, interested by her story, sent frequently for Letty, and becoming acquainted with her, prevailed upon her parents to consent to her residing with her entirely, while she bestowed upon the old man a comfortable house, and a small but well stocked farm. Mrs. W. had retired from a world she had seen too much of, and knew too well to love. But she had brought to her retirement, a mind well cultivated, and a fund of useful knowledge. She took delight in opening to her protegee these copious stories; and while she imparted substantial knowledge, she also gave her a refinement of taste and manner, of which from her education she was necessarily destitute. Two years glided on; but in the midst of her benevolent plans, Mrs. W. died, and Letty returned to her parents—wiser but not happier. She had gained refinement and cultivation, but she had not that willingness to be happy, if may so express it, that marked her earlier days. The simple pleasures that would have caused her heart to beat with rapture, were now dull and vapid: and she was shocked to perceive, that the recollection of the luxuries she enjoyed in Mrs. W.'s mansion, rendered her, at least, discontented with the humble habits of her father's cottage. At this period, a neighboring farmer, young and wealthy, offered his hand to Letty. Her parents urged her to accept him, and at length, wearied by their importunities, she consented to give her hand, but protested that she could not bestow her heart. A week before the intended marriage was to take place, as one evening, the family were enjoying at the porch of the house, the cool breezes of twilight; an exclamation of alarm from Letty, caused her father to look up from his bible, when he recognized the features of Thornley—'Come not here, young man,' said he indignantly. 'depart, while you may do so in peace.' 'One word,' said Thornley, and passing the old man, he threw himself at Letty's feet, and implored her forgiveness: 'I have been a wretched wanderer,' said he, 'but with Letty's pardon and your's Sir,' turning to Butler, 'I shall find happiness and rest.' It is not necessary to state that the long loved Thornley did not plead in vain. The farmer was dismissed, and in a week the lovers were united by the venerable pastor. Though moving in the most polished circles, and fashionable society, Thornley never had to blush for the Toll Gatherer's Daughter.

[The following story from Ackerman's Forget-me-not, we published nearly 20 years ago. Like good wine, its flavor improves with age.—Ed.]

THE PINCH OF SNUFF.

It is now many years, since a widow of about twenty, who had some business at Brussels, stopped a short time at a hotel in that city; she dined at the table d'hôte, and generally spent a part of the evening in the public room. This youthful widow, whose name was Doival, was precisely that sort of a woman whom the men all adore, and the women abuse; the former declared she was the loveliest, the most bewitching of creatures, the latter vowed she had not the smallest claim to beauty. Whatever were her claims, however, one thing is certain, the cold hearts found her irresistible. Her slight but finely rounded form, thought too petite for dignity, was a model of grace; her features could not boast the cold regularity, which in the critic's eye, constitutes beauty; but the brilliance of her complexion, the varied expression of her speaking eyes, and the bewitching archness of her smile, rendered her a dangerous object to a man of sensibility. She had been only a few days at the hotel, when an English gentleman chanced to dine at the public table; he was struck at the first glance with her charms, and being well acquainted with foreign manners, he thought he might address himself rather freely to a lady, whom he found at a table d'hôte; he complimented her; she replied with spirit, but with becoming reserve. The Englishman, whom we shall call Milborne, became every moment more fascinated; puzzled, however, by the apparent inconsistency of her situation and manners, he asked if she would accompany him to the theatre; she refused in a tone which plainly showed she considered the proposal as an insult. 'Very well,' cried Milborne, pulling out an elegant snuff box, 'then you shall take a pinch of snuff.' 'I never take snuff sir,' cried the widow, turning up her pretty little nose with an air of ineffable disdain. 'So much the worse madam; you lose one of the greatest pleasures in life. I have tried all sorts of enjoyments; one thing fatigued, another disgusted me; this pleasure brought repentance, and that satiety. At last I determined to look out for something of which I could not tire. It suddenly struck me, that to my fits of vexation and ennui, I had found occasional relief from a pinch of snuff; so I became a snuff taker five years ago, and from that time to the present I have no ennui. Come madam, let me advise you to try my remedy for this distemper, with which we are all visited more or less.'

'I have no occasion for it,' replied the lady coldly, 'I am not troubled with ennui; and if I were, I think there are more rational means of dispelling it.'

'Name them madam if you please. Reading, reflection, the offices of benevolence the pleasures of society.'

'Ah madam, I have tried all that; reading set me to sleep; reflection made my head ache; benevolence I own is pretty well, but one cannot occupy one's self in that way from morning till night; as to the pleasures of society, I have been cheated by one half of my acquaintance, and laughed at by the other; I am therefore not favorably disposed towards mankind. So you see madam, I have nothing left for it but to amuse myself in this way;' and opening his snuff box, to take a pinch and presented it to her.

Thoroughly provoked at what she considered unpardonable rudeness, she arose to leave the room. 'Nay madam,' cried Milborne, starting up, 'you must not go in anger.' 'I am not angry sir,' cried the lady, then trying to disengage her hand, which he had taken hold of. 'You forgive me then?' 'Yes replied she, but not in the most placid tone in the world. 'Very well then—to prove that you don't bear malice, take a pinch of snuff.'

At these words, the widow's patience and temper both forsook her; she burst into tears. Some of the gentlemen present advanced, and one of them, Comte de S. asked Milborne in a haughty tone, what he meant by insulting the lady. The Englishman immediately took fire; he replied in a tone of defiance which frightened Madame Dorval. She endeavored to stifle the dispute, by protesting she was not offended; but the gentlemen were both too hot headed to be easily pacified; they dissembled their resentment till the widow had left the room; but as soon as she did, the dispute was renewed. In a few minutes it rose to such a height, that a meeting was arranged for the following morning; and thus for no greater cause than a lady's refusal to take a pinch of snuff, two men who were not destitute either of common sense or principle, so far in their anger forgot both, as to be guilty of the folly and impiety of risking their own and seeking each other's life.

Both perhaps repented when the challenge was given and accepted; but it was then according to the notions of false honor so prevalent among mankind, too late. They retired to their respective apartments. Milborne wrote two or three letters, and began to pace his room deeply engaged in ruminating on the probable event of the approaching meeting.

Suddenly he fancied he smelt fire—he threw open the door of his chamber and beheld the stair case enveloped in smoke. His first thoughts were for others, he ran to the different apartments vociferating fire. In a few moments every body in the house was alarmed; all hastened to escape; and Milborne on going down the stairs found the greatest part of the inmates assembled in the street before the door of the hotel. It was indeed time, for the flames were bursting out in every direction. The first person whom Milborne saw, was his antagonist. 'My God,' cried the Englishman, 'where is madam?' They looked eagerly round; she was not to be seen.

'O, heavens,' exclaimed the landlord, she must be lost; see her chamber is on fire. 'A ladder quickly,' cried Milborne, 'We have not one; and if we had it would be of no use; you would perish without being able to save her. 'I will try however,' cried Milborne; and breaking from his antagonist, who shocked at the certain death to which he seemed devoting himself, he rushed back into the flames.

He will be lost,' exclaimed the by-standers. 'No, no,' cried Comte de S. Providence will not suffer him to perish; and he hastened in search of a ladder which he recollected to have seen in the morning at a little distance from the hotel. He was fortunate enough to find it; in a few moments it was reared against the window at which Milborne was seen, with madame in his arms.

'God be praised,' cried the Englishman fervently, as he descended with his lovely burden, whom terror had deprived of her senses. 'God be praised,' was echoed by all present with a feeling of mingled joy and terror, as they saw the floor of her apartment fall in with a terrible crash. Milborne had found her lying insensibly on her bed; he wrapped her in a blanket, and so saved her from being burnt, in attempting to rescue her from thence. He delivered her to the care of the women, and it being by this time ascertained that no lives were lost, Milborne and the Comte hastened to convey her to her new lodging. She was at that moment hardly capable of speaking, but she begged to see her preserver in the morning. The gentlemen then separated to receive some repose, but not before they had shaken hands in amity.

The next morning Milborne waited upon the widow. 'Ah, my preserver,' cried she, starting up as he entered, and clasping both his hands in hers, 'what shall I say to you—how can I thank you—how shall I ever repay?' 'Repay nonsense—take a pinch of snuff,' cried Milborne in a tone of affected gaiety, which ill disguised the emotions the beautiful widow's fervent gratitude had called forth. My readers will believe that this time she did not refuse. Don't you find it excellent,' cried Milborne. 'Yes excellent indeed,' she replied, when the fit of sneezing which it occasioned had subsided. 'I thought,' said Milborne in a tone of triumph, that you could not fail to like it, if you once could be prevailed on to taste it; but this is nothing—I have with me samples of all the different kinds of snuff that are used, and some which I have myself introduced, and had compounded under my own direction, you shall try them all.

The widow would perhaps rather have been excused from giving this proof of her gratitude, but what could she deny to her deliverer? We do not know how far she became a connoisseur in snuff, for in a few days Milborne found that his penchant for it began to be succeeded by another penchant; in short the widow's fine eyes caused certain uneasy sensations, which even his favorite amusement of snuff taking could not dissipate. One day while he was sitting with her, he suddenly fell into a fit of abstraction, and his box which he held open in his hand, dropped upon the floor. 'How unlucky—you have spilled all your snuff,' cried Madame Dorval, stooping to pick up the box. 'Never mind,' said Milborne, gently detaining her hand as she presented it to him; 'snuff is a good thing, but it is not a panacea for every care.'

'Indeed,' cried the widow archly, and pray when did you discover that. 'Not till to-day—I have taken three times my usual quantity in order to put you out of my head, but I cannot.

I see clearly there is but one way to manage the matter satisfactorily; I must either marry you or run away from you. Now my dear madam, which shall I do?'

'Run away, to be sure,' cried the widow; but what signifies what a woman says when her eyes contradict her tongue? Milborne trusted to the former, and he was right: he pressed his suit with ardor: mutual explanations took place. The Englishman was a rich whimsical, but noble minded being; the widow was virtuous and well born, but comparatively poor.

No obstacle opposed a union which they mutually desired. In the course of two years after it had taken place. Milborne was the happy father of two lovely children; and their infantine caresses and the attentions of his beautiful wife occupied him so completely, that he no longer felt ennui, and we are assured that his snuff box was discarded.

REASONS FOR EMIGRATING.

A Scotch gentleman, in the warmth of national veneration, was praising Scotland for the cheapness of provisions; a salmon might be bought for saxpance, and a dozen mackerel for twapance—'And pray, sir,' asked one of the listeners, 'how come you to leave so cheap a country?' 'In gude truth, mon,' replied the Scotchman, 'although fish is plentiful enough, the saxpances and twapances are unco scarce.'

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

CURIOUS MODE OF SILVERING IVORY.

Immerse a small slip of ivory in a weak solution of nitrate of silver, and let it remain till the solution has given it a deep yellow colour; then take it out and immerse it in a tumbler of clear water, and expose it in the water to the rays of the sun. In about three hours the ivory acquires a black colour; but the black surface, on being rubbed, soon becomes changed to a brilliant silver.

TO MAKE PARCHMENT GLUE.—Take one pound of parchment, and boil it in six quarts of water, till the quantity be reduced to one quart; strain off the fluid from the dregs, and then boil it again till it be of the consistence of glue.

The same may be done with glover's cuttings of leather, which make a colourless glue, if not burnt in the evaporation of the water.

BLACK SEALING WAX.—Proceed as directed for the red wax, only instead of the vermilion substitute the best ivory black.

GREEN SEALING WAX.—Proceed as in the above; only, instead of vermilion, use verdigris powdered; or where the colour is required to be bright, distilled or crystals of verdigris.

BLUE SEALING WAX.—As the above; only changing the vermilion for small well powdered; or, for a light blue, verditer may be used; as may also, with more advantage, a mixture of both.

INK SIMILAR TO CHINA INK.

Mr. Fontenell says, equal in colour and goodness to China or India Ink, may be made by dissolving six parts of isinglass in twelve of water, mixing the solutions whilst warm, and incorporating with them one part of best ivory black, using the spatula, and adding but small portions at once. When the mixture is complete, it is to be heated in a water bath, until so much water is evaporated as to leave a paste which may be moulded into any required form, and then the drying completes it.

THE MARINER'S COMPASS.—Who invented the mariner's compass?

This is a question not often put, but less frequently answered.

A shepherd of Italy by the name of Magnes, was the first to discover the properties of the loadstone, a mineral which gives polarity to iron—from the circumstance of his walking over a quarry, and small particles of this stone adhering to the iron nails in his sandals.

In the year 1324, John de Gioja, a handicraftsman of Naples, first discovered that a piece of iron rubbed with loadstone, and then suspended on its centre of gravity had the property of pointing to the north star, and he was the first to apply needles on centres for the purposes of navigation.

John tried his needles at different places in Italy, and moored a vessel in the Mediterranean, to ascertain whether this magnetic power was the same on water as upon land. The name of magnet was given to the loadstone, and to the needle.

The division of the 'shipman's card,' was first made into four quarters, then into 16 and 32 points, and ultimately into 360.

This graduation was progressive, and marked out upon a moveable disk. It was not until the middle of the last century that the needle and card were combined and hung on a common centre.

In the time of Columbus, nearly two hundred years after the discovery of the magnetic needle by John de Gioja, the card was placed under the needle.

It is worthy of remark that this highly useful instrument, discovered, not invented through any scientific or theoretical deductions, should still continue to puzzle and baffle the philosopher in his attempts to discover the cause of its variations in the different parts of the Earth.

To the Italians we are indebted for the compass and early enterprise in navigation, and to the Philadelphian for the discovery of the quadrant, by Godfrey.

TO WELD TORTOISE SHELL.—Provide a pair of pincers, the tongs of which will reach four inches beyond the rivet. Now file the tortoise-shell clean to a lap joint, carefully observe that no grease touches it.—Wet the joint with water; apply the pincers hot, following them water, and the shell will be found to be joined, as if it were originally the same piece.

TO MAKE GLASS JARS LOOK LIKE CHINA.—After painting the figures, cut them out, so that none of the paper remains, then take some thick gum arabic water, pass it over all the figures, and place them on the glass to taste: let them stand to dry for 24 hours, then clean them well with a wet cloth betwixt the prints, and let them stand a few hours longer lest the water should move any of the edges, then take white wax and flake white, ground very fine, and melt them together: with a japanning brush go all over the glass above the prints; done in this manner they will hold water; or, boil isinglass to a strong jelly and mix it up with white lead ground fine, and lay it on in the same manner: or use nut oil and flake white. For a blue, ground out with white wax, and Prussian blue, ground fine; for red, wax and vermillion or carmine; for green, wax and verdigris; for a chocolate colour, wax and burnt umber.

TO ASCERTAIN IF LINEN BE BLEACHED WITH LIME. It is easy to detect linens which have been bleached with lime, in the following manner:—Cut off a piece of the new linen which you wish to examine, put it into a glass, and pour on it several teaspoons of vinegar. If the linen contains lime, the acid will excite considerable effervescence, accompanied with a slight noise. Otherwise no effect is produced.

LAUGHTER.

"Laugh and grow fat," is an old adage; and Sterne tells us, that every time a man laughs, he adds something to his life. An eccentric philosopher, of the last century, used to say, that he liked not only to laugh himself, but to see laughter, and hear laughter. "Laughter, Sir, laughter is good for health; it is a provocative to the appetite, and a friend of digestion. Dr. Sydenham, said the arrival of a merry-andrew in a town was more beneficial to the health of the inhabitants than twenty asses loaded with medicine." Mr. Pott used to say that he never saw the "Tailor riding to Brentford," without feeling better for a week afterwards.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, SEPT. 5, 1840.

OURSELVES.

One year has now passed, since we commenced the publication of the AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER;—and whether we have fulfilled the promises we made to our readers on our introduction to them, or whether our sheet, in the main, has met with their views, is for them, and not for us to decide. We have been compelled to labor under many embarrassments during the year just gone by—more, perhaps than usually falls to the lot of an ordinary newspaper in its infancy. The attempt to establish a Masonic paper in this state, after the recent difficulties, was considered as extremely hazardous, by many of our friends. We were however inclined to try the experiment; and although we have in many instances, encountered that spirit of intolerance and bigotry, which unfortunately marked the desolating course of Anti-masonry, when in its career of "glory;" yet upon the whole a better state of things is evidently growing among us—political opposition to our institution has ceased—honest prejudice is fast passing away; many of our lodges have again resumed their labors, and we hope in a few years to see the institution stand, as was its wont, the foremost in the land.

Our intercourse with the brethren of the country, has satisfied us of the necessity of a masonic organ of communication, as well as of the ability of the Fraternity to sustain such a paper. It is these considerations which induce us, based on the future, to test by another year's trial, whether the Register shall be placed on a permanent footing, or whether it shall be discontinued at the expiration of this volume. The past year was intended as an experimental one. We have not realized any thing like a compensation for our services; although if our delinquent patrons pay us, we shall save ourselves from loss. To those of our patrons who have been prompt in remitting their subscriptions, we return our thanks; to those who have been remiss on this point, we will ask them what we shall thank them for? We trust however, that they "will see the error of their ways," and give us a practical evidence of reformation and substantial patronage, by immediately forwarding the amount of the last with that of the new year's subscription. We find it necessary to make an alteration in our terms, which a positive necessity renders imperative, to those of our patrons residing out of this place,—$2 if paid in advance, or within 30 days from the time of subscribing, 2,50, if not paid within 6 months, or $3, at the expiration of the year. We prefer the $2. In order to meet the difficulty arising from the currency, in other states, we will receive the notes of any specie paying bank, in the neighborhood of the subscriber, if sent free of postage, which can be done by a post master, without charge.

We cannot let the opportunity pass without expressing our thanks to those of our friends who have aided our undertaking, and particularly to the many warm hearted brethren of the South, who although total strangers to us, have evinced the kindest wishes for our welfare, and by whose active exertions, we are indebted for many valuable subscriptions. We tender to them our thanks for past favors, and hope that they will not abate their friendly exertions, which it will at all times be our pride and duty to merit.

Those of our subscribers who have preserved files of the Register, with the intention of having them bound, are referred to the advertisement of Messrs. Corning & Cook, in another column. These gentlemen will bind each volume of the Register in a neat and substantial manner for 62½ cents per volume.

LOST PAPERS.—Those of our subscribers who are desirous of preserving their papers, and who from any cause may have lost any particular No. are informed, that if they will send us a list of such lost Nos, free of postage, we will furnish them without any additional charge. We would state, however, that, we are destitute of Nos. 36 and 37, owing to an accident; and we would feel ourselves obliged to any friends for those Nos. where it is not the intention to preserve a file.

NOMINATIONS.—Wm. C. Bouck, of the county of Schoharie, and John S. Dickinson of the county of Broome, have been put in nomination for governor and lieutenant governor of this state, by the friends of the national administration.

EXPULSION.—James F. Smith, formerly a member of the Grand Lodge of Georgia, has been expelled from all the privileges of Masonry, for gross unmasonic conduct. Said Smith, is between 25 and 30 years of age, blue eyes, light complexion, hair light and very coarse, about 5 feet 8 or 9 inches high, heavy built, and weighs about 200 pounds.

TABLE TALK.—Dickens, (Boz) madness originated in a pun. He had a pet raven, and on a friend having said he was raven mad, another kind friend told his acquaintances that study had made him raving mad!—Noah's Evening Star, and the N. Y. Times, have become consolidated.—A stranger, whose name is supposed to be John Carnes, has been injured in the head at Danube, Herkimer co. He is supposed to be long in the neighborhood of Rochester.—Mrs. Kinney, of Boston, who is supposed to have poisoned two husbands, has been arrested at Whetford, Vt.—The president of the U. S. has directed our consul, at Alexandria, to unite with the other powers in ameliorating the present distressed situation of the Jews in the Ottoman dominions.—There has been a large fire at Green Bay, which destroyed seven stores.—Grace Clokier, a young Scotch girl, was burned to death in Troy, on the 2d inst. by her clothes taking fire while heating some alcohol.—Miss Fly, of Massachusetts, has recovered 365 dollars for a breach of promise, from Mr. Frost for 365 days courtship; being just $1, per day, Sundays included, for the wear and tear of Miss Fly's heart. Cheap enough for such frosty conduct.—The Boston Journal cautions the public against an accomplished scoundrel by the name of John Reid, who is now roving about the country, living by his wits. He has a scar on his nose, looks like a gentleman, and his peculiar talent appears to run to forgery.—The lion and lioness, sent to the president have been sold, one for $250, and the other for $125.—A boy and girl were bitten by a mad dog, at Cincinnati, last week.—"Nobility." An English paper says that the Earl of Waldegrave, and Capt. Duff, were committed to jail, for stealing a hat from Mr. Richardson.—The American Journal of Medical Science, states a remarkable case of contagion being communicated by letter. Mr. Atkinson, had been sick with the small pox, and on his recovery, he corresponded with his brother on a glazed sheet of paper, which letter was carried in a side pocket for some weeks, the other brother was taken sick with the disease and died.—Upwards of 138000 persons were conveyed on the Harlem rail road, during the month of August.—Judge Randall has decided that an apprentice enlisting in the service of the U. S. shall not be held to duty. The obligation to the master being the strongest.—The Emperor of Russia, has just closed a contract with Mr. Norris, of Philadelphia, for two hundred loco-motive engines, 40 each year, for which he is to pay $1,400,000. They are to run between Moscow and St. Petersburg.

STEAM CANAL BORTS.—Mr. Battle, an ingenious mechanic of this city, has succeeded in perfecting machinery for propelling boats on the canal by steam.—It is an application of the principle of the rail road loco-motive—a wheel being so constructed, as to run directly upon the bed of the canal under the boat, adapting itself to the irregularities of the bottom, and acting in deep water as a common wheel. Mr. B. has applied for a patent.

We send this No. of our paper, at the suggestion of others, to several brethren, whom we believe are not aware of the existence of a masonic paper in the country. We hope it will meet with their approbation and support.

The Boston Daily Advertiser says that the Hon. John Q. Adams has taken passage in the steamship Acadia for Halifax only, on an excursion for the benefit of his health.

A NEW WAY OF RAISING THE WIND.—A Dr. Kelly of New York, the original inventor of his own pills, advertises gratuitous lectures on the "treatment of disease—new principles, and new theory," at Knickerbocker Hall. We have not heard the Dr. but we suppose, he demonstrates to his own entire satisfaction, and undoubtedly to many of his hearers, that Boerhaave's mantle has fell on him, and not the immortal Brandeth.

It is stated in the Philadelphia Inquirer that the manuscript of the original Declaration of Independence, in the hand-writing of Jefferson, with the interlineations of Franklin and other members, is in possession of the American Philosophical Society of that city, may be seen at their Hall.

The publication of the Bee, a spirited and racy penny paper of this city, has been suspended for a few days.

REVOLUTIONARY REMINISCENCE.—We are indebted for the following very singular, yet decidedly nervous, piece of literature, to our friend and correspondent, C. D. L. of the N. York His. Society. The determination to "do or die," it displays, deserves a better fate than that of being ensconced amid dusty vols., hidden from all but the curious. It gives us the certain evidence that the spirit of the revolution did not animate alone the breast of the educated.—The fire was truth, and the hearts of the poor as well as the affluent, weak as well as the powerful, "burned for the conflict."

To his Excellency General Gates:

PUBLICATION OF SUICIDES.—We never publish cases of suicide or self-destruction. If people will be guilty of such crimes, it is charity to their characters, to abstain from giving publicity to the horrid details. Nor are we disposed to help them forward in the immortality they seek, or to hold up their pernicious example to the practice of other weak-minded people.—We wish the press generally would follow the same course which we have adopted. We should have much hope that good results would ultimately grow out of the practice.—Boston Mirror.

We have long been of a similar opinion, although we have followed the "multitude to do evil." The effect is unhappy on the minds of those persons of a gloomy temperament, and there is no doubt but there is many a "quietus" hastened, by keeping these things before the distempered vision of the unhappy.

A PAINFUL SCENE which occurred in Boston on Friday last, is related in the Times of that city. An elegant and accomplished woman, the wife of one of the most wealthy and respectable merchants in the city, was seen passing up Washington street, about one o'clock P. M. leading two small and beautiful little girls by the hand, so deeply intoxicated that she reeled from one side of the walk to the other, and could scarcely stand upright. It was a bright and beautiful day, half the town were abroad. The little girls that the woman held by the hand, were her own children.

The poor things looked up at their unfortunate mother apparently wondering why she acted so strangely, and as she reeled away from them, on either side, clung still tighter to the hand they clasped, and followed her in her erratic course, as well as they were able. Hundreds of persons stopped and gazed for several minutes upon the scene, with hearts overflowing with pity. The Times further states, that this lady, and several others, are in the daily habit of meeting at certain places in that city, kept by females, ostensibly for other purposes, where they are supplied with intoxicating liquors, cordials, and wines, and that several cases like that mentioned above, have recently occurred, which have carried shame and distress into the bosoms of happy and respectable families.

A sale of eleven townships of land in Iowa, commenced at Dubuque on the 3d inst. These townships perhaps contain some of the best land in the Territory, yet we learn from the News that the sale was poorly attended and the amount of land sold very small.

Counterfeits are afloat on the Erie County Bank, Buffalo, a red back; also on the Bank of Orleans, likewise red back. Both 3's.

A COURAGEOUS YOUTH.—A gentleman in Montrea lately led to the hymenial altar a lady, aged 27, who had already buried three husbands. The last victim, it is said, looked rather pale, but still contrived to take his fate with a good deal of fortitude.

DOMESTIC ECONOMY.

ROUP, OR GAPS IN POULTRY.—Soap mixed with the food of chickens, or Indian meal wet up with soap suds, and fed to them, is said to be a cure for this disorder, that is so fatal to poultry.—Cultivator.

FOR WEAK OR SORE EYES.—One of the best and easiest applications for weak eyes, is to take a small piece of copperas, (white is the best,) of the size of a pea, and dissolve it in a two ounce vial of soft water. When clear, this may be used for bathing the eyes, and with the best effects.—Id.

CLEANING WINDOW BLINDS.—Soap or strong soap suds will destroy green paint more readily than other colors; the lie has the same effect on oil paints that it has with grease. I have seen many painted rooms soiled by the carelessness or ignorance of wash-women, in the application of soap or strong soap water; when it does not destroy the paint, it may affect the lustre.

PRESERVING HAMS FOR SUMMER USE.—Take a dry cask or box, say an old flour barrel, put a good layer of coarse salt in the bottom, and then put down a ham; cover that with coarse salt, and put down another ham and so on till the cask is full, or the hams all deposited. Set the cask, in a cool dry place, and whenever a ham is wanted take it out, and it will be every way as clean, clear from vermin and all other impurities, as when put down. This is attended with very little trouble or expense, as the salt is not at all injured for any other use in the fall.—Id.

MAKING VINEGAR.—Vinegar (an indispensable article in house keeping) may be easily made by observing the following simple rule, viz: procure a clean oaken cask, of the size of a common barrel, or wine cask, place it in a warm room, if in the summer time, the garret, near a roof which is exposed to the warm rays of the sun; put in say one or two gallons of clear fermented cider, leave the bung out so that the air may have free circulation; in the course of two or three weeks it will become sharp vinegar fit for use. Cider may then be added from time to time in small quantities, and increased at pleasure, taking care to never add more cider at any one time than there is vinegar already in the cask; in recruiting care should be taken that clear fermented cider be used; excluding all such trash as cider emptyings from old casks, tea grounds, &c. &c.—Id.

THE TOMATO.—Now is the time for gathering this healthy and most desirable vegetable, which is cooked in various ways according to the peculiar taste of people. As a salad it is good—as an omelet, with butter, eggs, and crumbs of bread, capital—it is good stuffed and baked—good stewed down close with a fair piece of beef and Lima beans—in short, in what position is it not good? Recently the tomato has been successfully used in medical cases. It is good for a cough—soothing to the lungs. Use it freely in hot weather to check the accumulation of bile. If you wish to dry and pack away in bags for winter, gather them when ripe and scald them to get the skin off—then boil them well with a little sugar and salt, but no water—spread them in thin cakes in the sun, and when dry pack them away in a dry room.—Evening Star.

TO MAKE POPPEREE, OR A SUBSTITUTE FOR FRESH FLOWERS.—By collecting the leaves of roses, wall flowers, lavender, sweet brier, &c., and packing them with layers of salt, in a tight cover jar, or other suitable vessel, sprinkling with each layer a little powder of cloves and cinnamon, in equal parts, may acquire a delightful and refreshing perfume, which will last for years, with very little waste, which waste may be supplied, by adding fresh leaves, on the return of the following season.

Nothing on earth can more regale the senses, than a beautiful display of roses, and other ornamental flowers. But this has been hitherto considered as a luxury which could only be enjoyed by the rich, who wholly disregard profit. But if the most brilliant productions of Flora's kingdom can be rendered equally an object of profit and of pleasure, who would not have a flower garden? Every family, almost, can be furnished with a cheap apparatus for distilling, and may thus render pleasure and profit mutual auxiliaries to each other.—[N. Y. Far. Vol. 7.]

CHARITY.

Galatians 6 chap 1. verse.

I.

I spoke in harsh and hasty tone
Of caustic censure and reproof,
Against a frail and sinning one,
And proudly stood from him aloof.
From such a fault my hands were pure,
And in my strength I felt secure.

II.

The Serpent came, but in the guise
Of one well fitted to be loved.
My soul was filled with sweet surprise,
And springs before unknown were moved.
Though conscience checked me with alarm
I could not wish to break the charm.

III.

I gazed in love! I shook with fear!
My brain was whirling in the strife,
I felt a strengthening angel near
But spurned the hand that offered life.
I drank the sweet delight—I fell—
Wild laughter shook the vaults of hell!

IV.

Brother, be warned! If guilt appear,
In Kindness to the sinner speak,
Drop in his path compassion's tear
And let thy faithfulness be meek;
Nor let thy virtue feed thy pride,
Nor trust thyself—thou mayest be tried.

STANZAS.

"My darling boy!" the mother cried,
And well he grew a favored child,
And many a dream with joy allied
Came to her bosom when he smiled;—
But that fond mother rests in death,
And oh, alas!—for her sweet boy,
He speaketh with polluted breath—
"Pleasure, thou hast thine own alloy!"

He gazeth where his mother lays,
Yet knoweth not the joy of tears,
But in his bosom doth upraise
The maniac's wild destructive fears,
Chaos, is kindred with his mind,
And beareth in his breast control,
And thus he poureth out the mind
The madness of a ruined soul.

"A darkness sets upon my heart,
With fearful watching for the time
When severed from this life I start,
A being of another clime.
A ray of light—how prized it were!
A little hope were unto me
A kindly rescue from despair,
Lighting thy gloom, Eternity!

"Enchanting Hope! how could'st thou flee
With thine alluring light, the heart
Whose thoughts were ne'er estranged from thee?
How could'st thou crush it and depart!
But wherefore wish? Darkness and death
Are mine. I'll quaff the cheerful bowl
And breathe away in every breath,
The hopes of an immortal soul.

"What is this life to me? a woe,
A miserable round of years,
The future, seek I not to know,
For dark and dreadful it appears.
The bowl! the bowl! away despair,
Though joy immortal is denied
The bowl hath promise ever fair!"—
He drank the poison, and he died!

THE BATHOS OF MUSIC.

BY AN AMATEUR.

Music!—divinest power of Art
By mortals e'er profest,—
Alike to charm the feeling heart,
And soothe the savage breast:
How captivating—when by young,
And fair and lovely maid,
We hear sweet "Angel's whisper" sung,
Or—"Yankee Doodle" played!

How sweetly falls from lips most dear
Our loved and favorite song,
Which we could list for hours to hear,
Nor think the moments long!
And Oh! how sweet, when thus we've given
Free vent to feeling's flow,—
To sweetest thoughts, which, born in heaven,
Bless mortals here below—
To hear the charming fair strike up
"Zip Coon," or "Jump Jim Crow."

STANZAS.

[From the Spanish.]

Toll not the bell of death for me,
When I am dead;
Strew not the flow'ry wreath o'er me,
On my cold bed;
Let Friendship's sacred tear
On my fresh grave appear,
Gemming with pearls my bier,
When I am dead.

No dazzling, proud array,
Of pageantry display;
My fete to spread:
Let not the busy crowd be near,
When I am dead;
Fanning, with unfelt sighs, my bier—
Sighs, quickly sped!

Deep let th' impression rest
On some fond, feeling breast;
Then were my mem'ry blest,
When I am dead
Ket not the day be writ—
Love will remember it,
Untold—unsaid!

"And Hagar sat over against him and wept." Genesis, chap. 21

Did not the tear in Hagar's eye,
As o'er her dying son she knelt,
In speechless, silent agony,
Shew what the anxious mother felt!

And when she softly breath'd her prayer,
Her tearful eyes uprais'd to heaven,
Did not the anguish beaming there,
Show how the mother's heart was riven?

Then, when the sweetest accents fell,
The voice from heav'n—"Thy son shall live!"
Think ye an angel's tongue could tell
The joys that bade her heart revive?

O! there's something in the tear,
That dims a mother's kindling eye;
A charm so fraught with love—so dear,
We weep—we know not—care not—why.

Yes—if a spark was ever given
To mortals, from the fires above:
If e'er a flower that bloom'd in heav'n—
It is a Mother's tender Love.

MASONIC.

For the American Masonic Register.

ONE OF THE "EVILS OF MASONRY."

The following article is from one of our most esteemed correspondents, a clergyman of character and standing!—one who has grown gray in the service of his Divine Master. A brother, who in our darkest days of adversity, when our institution was reviled at by the ignorant, and deserted by the faithless, never conceived it to be incompatible with his sacred functions, to acknowledge himself an "adhering mason." The occurrence which follows, may be significantly put down as one of the "evils of Masonry." If it is true, that a "tree is to be known by its fruits," we certainly can see no good reason, why this should be "cut down and cast into the fire."—Ed.

In the Month of November, 1822, I embarked on board the ship Clifford Wayne, at New York for Savannah in Georgia.

My place of destination was at P——n, in Hancock Co. On board this ship I found a Mr. W——, a man perhaps about 30 years of age, having a wife and two children, bound the same place. Mr. W—— was from Saratoga Springs, a Blacksmith by trade, then engaged in the plough iron business. In due time he and his family arrived at P——n, and commenced his operations. He was found to be a good workman, and very industrious; but his plough concerns not succeeding very well, his attention was turned, exclusively, to the common business of his trade. He proved to be an honest and honorable man, and secured the confidence and esteem of those with whom he was acquainted. Mr. W——, being a very healthy man, imprudently disregarded all precautionary means to preserve that health. He neither avoided exposures, nor denied himself the free use of all kinds of fruits. The result was, in Sept. I think, he was seized with a violent fever, which baffled Medical skill, and terminated his life. His wife, a most excellent and amiable woman, was thus left a widow, with two children, in the land of strangers, and destitute of property. But happily for her, Mr. W——, her husband was a Mason in good standing, and the members of the Fraternity took the case of the widow into consideration. On due deliberation, it was thought advisable to make up a purse, and send her back to her friends, at Saratoga. This proposal was gratefully received by Mrs. W——, and as I was about to return to the North in November, she was to be put under my care. A statement of her case was then made to several of the neighboring Lodges, and ample means were furnished to defray her expenses. In addition to this, a hack and servant were gratuitously provided to convey us all to Savannah, a distance of 150 miles from P——n. We arrived in Savannah, and in the course of a few days secured a passage to New York, in the Louisa Matilda. From New York we proceeded by Steamboat to Hudson, and thence by stages to Troy. Mrs. W—— had a cousin then living in Troy, and it was unnecessary for me to leave my route, to attend her further. This cousin we found, and Mrs. W—— and her children were kindly received.

Having defrayed all the expenses of this journey, I found One hundred dollars still remaining, over and above; which sum I then paid to Mrs. W—— and took my leave of her in Troy.

And now permit me to add, that in my estimation, I never saw a more grateful being than Mrs. W—— was. Language is powerless to impart any adequate conceptions of that sense of gratitude, which filled her heart.

The above is a faithful narration of a fact, with the single exception of the concealment of names. Should that Lady be still alive, and this article chance to fall under her eye, it will call up a train of emotions that no heart but her own can follow and feel.

This is but one, amongst the many untold benevolent acts of the Fraternity. And this, were it alone, is an honor to human nature; it is an honor to the Masonic Institution. How little do females know, what a shield of protection is thrown around them, by the Masonic arm, and what streams of charity are reserved for the destitute Widow, and her needy orphans.

T.

ANTIQUITY OF MASONRY.

Extracts from an address, delivered at Lynn, Mass. by CHARLES CUSHING, Esq.

'The early records of the Craft are confessedly involved in much obscurity. Although the Institution has been notorious through many ages and nations, there is only here and there an insulated fact concerning it, preserved in authentic history. Nor is this circumstance in any respect singular. How indeed could it be otherwise with a society, whose rites and tenets are perpetuated by tradition alone, and by oral transmission in the sacred precincts of the Lodge? Doubtless Freemasonry in its actual shape, was wholly distinct from operative Masonry, and was no longer a school of instruction of comparatively recent date. Nevertheless, let any person, in the spirit of candor, examine the antiquities of Freemasonry, as disclosed in the writings of those even who are no friends of the Order, and he will not hastily charge us with extravagance and pretensions.

It is generally believed that ancient Masonry, as it is distinctively called, derives its origin from the island of Great Britain. Hither, it is said, the many rich and noble Lodges of the continent of Europe may, by their own declaration, be traced. It is affirmed that, far back in the darkness of the middle age, associations of Freemasons became celebrated in England in connexion with the great structures of the Norman style of architecture, the monasteries and baronial castles, on which the proud and the pious of that day lavished their wealth. Then it was that powerful feudal lords constructed impregnable fortresses, whose battlemented towers and buttressed walls might defend them from the assaults of their enemies, during a period, when the still small voice of the law was drowned by the din of arms, and might was become the sole rule of right. Then it was that men, whose lives had been a succession of acts of rapine and violence, sought to expiate their crimes by endowing the church, and signalized their tardy devotion by erecting cathedrals with their lofty spires pointing to heaven, and cloistered abbeys consecrated to the service of religion. These magnificent edifices were the work of associations of Masons of virtuous nations, who united by secret pledges and governed in Lodges, travelled from country to country wherever their skill was demanded, and bearing papal charters which gave them immunities in every land, obtained the distinguishing name of Freemasons. Transmitting the mysteries of the Craft from generation to generation, countenanced by the greatest barons, the wisest prelates, and the best monarchs, they disseminated their principles and their traditional love from Britain, as we are told, through Europe and America, and became that wide spread and important Institution of which we are but humble members.

But is not this received account liable, in part at least, to some exception? Could it be that the Lodges of architects deposited their secrets in Britain alone—that no where else they planted the seeds of Freemasonry, or left behind them permanent associations to preserve their mysterious and valuable knowledge? And if the Institution be one of operative art alone, how happens it that now for centuries back, the Order has been filled with the wise, the rich, the great, and the benevolent, without reference to mechanical Masonry? Is not the conclusion irresistible that the English Masons were not the sole depositaries of the Association, that the Association itself had, a far more exalted aim than merely to combine the efforts of itinerant artisans?

And whence again, did the Freemasons, who reared the stupendous and gorgeous piles of which I have spoken, learn their wonderful art? Architectural skill is not the acquisition of a day. Time must have poured out his long-gathered treasures of experience, and the accumulated stores of many an age must have been gained, ere the genius of man could elevate, plan, nay conceive of edifices so vast, so costly, and so grand. Whence did they obtain the knowledge of that art, which it requires the longest lapse of years to mature? The art, to which the power of peopling the canvass with mimic forms of sublimity and beauty, and the power of animating the lifeless marble—that art to which all the glorious creations of sculpture and painting—are but handmaidens and subordinate ministers? Who, that is initiated into the mysteries of Masonry, who, that has diligently studied the secrets and the symbol entrusted to the craft, can doubt? They lead our attention inevitably to that favored clime, on which heaven has bestowed its choicest blessings, and which nature and art have conspired to adorn, the fertile and once populous and opulent regions of Western Asia. Hither we trace the Phenician builders of the temple of Solomon, hither the Dionysian artificers, hither the Masonic instruction of the Knights of the Temple; and hither, in fine, the primitive institution of our Order: for all these, need I add if there be any faith in lessons of history, are but varying shapes, under which Freemasonry has appeared in the world.

But concede that the ancient mysteries are the fountain of the modern, and all obscurity is at once dispelled from the question, and every thing becomes clear as the light of mid-day. The wisdom of the ancient Egyptians was considered by the priesthood as a sacred deposit entrusted to their keeping. It was locked up in hieroglyphics and curious symbols, which the mass of men could not understand, and which, engraved upon the granite monuments of the Nile, will remain, so long as the earth endures, to bear testimony to the guarded caution of their inventors. None was admitted to the knowledge, which they possessed without a formal initiation, in which the severest trials of his fortitude were made, and the most tremendous obligation to secrecy exacted of the aspirant after mental and moral illumination. The secrets communicated to him, at the end of a long novitiate, and on practical experience of his worthiness to receive them, were the great truths of philosophy, and above all, a purer and more elevated religious faith, than prevailed in those ages of popular ignorance and superstition. The same mysteries enveloping the same truths passed from Egypt to Greece, when they were preserved in the Eleusinian and Dionysian pageants, after Pythagoras and other philosophers had adopted and sanctioned this mode of enlightening their disciples. The most important truths, protected under this veil of mystery, were the doctrines of natural religion. In fine, the mysteries themselves were essentially a religious institution. And the more carefully we scrutinize the rites of Freemasonry, the more fully satisfied shall we be that a religious object was the primary purpose of their institution; and that in this respect, as well as in so many others, they resemble the ancient mysteries from which I deduce their origin.

Upon this supposition, it is easy to conceive how operative Masonry came to be so closely bleaded, on so many occasions with the history of the order. What more natural than that architects, whose chief employment was to erect splendid fanes in Greece to the gods of the heathens, or a temple in Jerusalem to the only true God or Christian churches in modern Europe, should seek for initiation into the mysteries of that religion, in adorning which their architectural skill was displayed! And when the foundations of a temple or a cathedral were laid with splendid Masonic ceremonies, which operative masons participated, how easy was it for the uninitiated, who beheld the scene, to mistake the objects and the nature of the solemn rite. And the same considerations prove that the ceremonies, now practised on like occasion, are no unmeaning form, nor are they symbolical, as many imagine, of the ruins of architecture. They are the remains of mysterious religious rites, celebrated, not by operative Masons, but by men initiated into the arcana—the hidden secrets of nature and of art, in those days, when wisdom and philosophy were shrouded from the profane gaze of the multitude.

CHARACTER.

The following is from an old periodical of 25 years ago. It is new to us, and will be perhaps to many of our readers:—

GOVERNOR TOMPKINS, AND THE DUTCHMAN.

Perhaps there is no better criterion by which to judge the character of public men than is to be found in those trifling incidents that frequently occur in the life of eminent individuals—when unbending themselves from the dignity of office, they permit their real dispositions to be manifested in their hours of relaxation; characteristic traits are thus frequently exhibited and serve in some measure as a guide by which we are to estimate the worth of the individual—whether to condemn or applaud. The following anecdote is related of D. D. Tompkins, and will remind many of our readers of an incident in Goldsmith's play of "She stoops to Conquer."

At the time Mr. Tompkins was governor of the state of New-York and resident in Albany, a Dutch farmer, arrived in the suburbs of that city, with his wagon heavily laden; the roads being bad, he had the misfortune to drive his wagon into a deep rut, and with all his endeavors found it impossible to extricate it with his single exertions. In this emergency he found it necessary to seek for assistance, but it being rather an unfrequented spot, some time elapsed before any offered. A man however came up, and to him the farmer applied for help which was readily offered, and the two set to work; but they found the task by no means to be an easy one; for one wheel was no sooner extricated than another got fixed; no other help appearing, after toiling a considerable time, the poor Dutchman was almost in despair, but reassured by his companion, they made a violent effort, and succeeded in freeing the wagon. The Dutchman was now all gratitude towards his companion:—"Well den!" says he, "dis has been a hart chob; an you had'nt come, we might a'shtuck fast a week, so where 'll we get some-thing to drink? I k'll pay for it, if you'll show where'ts to be hat; I'm try and so pe you, Mr. ——— but I ton't know your name?" "It's Daniel," returned the other; and there's a house some distance a head, where we can get something to drink." "Well, Taniel, we'll go dere den." They proceeded on, till they arrived at a respectable looking house, which the Dutchman's companion, told him was the place he meant, and; they immediately went in and took possession of a neatly furnished room, when the farmer desired his friend Daniel to call for whatever he pleased. He obeyed and ringing the bell told the man that answered it to bring in a pitcher of ale, the farmer at the same time ordered his horses to be fed. The ale was brought, and at Daniel's instance some bread and cheese added; when this was finished the Dutchman asked Daniel to drink some brandy; this was ordered and a decanter of brandy was accordingly set before them. After drinking some time, the honest farmer felt his heart open more and more, and declaring he was never before in so comfortable a tavern, said he'd make the most of it; "So Tan," for he had now dropped one syllable of his companion's name, "so Tan, we'll have some cold ham and some more prandy, before I start." Again the bell was rung, the ham made its appearance, with every requisite attendant, and the two sat down to eat, the Dutchman urging his friend "Tan," to take example from him, and eat hearty, "just the same," said he, "as if you'd been home." Time passed pleasantly on, till at last the Dutchman said he must be gone, and wished his bill; he wondered where the landlord was all this time, and requested Tan would seek him; the other put him off, but the farmer growing impatient, his companion at last told him not to mind the bill, for he would settle with the landlord. "You pay de pill, Tan!" said the astonished Dutchman, "no, indeed, dat would be a good one, after helping me too: no, as I'm a Tutchman, I'll see de landlort and pay all myself." "Well, my friend to tell you the truth, I am the landlord, and I won't take any pay from you;" the farmer was bewildered, and after staring some time, asked, "and what's your name peside Tan?" "Tompkins—Daniel D. Tompkins!" "What! pe you Taniel T. Tompkins, our pig governor?" "Yes, I'm the governor." "Well, den, Taniel T. Tompkins, you're an honest, goot hearted man—and whoever says tifferent tont know you." Reader, was the honest Dutchman wrong?

MISCELLANY.

ANN BOLEYN'S LETTER TO KING HENRY.

We copy the following from Addison's Spectator.—Ann of Bologne, was one of the wives of King Henry the Eighth, and mother of Queen Elizabeth. She was beheaded upon the accusation of the King, for disloyalty; although the true cause, as she intimates herself, was rather from the love Henry bore for Jane Seymour, than from any actual crime. Such is the general opinion.

SIR,

Cotton Lib. } Your grace's displeasure, and my imprisonment, are things so strange unto me, as what to write, or what to excuse, I am altogether ignorant. Whereas you send unto me, (willing me to confess a truth, and to obtain your favour) by such a one, whom you know to be mine ancient professed enemy, I no sooner received this message by him, than I rightly conceived your meaning; and if, as you say, confessing a truth indeed may procure my safety, I shall with willingness and duty perform your command.

But let not your grace ever imagine, that your poor wife will ever be brought to acknowledge a fault, where not so much as a thought thereof proceeded. And to speak a truth never prince had a wife more loyal of all duty, and in all true affection, than you have ever found in Ann Boleyn: with which name and place I could willingly have contented myself, if God and your grace's pleasure had been so pleased. Neither did I at any time so far forget myself in my exaltation or received queenship, but that I always looked for such an alteration as I now find; for the ground of my preferment being on no surer foundation than your grace's fancy, the least alteration I knew was fit and sufficient to draw that fancy to some other object. You have chosen me from a low estate to be your queen and companion, far beyond my desert and desire. If then you found me worthy of such honour, good your grace, let not any light fancy, or bad counsel of mine enemies, withdraw your princely favour from me; neither let that stain that unworthy stain, of a disloyal heart towards your good grace, ever cast so foul a blot on your most dutiful wife, and the infant princess, your daughter. Try me, good king, but let me have a lawful trial, and let not my sworn enemies sit as my accusers and judges; yea, let me receive an open trial, for my truth shall fear no open shame; then shall you see either mine innocence cleared, your suspicion and conscience satisfied, the ignomy and slander of the world stopped, or my guilt openly declared. So that, whatsoever God or you may determine of me, your grace may be freed from an open censure; and mine offence being so lawfully proved, your grace is at liberty, both before God and man, not only to execute worthy punishment on me as an unlawful wife, but to follow your affection, already settled on that party, for whose sake I am now as I am, whose name I could some good while since have pointed unto your grace not being ignorant of my suspicion therein.

But if you have already determined of me, and that not only my death, but an infamous slander must bring you the enjoying of your desired happiness; then I desire of God, that he will pardon your great sin therein, and likewise mine enemies, the instrument thereof; and that he will not call you to a strict account for your unprincely and cruel usage of me, at his general judgement seat, where both you and myself must shortly appear, and in whose judgement I doubt not (whatsoever the world may think of me) mine innocence shall be openly known, and sufficiently cleared.

My last and only request shall be, that myself may only bear the burden of your grace's displeasure, and that it may not touch the innocent souls of those poor gentlemen, who (as I understand) are likewise in straight imprisonment for my sake. If ever I have found favour in your sight, if ever the name of Ann Boleyn hath been pleasing in your ears, then let me obtain this request, and I will so leave to trouble your grace any further, with mine earnest prayers to the Trinity, to have your grace in his good keeping, and to direct you in all your actions. From my doleful prison in the Tower, this sixth of May;

Your most loyal
'and ever faithful wife;

B.

ANN BOLEYN.

FATE OF GENIUS.

Homer was a beggar, Plautus turned a mill, Torrence was a slave. Boethius died in goal, Paul Borghese had fourteen different trades, and yet starved with all. Bente voglio was refused admittance into an hospital which he had himself erected, Cervantes, the immortal author of Don Quixotte, died of hunger; Camens, the celebrated writer of the Lusiad, ended his days in an alms house; and Vaugelas left his body to the surgeons to pay his debts, as far as it would go.

In considering the above men if we be blest with common sense, an even and cheerful temper, and equability of disposition, need we envy the elevation of genius, or the superiority of learning and science; when we see the one condemned or neglected, and the other toiling without regard? Whoever pants for fame or longs for literary honors, would do well to take a view of those above-mentioned; or survey that of such of our country as have been eminently conspicuous in the fields of imagination, the regions of fancy, or the plains of philosophy.

Bacon lived a life of meanness and distress; Raleigh ended his days upon a scaffold; the learning and virtue of Moore could not secure him a better doom; Spencer, whose Fairy Queen is never read but with an increase of admiration, died neglected, forsaken and away; the fate of Collins, one of our lyric poets lect, be ascribed in a great degree to the world's neglect which was the cause of his mental derangement and death; Milton sold his copy right of Paradise Lost for fifteen pounds sterling, at three different payments, and finished his life in obscurity; Dryden lived in poverty, and died in distress; Otway, though his end be variously related, yet all his biographers agreed in this that he died prematurely and in want.

Lee is said to have died in the streets; Steele lived a life of perfect warfare with bailiffs; Johnson is said to have sold the Vicar of Wakefield for a trifle to release his great author (Goldsmith) from the gripe of the law; Fielding lies in the burying grounds of the English factory at Lisbon, without a stone to mark the spot; Savage died in Newgate at Bristol, where he was confined for a debt of eight pounds sterling; and the great biographer of the English poets has recorded of the inimitable author of Hudibras, (Butler) "that all that can be said of him with certainty is, that he lived neglected, and died poor," and 't a youthful phenomenon, the immortal Chatterton, was so harassed by want, that he destroyed himself in his 18th year. Such, alas! is the fate of envied genius.

SPANISH COSTUME.

In France and elsewhere, when we have satisfied the cravings of the stomach, that is not sufficient: we want decent clothing, lined, furniture, which we renew at certain periods. The Spaniards never renew anything: his furniture, his utensils, confined to what is strictly necessary, served his grandfather, and will suffice his great-grand-children. Over him fashion has no influence: that divinity of the first order among us, has no altar in Spain. People there dress as they did in the time of Philip V., and as they will do a hundred years hence. In every part of the kingdom both sexes wear the same costume: at Madrid, Seville, Va-

In aia. and Nittoria, it is the black gown and the black veil for the women, the brown or blue cloak for the men. I never could conceive how it happens, that, in our theatres, the managers of which pique themselves so much on truth, in regard to costumes, they should permit the Rosinas, the Countess Almavivas, to dress in white and pink. Never was Rosina dressed in this manner: never had she any than a black gown, trimmed with jet, a black mantilla, nothing but black, and that to set off the fairness of her complexion. To dress a Spanish woman in pink, is as preposterous as to present Manlius in the habit of the middle ages, with moustaches and a large dagger. It is singular that in the hot climate of Spain, black should be the only color adopted for the apparel of women. Imparting a certain severity to the persons, it forms a strange contrast with bright and wanton eyes, and a voluptuous air. The young look like maids who have run away from their convent to seek their fortunes in the world; the old, like ancient sybils, who lack nothing but tripod to fall into convulsions.

THE ORIGINAL OF PAUL AND VIRGINIA.

It often happens that an insignificant circumstance, an obscure fact, an unexpected occurrence, gives birth to the most happy conceptions. Fables and other fictions are in general the reflection of truth, a little heightened in color, indeed, from the prismatic medium through which they have been transmitted. Imagination even of the wildest description must, like a bird, touch earth before it commence its flight. It is a natural and useful curiosity which prompts men to investigate the point from which genius sets out, for the purpose of measuring its flight, and of judging the height to which it has soared. Sometimes it condescends to admit us to its confidence, convinced that it can lose nothing by the disclosure, and this has very frequently been the case of late years—witness Scott and others. But much other genius only presents us with the finished edifice, carefully removing every trace of the scaffolding and other materials by which it had been reared; much oftener does it designedly efface its steps, and hide from us the path which it has taken from the real to the ideal world. Rousseau has left us in ignorance whether his Heloise was a pure fiction, and Saint Pierre, his friend and disciple, has designedly cast a mysterious veil over the historical parts of his beautiful pastoral. Time, however, which discovers most things, has at length lifted that veil. It is now more than a century ago that one of the French East India Company's ships was lost off the Isle of France, now called the Mauritius. Of the numerous crew on board, only nine men were saved, and they gave an account of the shipwreck before the tribunal of the island. The papers containing their depositions, after being buried amongst the local records for nearly a hundred years, were brought to light by the commandant of the island whilst it was under the dominion of France. The wrecked vessel was called the St. Geran, and it was on board the St. Geran that Saint Pierre has placed the sublime and touching circumstance of the death of Virginia. It is interesting to observe how the tradition, which was preserved in the Isle of France, has become, in the hands of a great writer, the foundation of so admirable a work. A young lady was, in fact on board the St. Geran, and perished there, together with a young naval officer, who resolved to share her fate. The ridiculous scruple of the captain of the vessel, who refused to strip off his clothes saying that it was not consistent with his rank to reach the shore without his uniform, and that he had papers in his pocket, the possession of which he could not part with, has been transferred by the author to the heroine of the shipwreck, and has furnished one of the most forcible and original situations of his prose poem. By substituting the enthusiasm of a female for the susceptibility of a seaman, he has rendered the fiction more morally true than the truth itself—he has certainly made it much more consistent with every-day human nature. This is a striking example of the power which a superior mind possesses of transferring the events of the world to the dominion of imagination, and of becoming as much a creator as is compatible with nature and resemblance.—Chambers'

Aaron Lord, formerly of Ipswich, Mass., fell dead in the streets of Lynn on Thursday last.

FEMALE PIETY.

The gem of all others which adorns the coronet of female loveliness, is unaffected piety. The grace of her mien, the fascination of her countenance, her nobleness of heart, her prime intelligence and enviable intellect, are the happiness of man. Piety added, throws a garb of holiness over every action, frightens the shining intellect, adds gentleness to the heart, and in the voice of earthly love, it mingles the bliss of heaven. Without it, woman can bring darkness and death upon mankind; with it she is the enlightening orb of earth, the blessed gift of heaven; to whom the virtuous the good and the great pay homage. Then ye, who were designed as the guiding star of man to heaven, to other graces and piety of heart. It will strew flowers in your pathway through the journey of life, and even in the hour of dissolution, it will be to your soul the light of life and glory.

MAHOMETAN CREED.

A catechism was sometime ago printed at Constantinople for the instruction of children in the Mahometan religion. It forms a copious commentary on the tenets of Islamism. The principal articles to which the young Musselman is required to give his assent, are compromised in the following declarations:—"I believe in the books which have been delivered from Heaven to the prophets. In this manner was the Koran given to Mahomet, the Pentateuch to Moses, the Psalter to David, and the Gospel to Jesus. I believe in the Prophets, and the Miracles which they performed. Adam was the first Prophet, and Mahomet the last. I believe that for the space of fifty thousand years, the righteous shall repose under the shade of the terrestrial paradise; and that the wicked shall be exposed naked with the burning rays of the sun. I believe in the bright Sirat, which passes over the bottomless pit of Hell: It is as fine as a hair, and sharp as a sabre. All must pass over it, and the wicked shall be thrown off. I believe in the water pools of Paradise. Each of the prophets has in Paradise a basin for his own use; the water is whiter than milk, and sweeter than honey. On the ridges of the pools are vessels to drink out of, and they are bordered with stars. I believe in Heaven and Hell. The inhabitants of the former know no want, and the Houris who attend them, are never afflicted with sickness. The floor of Paradise is musk, the stones are silver, and the cement gold. The damned are on the contrary, tormented with fire, and by voracious and poisonous animals."

Necessity of Rest for the Eyes.—It will be well whenever it can be accomplished, to give the eyes rest for a while after eating, especially if our occupation obliges to sit. The bad effects of an opposite line of conduct may be daily seen in the red faces, livid lips, and bloodshot eyes, of those who either think intensely, or strain the sight soon after meals. After all employments that tend to inflame the passions, as pleading, lecturing, debating, &c. rest to the sight is absolutely essential to its preservation in old age; for the blood being more heated than usual, and flowing to the head in excess, unfits the eyes for exertions; and will, if persevered in, produce the most painful consequences, of which I might enumerate many cases in every profession exposed to such influences.—Curtis on the Sight.

Mrs. KENNEY.—This lady has become so notorious, as a husband killer, that we suppose the following sketch of her, from a Lowell paper, will not prove unacceptable.

Mrs. Kenney's maiden name was Hannah Hanson. She was first married to Mr. Witham, from whom, after giving birth to four children, she was divorced.—She is said to have been assisted, in obtaining her divorce, by Mr. George F. Kenney, with whom she had been intimate, and to whom she was said to be engaged. She was afterwards married to her cousin, Rev. Enoch W. Freeman, of this city. There was much objection among the members of Mr. Freeman's Society, to his marrying her, on account of her reputation, but it was as ineffectual as opposition to a person's will, in such matters generally is. It is said that after Mr. Freeman was married, Mr. Kenney was in the habit of visiting at his house. We are informed that he was in Lowell on the morning of the day that Mr. Freeman was taken sick.

Mr. Freeman was taken ill, between meetings, on Sunday, Sept. 20 1835, and vomited several times. He went into his pulpit, however, in the afternoon, and commenced the services, but was unable to proceed with them, and returned to his house. He continued to grow worse and suffered exceedingly, with unequivocal symptoms of inflammation of the stomach, until five o'clock on Tuesday morning, when he expired, one year and one day from the time he was married.

Mrs. Freeman appeared to be much affected by his death. A post mortem examination, was made, the stomach was found to have been highly inflamed; but as no suspicions of poison were then entertained by his physician, no chemical analysis of it was had.

We have already remarked that his marriage occasioned some division in the church. Just as he closed his eyes in death, he was asked if he had any advice to leave his people. He replied; "Tell them to be humble, faithful, zealous, united in love." His dying counsel has since been placed over the pulpit in the Meeting House where he preached.

Mrs. Freeman afterwards kept a Milliner's shop on Merrimac street in this city. She is said to be good looking and exceedingly fascinating in her manner, or rather, as an acquaintance of her's said to us this morning "in her eyes."

Although it has long been the opinion of many who know her, that she was the cause of her husband's death, she has been used to speak of him with much apparent feeling, and would sometimes weep when conversing about him.

Mrs. Freeman is said to have lived with Mr. Kenney sometime in Boston, before she married him.

The account of his sudden death, and the fact the arsenic was found in his stomach, are already well known.

A handsome marble monument, with a granite base, has been erected over Mr. Freeman's grave, and by its side is a weeping willow, which was sent by his widow, after her removal to Boston, to be placed there. The following is the inscription on his monument.

"Rev. Enoch W. Freeman, Pastor of the First Baptist Church and Society in Lowell. Died Sept. 22, 1835, aged 37 years."

We saw Mr. Freeman's remains after they were exhumed, on Monday evening, Aug. 17th. They were in a remarkable state of preservation. They had turned black, and shrunk somewhat, but one of the physicians who was present, said that he had seen a subject used for illustrating lectures on anatomy, which was farther advanced in putrefaction.

We have heard a report, which if true, furnishes another curious link in the chain of circumstances which are now becoming developed. It is said that after Mr. Freeman's marriage, his father who resided in Maine, died very suddenly, while Mr. Freeman and his wife were making him a visit.

The Duel Case.—The trial of Mr. H. Throuet for killing P. Proue in a duel, which, from the peculiar circumstances attending it, has excited so much interest, was continued yesterday. A jury was empanelled and the witnesses were examined. We give the substance of the testimony.

Mr. Proue, the deceased, sent Mr. Throuet, an insulting challenge, which was accepted. The terms of the combat were arranged by the seconds. The parties were placed back to back, at the distance of five paces, with a pistol in each hand, at the word "go," they were to wheel and fire at will. The first shot was simultaneous and neither was injured. As Proue was raising his second pistol, it was discharged accidentally into the air. Throuet continued his aim, but some of the spectators cried "shame," it is murder" &c., and he let his weapon fall by his side. The seconds rebuked the spectators, declared the terms had been so arranged that the parties could fire when they pleased, and that every thing was fair. Proue's own second was especially earnest, and Throuet was directed to fire by the deceased himself. He raised his pistol, fired, and Proue fell dead.

HISTORICAL.

From the Knickerbocker

THE 'ROBINSON HOUSE';

OR REMINISCENCE OF WEST-POINT AND ARNOLD THE TRAITOR.

BY A MEMBER OF THE 'BOARD OF VISITERS.'

Benedict Arnold was a native of Connecticut; and the brick building in which he once kept store, although time-worn and decayed, is still standing at New-Haven, near the harbor, with one end overgrown with ivy, and in the garret is the sign he then used.—No officer of the American army stood higher than he in the confidence of the government, and the love of the people, prior to that dark period, when, plotting the ruin of his oppressed country, he effected his own and exchanged for ever the bright and spotless inheritance of a soldier's fame, for the withering curse of a nation's contempt, and the unending infamy of a traitor's name, which living, haunted every hour of his life, and will be fresh in the history of all future time.

All writers agree that the deep pecuniary embarrassments of Arnold, into which his love of pleasure and great extravagance had led him, were the leading motives that impelled him to the fearful step. Ramsay informs us that 'the generosity of the States did not keep pace with the extravagance of their favorite officer. A sumptuous table and expensive equipage, unsupported by the resources of private fortune, ungarded by the virtues of economy, and good management, soon increased his debts beyond a possibility of discharging them. His love of pleasure produced the love of money; and that extinguished all sensibility to the obligations of honor and duty. The calls of luxury were pressing, and demanded gratification, although at the expense of fame and country. Contracts were made, speculations entered into, and partnership instituted, which could not bear investigation. Oppression, extortion misapplication of public money and property, furnished him with the farther means of gratifying his favorite passions. In these circumstances, a change of sides afforded the only hope of evading a scrutiny, and at the same time held out a prospect of replenishing his exhausted coffers.

In the midst of his desperation, his funds gone, detection unavoidable, he resolved to unburden his griefs to the French envoy; and mingling in their detail the 'ingratitude' of his country, to seek from the sympathy of a foreigner the means to retrieve his shattered fortunes. The application was not only unsuccessful, but was rejected with such disdain, and accompanied with such bitter rebuke, as to add greatly to the desperation of Arnold. Thus baffled and mortified, he was at last driven, by his impetuous feelings into the fatal project of selling his country; that country which had heaped honor after honor upon him, with prodigal kindness; which had given him birth, and placed his name high upon the roll of her great and distinguished men; whose shores were covered with a mercenary foe, seeking her subjugation; that country in fine, whose soldiery were barefoot and starving amid the storms of winter, and which, poor in every thing but her reliance on God, her valor, and the bravery of her people, had no hoarded gold with which to win back to love and duty the traitor to her standard and her righteous cause.

After the British evacuated Philadelphia, many families were left, who were disaffected toward the Americans, and among others, that of Mr. Edward Shippen, afterward Chief Justice of Pennsylvania. His beautiful and accomplished daughter had been the 'toast' of all the British officers, of whom none stood higher in the estimation of the family than Major JOHN ANDRE. With him Miss Shippen was in the habit of constant and friendly correspondence. Arnold was not an unmoved spectator of the young lady's beauty and worth; and having made an offer of his hand and heart, was accepted, and thus entered a family hostile to his country, and whose interest and pleasure it would naturally be, to win from the cause of the 'rebels' to that of the king one so well known to fame. The acquaintance with Major Andre commenced at this time; and even then the determination of Arnold was formed, to make Andre the instrument by which the hellish plot was to be consummated. Arnold had been for some time leading an inactive life, having been excused from duty, owing to the wounds he had received; but he suddenly became anxious for active service in the field. His first effort was to procure at the hands of Gen. WASHINGTON the command of West Point, then universally esteemed the most important military post in the country. He succeeded in this, and established his headquarters at 'Beverly' or 'Robinson House,' on the eastern side of the Hudson river, about two miles below West Point. This place had belonged to one Beverly Robinson, who having taken up arms with the British against his country, forfeited his property. The main part of the army was at this time down the Hudson between 'Dobbs' Ferry' and Tappan. General La Fayette had employed, at his own expense, in New York, several spies, who were to furnish him secret intelligence of the movements of the enemy. Arnold applied to him for their names and address, on the pretence that they could communicate with him with greater facility, and he would then send the information to La Fayette; but the request was promptly refused, as some old-fashioned notions of honor seemed to forbid it. Arnold, after his marriage, encouraged Mrs. Arnold in keeping up the correspondence with Major Andre, and thus, although unknown to herself, the devoted wife was made one of the tools by which American liberty was to be crushed. In a little time Arnold commenced a direct correspondence with Andre, the letters of the former being signed 'Gustavus,' and of the latter, 'John Anderson.' For some time Sir Henry Clinton did not know the real author; but he soon became satisfied, from a chain of circumstances, that it was General Arnold. The grand project of securing West Point, with all its dependant posts, stores, and property, was of such vast importance, that Sir Henry Clinton deemed no expense or trouble too great to effect it. It being now known to the British commander that Arnold was in fact the person with whom the correspondence commenced, measures were taken to perfect the details of the system of villany which he proposed. Arnold requested that Major Andre should be the person to hold communication with him, and Clinton accordingly deputed him.

Major John Andre was intended for commercial life, and had entered upon its busy employments; but the abrupt and sad termination of his addresses to a young English lady, whose father forbade the union, drove him to the excitement of military life; and, forsaking England, he sought in the fascination of military glory, a forgetfulness of his bitter fate. He was taken prisoner of war soon after he entered the army; and when so: rched, he concealed in his mouth a miniature of his love, which in happier days his own pencil had sketched, and which in distant lands and amidst other scenes, he wore as memory's talisman; the silent, though still loved companion of life's weary pilgrimage. He was a most graceful, elegant, and accomplished gentleman, and ripe scholar; passionately fond of the fine arts, and a finished master of painting and drawing. He was the favorite of the whole army, and into every domestic circle was welcomed as a friend and brother.—Such was the man selected to conduct the delicate and dangerous negotiation, which had for its unholy aim the base surrender of America; such the man with whose aid Benedict Arnold was to strike a blow at the heart of that country, under whose 'stripes and stars' he had fought Freedom's battles; from whose glory fields he had borne away the wounds and scars which are the soldier's best certificates, and the mute pleaders for a country's gratitude.

It was the original intention of Arnold to receive Andre within the lines, at his own Head Quarters, and to arrange there the whole plan of operations. At that time, part of the army was stationed at Salem, a town on the eastern side of the Hudson, some distance from the river, and under the command of Colonel Sheldon. He had been told by General Arnold that he expected a person from New-York whom he wished to meet at Sheldon's quarters, and desired instant notice of his arrival. A letter was then written, informing Andre of this arrangement: to this he replied, in the enigmatical style which distinguished all their correspondence, that he would be at 'Dobbs' Ferry' at a certain time. Arnold left West Point in the afternoon of the tenth of September, went down the river in his barge to 'King's Ferry,' passed the night at the house of Joshua Smith, and went early next morning down to 'Dobbs' Ferry.' Andre had arrived the night before, but not finding Arnold, and fearing mistake, he returned to New York. Another meeting was fixed for the 20th. Arnold then wrote to Major Tallmadge, commandant at one of the out-posts, that if a man calling himself 'John Anderson' arrived at his station, to send him without delay to Head-Quarters, escorted by two dragoons. Sir Henry Clinton, in order to afford means of easier intercourse and escape, had sent Colonel Beverly Robinson up the river, in the sloop of war Vulture, with orders to stop at 'Teller's Point.' A letter from the Vulture, addressed to General Putnam, (known not to be there,) reached Arnold, and was of course understood to apprise him that Andre was on board.

On that very day, and but a few hours after the boat had carried the letter on shore, General Washington and his suite crossed the Hudson at 'Kings Ferry,' in Arnold's barge, the Vulture then in full view below; and while Washington was viewing her with his glass, Arnold is said to have betrayed great uneasiness. It is worthy of remark, that before Andre left New York, he was expressly ordered by Sir Henry Clinton not to change his dress, nor to go within the American lines, and on no account to take any papers.

Arnold employed a man by the name of Joshua Smith to aid him generally in the prosecution of his plan, although it is now generally believed that he never did communicate to Smith the purpose he had in view. Smith was to bring Andre on shore from the Vulture, and 'Smith's house,' in case of ultimate necessity, was to be the place of negotiation. At Arnold's request, Smith sent all his family away except the servants.—Being furnished with a boat and pass, and assisted by two brothers by the name of Colqhoun, who were forced very reluctantly to go, he went off to the Vulture, with orders to bring Mr. Anderson on shore.—The oars were muffled, the night was tranquil and serene; the stars shone brightly above them; the water was calm and unruffled; and the gentle air floated mildly by. The work of treason went noiselessly on, and the whispers of conscience found no echo, save in the heart were they originated.

Smith was shown into the cabin of the Vulture, into which soon after Colonel Robinson brought a man, whom he introduced as Mr. Anderson. He was in full uniform, but over it he wore a blue travelling coat. They left the Vulture, and landed at the foot of a mountain called the 'Long Clove,' on the west margin of the river, about six miles below 'Stony Point.' The exact spot for the first interview had been fixed, and to this place Arnold had ridden from Smith's house. And there, in the darkness of night, amid its stillness and gloom, stood the arch-traitor of America, and the flower of England's chivalry! It was a picture worthy of a master pencil. At their feet lay the mighty but tranquil Hudson; above and around them, were the towering monuments of God's omnipotence, that 'Proclaim the eternal Architect on high,

Who stamps on all his works his own eternity.'

This conference was continued the greater part of the night; and when the wasting of the tide, and the near approach of day-light, was urged by Smith as a reason for its termination, the parties agreed to proceed to 'Smith's House.' The boat was sent off, and Andre and Andre proceeded on horseback. Near the house, the challenge of a sentinel gave Andre the unwelcome and startling intelligence that he was within the American lines; but it was too late to retreat. The recollection of the positive orders of Sir Henry Clinton was vivid and distant; but more time was necessary to accomplish the great object of his mission; and he dared the peril, with the cherished belief that he was serving acceptably the cause of his king and country.

Soon after the parties had reached Smith's, a heavy cannonading was heard down the river, which proved to be against the 'Vulture,' and caused her to change her position. After breakfast, Arnold and Andre were left together; and in the course of the day the nefarious scheme was finished, and the conditions settled.—But so secret were all the proceedings, that to this hour the veil has never been entirely removed from the transaction. The grave has closed over the actors in the great drama. Fancy has run wild with conjecture, yet the minute details have not transpired, and never can. Enough, however, is known to verify the truth of Walpole's remark, that 'every man has his price:' how derogatory soever to the nobler feelings of our nature, it yet found its practical illustration in the miserable Arnold. Various conjectures have been indulged as to the price paid by the British; and the better opinion seems to be, (but even that is little else than conjecture,) that he received ten thousand pounds sterling, in exchange for that brilliant reputation, which the wealth of a world ought to have been insufficient to purchase.

Andre was then furnished with the following papers; I. Artillery orders, recently published at West Point, recting the disposition of each corps in case of alarm. II. An estimation of the American force at West Point and its dependencies. III. An estimate of the number of men requisite to man the works. IV. A return of the ordnance of the different forts, redoubts, and batteries. V. Remarks on the works at West Point, describing the construction of each, and its strength or weakness. VI. A Report of a Council of War lately held at Head Quarters, containing hints respecting the probable operations of the campaign, and which had been sent by General Washington to Arnold, a few days before, requesting his opinion on the subjects to which it referred. These papers were all in the handwriting of Arnold, and bore his signature! At Arnold's request, the papers were all put by Andre between his feet and stockings, and in the event of detection, were to be destroyed. It was then farther arranged, that Andre was to return immediately to New York; that the British troops already embarked under the pretext of an expedition to the Chesapeake, were, to be ready at a moment's warning to ascend the river; the post at West Point was to be weakened by such a disposition of its troops as would leave no adequate force for its defence: as soon as it was known to Arnold that the British troops were coming up the river, parties of soldiers were to be sent out from the garrison to certain distant points, under pretence of meeting the enemy, while the British landed, and were to march upon the undefended garrison by other and different routes. These details being all arranged, Andre was furnished with several different passes, to be used in case of emergency. The next question was, how he should get back to New York? Andre insisted that he should be put on board the Vulture, but to this Smith interposed so many serious obstacles, that the matter was still unsettled when Arnold and Andre parted—to meet no more on this side of the grave.

After Arnold had departed, Smith positively refused to incur the hazard of rowing down to the Vulture; and much to the chagrin and disappointment of Andre, he was compelled to adopt the only alternative, a journey back by land. Smith agreed to accompany him until he should have passed beyond the American posts. Arnold had, after much difficulty, prevailed on Andre to exchange his military for citizen's dress. Smith was still the dupe of Arnold's cunning. He neither knew the rank, the name, nor the business of his illustrious guest; and when, with the natural curiosity which such an occurrence would arouse, he inquired why a man coming in a civil capacity, and on commercial business, should be dressed in full uniform, he was told it was Mr. Anderson's ambition to be considered a man of consequence, and that he had borrowed from an acquaintance the military costume in which he appeared; but now that he was compelled to return by land, a citizen's dress would be obviously more proper. With this plausible reasoning, Smith was so well satisfied, that he furnished Andre from his own wardrobe with the necessary apparel. Just before sunset, he and Smith, accompanied by a negro servant of the latter, proceeded to 'King's Ferry,' and crossed the River from 'Stony Point' to 'Verplank's Point.' In pursuing the route which was considered most safe, they met with many of Smith's acquaintances, with whom he drank and joked, but suffered no interruption until near Crompond, where they were hailed by the sentinel of a patrolling party, by whose captain they were examined. The pass signed by Arnold was produced, and ended all farther delay; but the worthy captain of the guard was so urgent that they should not incur the personal danger of farther travel that night, that Smith resolved, greatly to the annoyance of Andre, to stop, and in the humble cottage of Andreas Miller, an honest old farmer, they found rest for the night.

Early in the morning, they proceeded on the road leading to Pine's Bridge, and about two miles beyond it partook of a frugal breakfast at the house of a good

Dutch woman, who, though plundered by the marauders, was enabled to spread before them a repast of hasty-pudding and milk, accompanied, we doubt not, with an honest welcome, and a woman's blessing.—After breakfast, Smith divided with Andre his small stock of paper money, took his final leave, and with his servant returned to Peekskill, and thence to Fishkill, whither he had sent his family during the memorable scenes that had occurred at his house. On his way back, he took occasion to call at 'Beverly,' dined with General Arnold, and gave him full account of Mr. Anderson's progress, and where he had left him. When Smith and Andre parted, it was understood that Andre would pursue the route through 'White Plains,' avoiding the river roads, and thus reach New York; but instead of that, he turned off toward the Hudson, taking the Tarrytown road.

It so happened, that the same morning on which Andre passed Pine's Bridge, seven persons, who resided near the Hudson, on the neutral ground, agreed to go out in company and watch the road, to intercept any suspicious stragglers, or droves of cattle, that might be passing toward New York. Three of this party, John Paulding, David Williams, and Isaac Van Wart, were concealed near the road, in the bushes. About half a mile north of Tarrytown, and a few hundred yards from the Hudson, the road crosses a small brook, from each side of which the ground rises into a hill, which at that time was covered over with trees and underbrush. At this point Major Andre was stopped.—After an examination of his passports, he was suffered to proceed; but immediately after, one of the men, thinking that he perceived something singular in his appearance, called him back. Andre asked them where they were from: 'From down below,' they replied; meaning from New York. Too frank to suspect a snare, Andre answered, 'And so am I.' He was then closely searched, and the papers found concealed in his stockings. They were examined, and Paulding said, 'He is a spy.' Andre made the most liberal offers to his captors but in vain. He was carried by them a prisoner to North Castle, one of the American posts, and there surrendered to Colonel Jameson, the officer in command.

As a reward for the virtuous and patriotic conduct of Paulding, Williams, and Van Wart, Congress voted to each an annuity for life of two hundred dollars, and a silver medal, having on one side a shield, inscribed "FIDELITY," and on the other motto, Vincit amor patriæ.

THE GATHERER.

KING EDWARDS CHAIR.

King Edward's chair (commonly called St. Edward's chair) is a very ancient chair of solid hard wood, with back and sides of the same, variously painted, in which the Kings of Scotland were heretofore constantly crowned, but being brought out of that kingdom by the victorious Prince, King Edward I. in the 24th year of his reign, Anno 1296, after he had totally overcome John Baliol, King of Scots; it hath ever since remained in the abbey of Westminster, and has been the Royal chair in which the succeeding Kings and Queens of this realm have been inaugurated. It is in height six feet seven inches, in breadth at the bottom thirty eight inches, and in depth twenty-four inches; from the seat to the bottom is twenty-five inches.

A plain spoken gentleman being asked his opinion as to a compromise between two parties, replied, "that a little conciliation and concession might do wonders; but if one party was determined to be dogmatical, and the other cat-egorical, nothing better could be expected then worrying and scratching."

In a neighboring village lived a very honest, wealthy farmer, who having a number of hirelings hoeing in a field went one day, about eleven o'clock, to see how his work went on. Finding one of them sitting still, he reproved him for his idleness. The man answered 'I thirst for the Spirit.'—'Grog, you mean, I suppose,' says the farmer: 'but if the good book teaches you to thirst after the spirit, it says also, "Hoe! every one that thirsteth."

THE UGLY WIFE OR A GIBBET.

In the 17th century, the greater part of the property lying upon the river Ettrick, belonging to Scott of Harden, who made his principal residence at Oakwood-Tower, a border house of strength, still remaining upon that river, William Scott, (afterwards Sir William,) son of the head of this undertook an expedition against the Murrys Elibank, whose property lay at a few miles distance. He found his enemy upon their guard, was defeated and made prisoner in the act of driving off the cattle, which he had collected for that purpose.—Our hero, Sir Gideon Murray, conducted his prisoner to the castle, where his lady received him with congratulations upon his victory, and enquiries concerning the fate to which he had destined his prisoner:—"The gallows," answered sir Gideon, for he is said already to have acquired the honor of knighthood, "to the gallows with the marauder."—"Hoot na, sir Gideon," answered the considerate matron in her vernacular idiom, "wad ye hang the winsome young Laird of Harden, when ye have three ill-favoured daughters to marry?"—"Right, right," answered the Baron, who caught at the idea, "he shall either marry our daughter, mickle-mouthed Meg, or strap for it." Upon this alternative being proposed to the prisoner, he, upon the first offer, stoutly preferred the gibbet to mickle-mouthed Meg; for such was the nick-name of the young lady, whose real name was Agnes. But at length, when he was literally led forth to execution, and saw no other chance of escape, he retracted his ungallant resolution, and preferred the typical noose of matrimony to the literal cord of hemp. Such is the tradition established in both families, and often jocularly referred to on the border. It may be necessary to add, that mickle-mouthed Meg and her husband were a very happy pair, and had a very large family, to each of whom Sir William Scott bequeathed good estates, besides reserving a large one for the eldest.—London paper.

THE POWER OF TRUTH.

Diderot (says the Abbe Baruel) was one of the gang of conspirators against the Christian Religion. He not only professed Atheism, but made a boast of it and inculcated it in his writings. He was invited to Russia by the empress Catherine, who at first admired his genius, but soon found sufficient reason in his conduct and principles to send him back to France.

But there were moments in which this professed admirer and friend of Voltaire, notwithstanding his avowed impiety, seems to have been compelled by the force of truth to pay homage to the New Testament. An acquaintance found him one day explaining a chapter of it to his daughter, with all the apparent seriousness and energy of a believer: on expressing his surprise, Diderot replied, "I understand your meaning, but after all, where is it possible to find better lessons for her instruction?" The Devils believe and tremble!

Cibber is said to have visited Booth, when he knew that he was at home, but the female domestic denied him: Colly took no notice of it at the time, but, in a few days, when Booth visited him in return, he called out that he was not at home. How can that be! (replied Booth) do I not hear your voice? To be sure you do, says Cibber, but what then? I believed your servant maid, and it is hard indeed if you wont believe me.

Garriek attending the rehearsal of Venice Preserved, when a new actress highly recommended to him was to make her debut in Belvedere, she repeated that tender exclamation, "Would you kill my father, Jaffier?" with so much sang froid in her voice and countenance, that, after several attempts to set her right, he whispered her, nearly in the same tone, "Can you chop cabbage, Madam?"

A fire happening at a public house, a fellow in the crowd constantly importuned the engineer to play against the wainscot. On being told it was in no danger, "I am sorry for that," said he, "for I have a long score upon it, I shall never be able to pay."

AWKWARDNESS.—The Picayune says, there are four things that look very awkward in a woman, viz; to see her undertake to whistle, to throw a stone at a hog, to smoke a cigar, and to climb over a garden fence.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, SEPT. 12, 1840.

LATE FOREIGN NEWS.—The arrival of the Alexander, brings intelligence two days later than has been received. There is still a prospect of war with France. The Chinese were actively engaged in making preparations for defence. Volunteers were invited and encouraged to join the celestial army. It was generally believed that the campaign would open by the bombardment of Canton. The Lord William Bartwick, from London, and the Lord Castlereagh, from Karsack, were wrecked off Bombay Harbor, on the 17th of June, 28 of the crew and officers of the former, 7 passengers of the 11, and 65 soldiers were lost, and only 90 of the 200 persons on board the Lord Castlereagh were saved. The Arabs had made an attack upon Aden, but had been repulsed. The Paris papers continue to be filled with the state of affairs, to which the policy of Lord Palmerston had given rise. With a single exception, the most complete unanimity prevails among the French Journalists. Every epithet which contempt or resentment can suggest, is levelled at the head of the English minister, and every thing laudatory is bestowed on the head of M. Thiers, for his firmness in vindicating the national honor. The Liverpool papers sneer at the idea of France pretending to assume an attitude hostile towards the combined powers of England, Austria, and Russia. They believe the whole affair will evaporate in words, and anticipate a speedy understanding between all parties.

THE NORTHWEST TRAGEDY.—The President of the American Fur Company has received from A. Robertson, Esq. one of the agents of that company, at St. Louis, a detailed statement of the circumstances of the death of Messrs. Simpson, Bird and De Gros, by the hand of the first named in the Northwest Territory.

The New York Sun says, that there is at present in that city a gang of blacklegs who, under the guise of merchants, establish stores and purchase goods, giving each other as references and endorsers, with the sole object of defrauding and swindling those whom they may dupe.

It has been ascertained that the authors of a portion of the fires on the Canada side of the line, recently, did not come from the United States side. They were Canadian villains, and are under arrest.

DEATH OF GEN HINDS.—This venerable patriot died in Mississippi, by the rupture of a blood vessel, on the 23d. Gen. H took an active part in the battle of New Orleans.

The livery stables of Mr. Albert Parria, at Washington city, were consumed on Sunday night, together with six valuable horses, and the entire contents of the buildings. Loss about $3000.

The amount received for tolls on the New York State Canals, during the last week in August, is sixty seven thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine dollars and sixty-one cents.

MILL BURNT.—"Spaldings Mill," at the village of Niagara, owned by Judge Hunt, of that place, and ex-Gov. Marcy, was consumed a few days since. It was valued at $30,000, and was insured for half the amount.

A child ten years of age was on Monday accidentally drowned in a tub having but eight inches of water in it, at Philadelphia.

The New York American says that it is reported that "Mr John Smith has met with various difficulties of various kinds." When a generous public, have become sufficiently acquainted with the positive sufferings of Mr. John Smith, there will no doubt be extended to him, as well as to Mr. Thomson, and Mr. Jones, the sympathies of the American people. P. S. Mr. Smith authorises us to say that he is incapable of the last charge brought against him.

A gentleman in the city of New Orleans has succeeded in cultivating on his plantation, citron, lemons and oranges of the very finest quality, both as regard size and flavor. He is also directing his attention to the cultivation of West India fruits generally.

DISTRESSING OCCURRENCE.—The Portland Daily Advertiser, gives an account of the drowning of five young ladies, while on a sailing excursion. The ladies had gone into the cuddy of the boat, to avoid the heat of the sun, and while there, a white squall struck the boat, when about 100 rods from the land, and she went down stern foremost. Those above were saved.

The Portland Argus, says, "Yesterday afternoon, the five young ladies who were drowned on Tuesday, were entombed. Two of them from the residences of their parents, and three (Mr. Ilseley's daughters and Julia Plumer) from the residence of their grandfather, Mr. David Potengill. A very large concourse of people assembled to witness the melancholy obsequies of the three that were to be interred together. The funeral services were performed by the Rev. Dr. Nichols, of the 1st Unitarian Church. The coffins were conveyed to the tomb on three hearses (a sight seldom seen in our city) and were followed by carriages containing the relatives, and then by nearly three hundred people in couples mostly those in the morning of life. Thousands also lined the streets on either side, and accompanied the procession to the graves; where as many more were waiting to receive it. The spacious burying yard was as it were, covered with spectators. A sadness pervaded the faces of all, at the melancholy sight which they had come to witness. As the tomb closed over the mortal remains of those maidens, who, less than forty-eight hours before bid as fair for long life as any of the thousands who lingered at their tomb,—how forcibly came to mind that oft illustrated truth—Boast not thyself of to-morrow, for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth."

INTELLIGENCE.

A Confirmed Thief.—The Richmond Star mentions the case of a young man in that city respectably connected, who successively entered the two Baptist churches in that city, and stole the Bibles, which he afterwards sold. He was committed to prison, and was scarcely in there an hour before he stole 37½ cents from a fellow prisoner.

LATER FROM THE EXPLORING EXPEDITION.—A letter has been received in town, from the ship Vincennes, dated Bay of Islands, N. Zealand, April 7, which says that the French cannot longer contend for the honor of discovering the Antarctic Continent, as the Porpoise made the discovery some days before either the French or the Vincennes. The V. was on the point of sailing for Tongataboo, thence to Fegees, then to the Sandwich Islands, where she was expected to arrive in July on her way to the Northwest Coast,

THE WELLAND CANAL.—Information communicated to us by Henry E. Eagle, Esq. who left Oswego on Thursday evening last, makes it certain that the report of Welland Canal being blown up, which crosses Chippewa Creek, as copied from the Rochester Democrat, is incorrect. Letters from Oswego of the 4th inst. make no mention of it; and what removes all doubt is, that vessels which left Cleveland, Ohio, on Friday previous, arrived at Oswego on Wednesday last having passed the Aqueduct reported to be blown up by Lett.

A man by the name of Patridge, upon the farm of the late Seth Pierce, in Penfield, Monroe county, was terribly wounded by a threshing machine, yesterday forenoon, in consequence of his frock being caught in the machine. Nearly every accident which has occurred by these machine, has happened in consequence of the length of the dress usually worn by farmers, when cleaning wheat, which should be a warning to others.—Rochester Whig.

Mrs. KINNEY.—Mrs Kinney, charged with the murder of her husband, was brought before the Police Court this afternoon, and on motion of the Attorney General was committed for trial before the Supreme Judicial Court, to be held in this city on the 2d of November next. A number of witnesses were required to reconize for their appearance at the trial.—Boston Merc. Journal of Monday.

On Monday last as Mr. Noff, his wife and a young woman and infant, were descending a hill near Easton (Pa.) the horse ran off while Mr. N. was adjusting the reins. Mrs. Noff was precipitated from the wagon and instantly killed, and Mr. N. severely bruised—the young woman leaped from the wagon and saved herself and the infant without injury.

LUCKY ESCAPE.—On Thursday evening last, a very interesting child, five years old, a son of Scotch parents, on going on board the tow boat, fell into the dock, and was in the water an hour or more before he was extricated. His cries were heard under one of the bridges of pier No. 5, under which he had been carried by the tide. As a small boat could not pass under, he was rescued by cutting away some of the floating planks, and discovered, by the aid of candles, floating almost lifeless. By the application of hot blankets, friction and other remedies, the child so far recovered as to go with his parents on Saturday for the West.—Courier.

HYDROPHOBIA.—We have an account in the Free Press of Carrollton, Ohio, August 28, of a death in Carroll County, about a week before, from this horrible malady. The sufferer was Andrew Shultz, of Pekin, who had one of his fingers slightly bitten by his own dog, some three or four months before. The Free Press states that the bite excited no alarm at the time, and was soon forgotten, until three days before his death, when Mr. S. exhibited the most alarming symptoms of madness. He was seized with paroxysms, which increased in violence till the third day, when he expired, the Press says, "in a manner so horrible to be described."

A master assassinated by his slave.—Robert Bradford, esq., an old and respectable farmer near Nashville, Tenn., was stabbed and instantly killed on the 17th ult., by one of his negro men. He was preparing at the time to correct the negro for having left home without leave the week before. The murderer escaped.

Cannibals in Texas.—A late number of the Austin Gazette says,—"A few days ago a Comanche was killed on the Bushy, by some Tonkahua Indians—his hand and arms, and thick part of his thighs were cut off and carried home, as a feast to their women and children. The Tonkahuas made no secret of their partiality for human flesh, and state that all the native Indians in Texas, eat their enemies when they can catch them.

Fatal Accident.—As Mr. Joseph C. Vance of Wheeling, (a son of Ex-Governor Vance of Ohio,) was travelling with his father-in-law, S. Sprigg, esq., in a carriage near Steubenville, on Friday, the 27th ult., the horses ran off the road, and the carriage being precipitated down a steep bank, the gentlemen were thrown out, and Mr. Vance was taken up insensible, and continued until he died.—[Baltimore American.]

Louisville. (Ky.) Sept. 3.—Melancholy Accident.—As the row boat Ariel was returning with a party of ladies and gentlemen from a short excursion on Tuesday evening, in attempting to pass the bow of the ferry boat as that boat rounded to at the wharf, she came so near to the ferry boat, that one of the ladies, Miss Ainslee, was knocked overboard. Her body passed under the boat, and all efforts to save her was unavailing.—The coxswain of the row boat was also thrown into the river but he was not lost.

The unfortunate girl was found about three o'clock yesterday. Her skull was fractured by coming in contact with the anchor of the ferry boat.

ANOTHER DISTRESSING AFFAIR.—We learn that on Monday last, a collection of persons at Wilson's Corners were engaged in horse racing, when an accident of most singular nature took place.—Two horses, with their riders, started on a race from near the Corners. About the same time two others started from an opposite direction, both parties being unaware of the intention of the other. The horses coming together at full speed, two sheered, and passed, the other two in sheering unfortunately went the same way and came in contact. So severe was the concussion that both horses were instantly killed, and one of the riders William Blackburn, died in about two hours after; the other, Hugh Malvaugh, was so severely injured that he is not expected to live.—[Blackville (U. C.) Recorder.]

A NEW TRICK.—Bicknell's Reporter states that a counterfeiter has been passing through Ohio, who not only circulated fraudulent bills, but produced a counterfeit copy of "Bicknell's Reporter," by way of proving that they were good.

IMMIGRANTS.—48,492 passengers have arrived at this port from foreign countries, from the 1st January to the 1st inst.—which is 340 more than arrived during the whole of last year, and nearly double the number who arrived in all of 1838.

MEETING OF I. O. O. F.

At a meeting of the Members of City Union, and Washington Lodges of the I. O. O. F. held at Knickerbocker Hall, on Monday evening, Sept. 3th 1840—the meeting was called to order, by Br. P. V. Watson, on whose motion Br. J. W. Harcourt was called to the chair, and on motion of Br. Gregory, Br. Briare was appointed Secretary. The object of the meeting was then stated by the Chairman, when on motion of Br. J. W. Dean, a committee of three, consisting of Brs. Benjamin Briare, P. V. Watson, and D. Murray, were appointed to draft Resolutions expressive of the sense of this meeting. The meeting was then ably addressed by different Brs. of the Order, when the committee returned and reported the following Preamble and Resolutions, which was unanimously adopted:

Whereas, A number of members belonging to the City Union, and Washington Lodges of I. O. O. F. of this city, having become satisfied that the Lodges to which they severally belong are Spurious or Expelled Lodges, by the Grand Lodge of the United States, and disowned as Odd Fellows—and that said Lodges are governed by a few individuals who are determined that their own will shall become law; and that the Grand Lodge of the U. S. and of the State of New York shall bow to them, contrary to all Law or forms of Justice, Therefore

Resolved, That we will no longer be deceived by them as to our true interests, but petition the Grand Lodge now lawfully instituted in the city of New-York, to receive us again as Odd Fellows, and grant us a charter for a new Lodge, and that we will do all in our power to prohibit others from being deceived by the above Spurious Lodges as we have been.

Resolved, The late transactions of the Union Lodge in expelling members for charges preferred against them, which could not be substantiated, be held in utter contempt by all good Odd Fellows.

Resolved, That the Petition which we have in possession, for a new Lodge, to be located in the city of Albany, to be called NEW UNION LODGE No. —, be signed by all members present, who feel themselves aggrieved, and that a committee be appointed to procure the names of all the members of the above Spurious Lodges who feel disposed to go with us; and that it be attended to immediately and forwarded to the Grand Lodge located in the city of N. York:

The petition for a new Lodge to be located in this city was then presented to the meeting and thirty-nine Brs. came forward and signed their names. Brs. J. Aymer and J. Brooks of City Lodge, Brs. B. Briare and G. W. Stephens of Union Lodge, and Brs. J. W. Dean and P. V. Watson of Washington Lodge was appointed a committee to wait on Brethren in good standing in the City Union; and Washington Lodges, and give them an opportunity to sign their names to the petition and go with us. On motion of Br. Watson, the following resolution was passed unanimously.

Resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting together with the preamble and resolutions, be signed by the Chairman and Secretary, and published in the Albany Microscope, Masonic Register and Covenant.—There being no further business, the meeting adjourned to meet again at the same hour and place, on Monday evening, Sept. 14.

MELODY.

In song her voice is wildly swelling,
Strings repeat its every tone,
And I am held as in a bondage
'Round me now by angels thrown.

Yes—full its tide breaks o'er my spirit,
And electric through my frame
The thousand thrills of joy go raging,
Wrapping all of life in flame.

There is no thought but finds new power
Mingled with her burning strain,
And not a scene her soul hath gathered
But is pressed upon my brain!

See! now the skies are wrapped in splendor—
Now the gloom of night is there,
And all the storm-voiced clouds are pealing
With the anthems of despair.

And list that shriek of anguish piercing
Through the wild, remorseless blast!
A flash—a groan—ah! dark and sullen,
Death, stern death, is sweeping past.

Yet lo! again the skies are brightening—
All is calm—beneath—above,
And winds are hushed, as though they never Knew of aught but joy and love.

Ay—where but now lay sorrow bleeding,
Rapture's laughing looks appear;
And as in songs of youth's fond breathing,
Not a tone of grief is here!

And oh, my soul drinks in the feeling—
Quiet flows throughout my veins;
I wake to own how charmed a power
O'er me like a spirit reigns!

MASONIC HYMN.

In the Temple now appearing,
Brothers raise the pious song;
Each the sacred transport sharing,
Sound your voices loud and strong.
Hallelujah! Hallelujah! Hallelujah! Amen!

Now before the Altar bowing,
Soft and humble notes we sing;
Now our hearts with love o'erflowing,
Shout Jehovah, mighty King.
Hallelujah! Hallelujah! Hallelujah! Amen!

Lord attend us with thy favor,
Bless the work we have in view;
May each Brother's whole behaviour
Prove the Mason good and true.
Hallelujah! Hallelujah! Hallelujah! Amen!

Holy Father! let thy Spirit
Shed its light upon our Art;
Teach us to increase in merit,
Spread thy love through ev'ry heart.
Hallelujah! Hallelujah! Hallelujah! Amen!

THE MYSTIC WORD.

There is a word,
Which all have said and all must say—
Which breaks the bands of love apart,
And drives the dream of bliss away:
And e'en when youth all buoyant springs
Fresh into life, and gaily sings
Light as the wood-lark on the spray,
That dreaded word may then be said,
Sad as the anthem o'er the dead,

A word—that makes us sadly own
That all our dearest joys are vain,
Which bids us trace our steps alone
Upon the flinty path of pain:
Which uttered by the parting breath,
When the soul feels the chill of death

And cannot glow with life again,
Commands the tears of love to flow
For what hath been its joy below.

A—word that breaks the fond caress
Of youthful hearts in happy hours,
Which makes the world a wilderness
Devoid of verdure—sun—and flowers—
The blighted leaves bestrew the ground—
The fatal ivy wreathing round
O'er-shadowing the broken bowers
Whence once the rose and lilly grew,
And sparkled in the morning dew.

A—word that severs every tie
We fondly hope will last for aye—
Which dims the light of beauty's eye,
And chases all her smiles away:
Which marks affliction on her brow,
And wrings with pain her breasts of snow—
What word is this which all must say?
Youth, manhood, age, ye all can tell!
It is that fatal word, "FAREWELL!"

A SACRED MELODY.

BY W. LEGGETT.

If you bright stars which gem the night,
Be each a blissful dwelling sphere—
Where kindred spirits re-unite,
Whom death has torn asunder here;
How sweet it were at once to die,
And leave this blighted orb afar—
Mix soul and soul; to cleave the sky,
And soar away from star to star.

But oh! how dark, how drear, how lone
Would seem the brightest world of bliss.
If, wandering through each radiant one,
We failed to find the loved of this!
If there no more, the tie should twine,
Which death's cold hand alone can sever.
Ah! then these stars in mockery shine,
More hateful as they shine forever.

It cannot be! each hope and fear
That lights the eye or clouds the brow,
Proclaims there is a happier sphere
Than this bleak world that holds us now!
There is a voice which sorrow hears,
When heaviest weighs life's galling chain;
'Tis Heaven that whispers, 'Dry thy tears,
The pure in heart shall meet again!'

PRAYER.

Go, when the morning shineth,
Go, when the moon is bright,
Go, when the eve declineth,
Go, in the hush of night;
Go, with pure mind and feeling,
Flung early thoughts away,
And in thy chamber kneeling,
Do thou in secret pray.

Remember all who love thee,
All who are loved by thee;
Remember those who hate thee,
If any such there be;
Then for thyself in meekness,
A blessing humbly claim,
And link with each petition
Thy great Redeemer's name.

Or if 'tis e'er denied thee,
In solitude to pray,
Should holy thoughts come o'er thee,
When friends are round thy way,
E'en then the silent breathing
Of thy spirit raised above,
Will reach his throne of glory,
Who is Mercy, Truth and Love.

Oh! not a joy or blessing,
With this can we compare,
The power that he has given us
To pour our souls in prayer.
When'er thou pin'st in sadness,
Before His footstool fall,
And remember in thy gladness,
His grace who gave thee all.

DOMESTIC ECONOMY.

Prepared for the Masonic Register.

To preserve Clothes.—As clothes when laid up for a time, acquire an unpleasant odor, which requires a considerable exposure to the atmospheric air, will be prevented by laying recently made charcoal between the folds of the garments: even when the odor has taken place, the charcoal will absorb it.

To remove stains from mourning dresses.—Boil a good handful of fig leaves in two quarts of water till reduced to a pint. Bombazine, crape, cloth, &c. need only be rubbed with a sponge dipped in the liquor, and the effect will be instantly produced.

To warm beds.—Take all the black or blazing coals out of the pan, and scatter a little salt over the remainder: this will prevent the smell of sulphur, so disagreeable to delicate persons.

A substitute for milk and cream.—Beat up the whole of a fresh egg, in a basin, and then pour boiling tea over it gradually, to prevent its curdling. It is difficult from the taste, to distinguish the composition from rich cream.

To remove flies from the rooms.—Take half a tea-spoonful of black pepper, in powder, one tea-spoonful of brown sugar, one table spoonful of cream; mix them well together, and place them in the room, on a plate where the flies are troublesome, and they will soon disappear.

To preserve milk.—Provide bottles which must be perfectly clean, sweet, and dry; draw the milk from the cow into the bottle, and as they are filled, immediately cork them well up, and fasten the corks with pack thread or wire. Then spread a little straw on the bottom of a boiler, on which place bottles with straw between them, until the boiler contains a sufficient quantity. Fill it up with cold water; heat the water, and as soon as it begins to boil, draw the fire, and let the whole gradually cool. When quite cold take out the bottles, and pack them with straw or saw dust in hampers, and stow them in the coolest part of the house or ship. Milk preserved in this manner although eighteen months in the bottles, will be as sweet as when first milked from the cow.

To make excellent bread.—Mix seven pounds of best flour, with three pounds of pared boiled potatoes. Steam off the water, and leave them a few minutes on the fire; mash them fine, and mix them whilst quite warm in the flour, with a spoonful or more of salt. Put a quart of water, milk warm, with three large spoonfuls of yeast, gradually to the potatoes and flour. Work it well into a smooth dough, and let it remain four hours before it is baked.

To make wholesome rich bread.—Take of soft pulp, then rub it with 6 lbs. of meat potatoes, cooked by steam, and, when well blended, add 6 lbs. of flour; make the whole into a dough with water, and ferment with yeast, in the usual manner.

To cure butter.—Take two parts of the best common salt, one part of sugar, and one part of salt-petre; beat them up and blend the whole together. Take one ounce of this composition, for every 16 ounces of butter, work it well into a mass, and close it up for use. Butter cured this way, appears of a rich marbled consistence, and fine color, and never acquires a terrible hardness, nor is it so liable to salt. It may likewise be good for three years, observing that it must stand three weeks or a month before it is used.

MASONIC.

MASONIC ADDRESS.

Many objections have been raised against Freemasonry because it is a secret Institution, its enemies contending that there is no need for secrecy in the operations of any good society. This would, at first view, appear to be a some what reasonable objection to the Fraternity, but upon a more minute and deliberate consideration, every individual possessed of good mind, will at once see that there is nothing improper in it; nothing incompatible with the spirit which Masonry professes. Every one at all conversant with the philosophy of the human mind, is aware that many of the best gifts of God to man lose their importance and dwindle into insignificance, by being entirely divested of mystery and rendered common. There is certainly not a greater truism than that "familiarity begets disgust." Strip, then, Masonry of its secrecy, and many who are now pleased with the Institution would regard it with indifference. Again, it is essentially necessary for the preservation of the purity of the Order that secrecy should characterize the Mason. Lift that impervious curtain of mystery that has for so many ages veiled Masonry from the eyes of the world, let all our rites and ceremonies be laid open to the world, let every individual who would choose to embrace Masonry, and then farewell, a long farewell to all its greatness. We have already been taunted with suffering unworthy men to attach themselves to the institution, and yet we are told to keep no secrets. This involves an inconsistency. First, we are asked to make all the world Masons, by exposing the tenets of the Order, and then we are upbraided because we have been too promiscuous in our admissions. But there is no argument too fallacious or absurd for our opponents to use against us, no weapon however unequally or unwieldy, but they are ready to offer battle to Masonry with it. But thanks to that wisdom that designed, and that order that raised our beautiful Masonic edifice, an edifice rendered immortal by its beauty, strength and wisdom. Resting within its walls, we can securely behold cloud after cloud of oppression gather, rise and discharge itself, while our Masonic Order based as it were on the everlasting word of the Great I am, remains unshaken, unmoved, and undaunted. Masons cannot be with propriety blamed for the strictness with which they preserve the secrets of the Order, for reasons already enumerated, nor can any objection reasonably attach to the Institution itself on account of its secret nature. How many good and virtuous designs have been thwarted in consequence of a lack of observance of secrecy, it is not necessary to try to call to mind.—I am sure there is not an individual but can recollect, at some period of his life, some calamity having befallen him, either in consequence of his own lack of prudence, or of having reposed a secret in an unworthy breast. Nay, cities have been devastated, crowns have been torn from virtuous heads, empires have been revolutionized, rivers of blood have been shed, and thousands and millions of widows and orphans have been made by a lack of secrecy, to shed their tears and raise their wail. Yea, as insignificant as at first sight the observance of secrecy to many may appear, yet does it involve the fate of empires and the happiness and prosperity of nations. Solomon our Great Grand Master, felt something of the secrecy, when he exclaimed, "Wounds may be bound up, and words forgiven, but he who betrays the secrets of a friend, loses all credit." Again, Masons have a secret and peculiar language, which it is necessary to preserve among the household of the faithful, for the purpose of preventing imposition. The mysteries of this language we are instructed in secretly in Lodges, and such is its power, its beauty, and its usefulness, that were I at this instant surrounded by a horde consisting of the wildest barbarians of the earth, who were seeking my property and life, this universal language of Freemasonry would come to my aid, and if there should be one Mason among them all, my life, my happiness would be respected and protected by him. The language, like the electric fluid flies with the rapidity of lightning to the heart of the mason, causing it to expand to a brother in distress; yes, even the swarthy Indian, and almost relentless wild Arab, on his plains of burning sand, recognizes this language, and rushes with the impetuosity of a torrent to the relief of a brother in distress. Then, if it were only for this one reason, it is necessary, in order to be serviceable, that secrecy should be observed, and the mysteries of Freemasonry, by a strict observance of the ancient landmarks, should be invariably kept from all but those that are worthy, and well qualified.

Another objection has been raised to Freemasonry, because it is not religious in its operations, and it has even been stated that many Masons are Atheists, disbelieving not only in the religion of Christ, but in the Holy Bible itself. This is one of the foulest, blackest, and most disgraceful slanders that has ever been heaped upon the Institution, or the heads of good and great men of all nations and ages. Freemasonry is not sectarian in its views, nor bigoted or illiberal in its operations, yet ever since the mind of man has been capable of separating error and superstition from truth and revelation, ever since the day the spring of knowledge has awakened and called forth the energies of great and good minds, the virtuous and religious have stood forth as encouragers and promoters of our art, have extended to us the right hand of fellowship, and have considered themselves honored by having offices allotted to them in our Lodges, much more honored than they would have been by having heaped upon them all the blandishments of power, or all the vain circumstance of pomp that could have been bestowed upon them by prince, potentate, or any other person. Would such things be, could it have happened, that religious men, men believing, and even teaching, the religion of Jesus, would attach themselves to an institution irreligious and immoral in its tendencies, and wicked and egregiously foolish in its fundamental principles. And the Bible, that sacred volume which cheers the weary pilgrim on his way, which is his encouragement in disappointment, in sorrow, in distress, and in disease, which points him to that goal where his labors will terminate, and his virtues be rewarded—that great moral and religious code, it is said, is not respected by Masonry, nay, not believed by Masons! Oh shame, where is thy blush! In reference to the great respect paid to this good book, and the implicit reliance placed upon it by Masons, we will merely give an extract from the report of a committee of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts. "We place," says that committee, "on the altar of our consecrated Temple, the Holy Bible, as its most precious oblation, and its richest ornament. We press the hand of the initiate, when he first kneels there upon its unfolded pages, as the guaranty of his fidelity and truth, and we open his before darkened eyes upon its heaven-inspired pages, that there they may ever look for light ineffable, and bliss eternal. We realize that the truths contained in this word are all-important to the knowledge, the virtue and happiness of mankind. We most earnestly desire its universal diffusion, that it may be read in all languages, communicate its most needed and salutary information to every human understanding, and its sanctifying influences to every human heart. And we most devoutly and fervently implore the blessings of Almighty God upon all endeavors which are making by individuals and societies at the present day to distribute the Bible to the various nations of the globe." Is this the language of irreligion and unbelief? Is it not rather the language of good men and good Masons? and do you think it possible that an institution having for its supporters men in possession of such sentiments as those just repeated, can fail in its greatest time of need? No, it cannot. The Grand Master of all Masons, the Great Grand High Priest of the Universe will never forsake us, will never withdraw himself from us while we live up to our professions, as free and accepted Masons.

Freemasons have been accused of taking the most horrid oaths, to perform for each other services when called on, not sanctioned by either justice or law. We can only say, those charges are perfectly false and unfounded, and it is an act of the basest injustice to make them against us, for it is well known to those who do it, that the only possible way in which we could perfectly disprove the accusation, would be by laying before the world the mysteries of the Craft. Could that be done with propriety, we can imagine the disgrace and confusion that would overpower those wicked men, who, for the basest of purposes, have made charges which they themselves know have no foundation in fact. But as the mysteries of Freemasonry cannot be dragged before, and exposed to the world, it is unkind, ungenerous and disgusting, to continue such attacks. It is assaulting an enemy with his hands bound behind him; it is taunting an opponent who is without the organs of speech, or power of utterance.

The history of events and characters connected with Freemasonry has been a subject of deep interest to mankind for many centuries, doubly so when it is taken into consideration that the Order has been [although one of the most humane and benevolent that ever existed] persecuted with the most unbound and rancorous malice, and its votaries, subjected to not only scorn and hatred, but to the stake, and every manner of cruelty that fiends in the shape of men could invent or devise. Often and again, in by-gone days does Masonic history inform us that the patrons of the Order were hunted as wild beasts of prey, and their faithful heart's blood poured in torrents on the bosom of their mother earth, and for what? Was it because they were traitors to their country? Was it because they sought in those peaceful vales, and on those quiet mountain tops, where God, the Grand Architect of the Universe reigns in all his glorious magnificence, and where Masons were wont to hold their Lodges in ancient days, to fire the brand of disloyalty or rebellion, to aim the dagger of the assassin at the heart of the prince or the powers that were? Was it because Masons disregarded their duties as men and as patriots? No, but merely because the tenets of our Order found a faithful depository in their hearts. Deep in their souls did they own those principles and talents which Masonry advocates. True, and truly did they hold fast to the landmarks of the Order by which Masonry has been preserved in its pristine beauty and purity, through rivers of blood and oceans of persecution.—True, many times, nay, in our nineteenth century, even in this enlightened day, it has been said that Masonry is dead, she cannot revive; and then her opponents have raised high their voices—they have cried aloud, We have destroyed her—we have destroyed her! But, like the cedars of Libanus, she raises her beautiful head, and proclaims to an ignorant few and a politically prostituted many, the futility of all their hopes, the total impossibility of destroying, or even permanently injuring our ancient and honorable Order. I tell all those zealots against Masonry, I proclaim it as an incontrovertible truth to the whole world, that as long as Masonry remains what it now is, and what it has ever been, it is foolish, vain and idle, to attempt to quench its fires; as well might they attempt to pluck the lightning's from the great Jehovah's hand as well might they essay to drive the Great I am from his eternal and everlasting throne, as to destroy it, and why? Because true Masonry and true goodness are synonymous terms. I say again to all such as are foolish enough to indulge in the chimerical dream of prostrating our Order, and laying our ancient Institution in the dust—go, and when you can weave a glorious, bright and beautiful sunbeam into a mantle of darkness; when you can uproot every social and moral virtue; when you can tear from their places the planets, and uplift the foundations of earth; then may you barely hope that your time to successfully persecute Freemasonry has begun. And what has been the fate and fall of most of those who renouncing the sacred tenets of our Order, have dared attempt to trample on the neck of our Institution. Do we not see that from the very first unholy step, kisgrace and infamy fastens itself upon them? a strange fatuity appears to come over the before brilliant mind, and darkness Cymmerean darkness, pervades the man in all his actions. "Those whom the Gods mean to destroy, they first make mad." There is nothing truer than this.—See that poor benighted wretch, who for political or other purposes, abjures Masonry, renounces that which he by every tie of honor and gratitude was bound to support. View him, I say, in his progress from having been once a son of light, now a being of darkness, groping along in search of political honors or pecuniary emoluments. What is the consequence? What have we seen the consequences of such gross abandonment of principle and virtue to be? Why, a Somerset in their dark walkings, which often breaks the neck of their unholy aspirations, and renders them forever dishonored among good men. I tell ye again vain men, that when you engage in a crusade against Freemasonry, at the very moment when you think you have buckled on a beautiful and impervious armour, you have but placed yourselves within the poisoned shirt of Nessus, which will burn and burn, and blister, and corrode, as long as life lasts, and even then your torments shall not cease. Conscience exists beyond the grave and winding-sheet; accountability is not nonentified by the hand of death. And how many ages, how many revolutions has our Order not passed through?

And though the lightnings flashed, and the thunders bellowed, yet unscathed stood the genius of Freemasonry, while Brotherly Love, Relief and Truth shed a halo of glory around her, which was beheld with wonder and astonishment by an admiring world. "Hail glorious Masonsonny! Hail thou that makes us great and free!!" It has been objected to our Order, that some of its members are not good members of society, that they are not even respectable, good men. What of this? Was there ever an institution, no matter how formed and conducted, into which bad members did not creep? Look around you at the members of our churches, do we not see within their pious bad men? I believe it will not be denied. Yes even in the sanctuary of the Most High, bloated intemperance and dark hypocrisy oftentimes take exalted seats, and "play fantastic tricks before high Heaven that make the angels weep," and would you from that circumstance, condemn the really good, the truly pious? I hope not, nay I know you would not. The duties that devolve upon Masons, compel them, as far as it is in their power, to suppress vice and immorality, intemperance, fanaticism and bigotry, and these, permit me to say, I believe are as successfully combated by Masons as by any other set of men under heaven.—What! condemn an institution because some of its members are bad? How absurd! Even the Saviour of mankind, the meek and lowly Jesus, had a wretch, a traitor, a blood-thirsty, penurious sinner among his apostles, who even deigned to sell his Master's precious blood for filthy lucre. How then can we wonder at these scandalous publications which have flooded the earth, making their appearance, which perhaps but a few bad Masons assisted in bringing before the world. When we see that one of the chosen twelve descended to hypocrisy and lying, and even bartered away the life of the Lord's anointed for money, can we be astonished, I say, that Masons from the same impulse—yea, men calling themselves Masons, should for gain sake, assist in bringing such a tissue of falsehood and slander before a world waiting, yea, on tiptoe, to believe and blame. When the genius of Freemasonry beheld this dark and damning deed, she shrieked aloud, but no fear came over her for her favorite Institution. She bled to see the perfidy, the wickedness, the base ingratitude of those who professed to be her apostles; but supported by the arms of faith, casting on high the bright beams of hope, in charity, she was willing to say, "forgive them, they know not what they do."

And now, my brethren of the mystic tie, to you I address myself. You have seen that your Order has had its origin as high, if not higher, than any other under the sun. It has been demonstrated to you, that the great and good of all ages and nations have patronized it, and that it has withstood the efforts of its opponents to destroy it. My brethren, the eyes of a censorious world are upon you; there is nothing necessary to cause the frown of the multitude to rest upon you, but a deviation from moral rectitude. Therefore, I beg, I conjure you, as a friend to the ancient and honorable Order of Freemasonry, as a brother interested in your individual good, and immortal as well as temporal welfare, to practise virtue, morality, integrity, and all the Masonic virtues. Do not suffer yourselves to slumber on your posts. You are placed as sentinels on the watch-towers of Masonry; be vigilant, look well to your duties as Masons, to which you have bound yourselves by the most solemn ties. And as the tree is judged of by the fruit it produces, conduct yourselves so towards the world, that no blame can attach to you, and through you to the Order to which you have attached yourselves. Let your light so shine before men, that even the most scrupulous may be bound to acknowledge your worth. Thus will you secure to yourselves the friendship and esteem of the truly good of all denominations, and exalt the Institution of which you are members.

Above all things, brethren look well to the ancient landmarks of the Order; do not suffer them to be infringed or dispensed with, otherwise confusion and disorder will enter our Lodges, destroy that harmony and order that should always characterize the Society, and sap the foundations of our honorable Institution.—Much harm has been done Freemasonry by the admission of men unworthy of the benefits of the Order. Do not, my brethren, bring yourselves to believe that the respectability of any society is at all commensurate with the number of its members, but rather prefer to have a Lodge few in its numbers but honorable in its members. Finally, brethren, let us so conduct ourselves towards each other, and towards the world, that the most censorious cannot attach any blame to us, but may be bound to acknowledge our goodness, and the world at large, be convinced of the good effects of Masonry. By so doing, we will render ourselves good and happy men, and useful members of society, and fit ourselves, when the coils of mortality shall be thrown off, and that impenetrable veil of the Temple is raised for admission into the "Sanctum Sanctorum," the Holy of Holies.

ENCOUNTER WITH A LEOPARD.

"We have been favoured, by a gentleman who was formerly in the civil service at Ceylon, with the following description of an encounter with a leopard or panther, which in India are popularly called tigers:—

"I was in Jaffna, at the northern extremity of the Island of Ceylon, in the beginning of the year 1819; when, one morning, my servant called me an hour or two before my usual time, with "Master, master! people send for master's dogs—tiger in the town!" Now, my dogs chanced to be some very degenerate specimens of a fine species, called Poligar dog, which I should designate as a sort of wiry-haired grey bound, without scent. I kept them to hunt jackals; by the way, there are no real tigers in Ceylon; but leopards and panthers are always called so, and by ourselves as well as by the natives. This turned out to be a panther. My gun chanced not to be put together; and while my servant was doing it, the collector, and two medical men, who had recently arrived, in consequence of the cholera morbus having just then reached Ceylon from the continent, came to my door, the former armed with a fowling-piece, and the two latter with remarkably blunt hog-spears. They insisted upon setting off without waiting for my gun, a proceeding not much to my taste. The tiger (I must continue to call him so) had taken refuge in a hut, the roof of which, as those of Ceylon huts in general, spread to the ground like an umbrella; the only aperture into it was a small door, about four feet high. The collector wanted to get the tiger out at once. I begged to wait for my gun; but no—the fowling-piece (loaded with ball, of course,) and the two hog spears were quite enough. I got a hedge stake, and awaited my fate, from very shame. At this moment, to my great delight, there arrived from the fort an English officer (two artill-

lery-men, and a Malay captain; and a pretty figure we should have cut without them, as the event will show. I was now quite ready to attack, and my gun came a minute afterwards. The whole scene which follows took place within an enclosure, about twenty feet square formed, on three sides, by a strong fence of palmyra leaves, and on the fourth by the hut. At the door of this the two artillery-men planted themselves, and the Malay captain got at the top, to frighten the tiger out, by worrying it—an easy operation, as the huts there are covered with cocoa-nut leaves. One of the artillery-men wanted to go in to the tiger, but we would not suffer it. At last the beast sprang; this man received him on his bayonet, which he thrust apparently down his throat, firing his piece at the same moment. The bayonet broke off short, leaving less than three inches on the musket; the rest remained in the animal, but was invisible to us: the shot probably went through his cheek, for it certainly did not seriously injure him, as he instantly rose upon his legs, with a loud roar, and placed his paws upon the soldier's breast. At this moment, the animal appeared to me about to reach the centre of the man's face; but I had scarcely time to observe this, when the tiger, stooping his head, seized the soldier's arm in his mouth, turned him half round staggering, threw him over on his back, and fell upon him. Our dread now was, that if we fired upon the tiger, we might kill the man: for a moment there was a pause, when his comrade attached the beast exactly in the same manner as the gallant fellow himself had done. He struck his bayonet into his head; the tiger rose at him—he fired; and this time the ball took effect, and in the head. The animal staggered backwards, and we all poured in our fire. He still kicked and writhed; when the gentleman with the hog-spears advanced, and fixed him, while some natives finished him, by beating him on the head with hedgestakes. The brave artillery-man was, after, all, but slightly hurt: he claimed the skin, which was very cheerfully given to him. There was, however, a cry among the natives that the head should be cut off; and, in so doing, the knife came directly across the bayonet. The animal measured scarcely less than four feet from the root of the tail to the muzzle. There was no tradition of a tiger having been in Jaffna before, indeed, this one must have either come a distance of almost twenty miles, or have swam across an arm of the sea nearly two in breadth; for Jaffna stands on a peninsula on which there is no jungle of any magnitude."

ANECDOTE—CATS.

An extravagant young fellow was reduced to his last sixpence, in Charleston, S. C. He was a creature of infinite whim, and full of expedients; but was on the very brink of starvation.

A thought struck him. He went to a printer—stipulated with him to print some play-bills, (there was no theatre in Charleston at the time)—promised to take the whole business upon his own shoulders—bring him off harmless—and go snacks in the profit.

The bills, were printed, This night will be performed, &c. &c.—A farce, in one act, called The Cat let out of the Bag, &c. &c.—in the usual manner of such things.

The house was crowded—nobody, appeared on the stage for some time. At last a shrill whistle was heard—then a jews-harp—then a villanous three-stringed fiddle—and finally, a plain-dressed, awkward-looking chap, entered, with a very deliberate step, having a bag thrown over his shoulders. The audience rose—all a tip-toe with expectations. He seated himself, with the bag between his legs—began to untie it—held the top with his hands—the audience gathered nearer and nearer—Now! he cried—clapping his hands: Scat—and so!—out sprang a furious Tom Cat, pelmet among the hats and bonnets. Such a scene of confusion!—some aimed for the windows—some for the doors—some screamed—some swore—and more laughed.

At length they were calmed—but the curtain was dropped!—an epilogue was spoken: "ladies and gentlemen," said the manager, "the farce is over—we thank you, &c.—and—He was interrupted by huzzas and hisses:—"Why, what do you complain of," said he, with the most impudent composure, "isn't this a farce—isn't it in one act—wasn't the cat let out of the bag?"

The whole room was in an uproar—many were angry—but more were delighted at the fellow's impudence—and some even went so far as to call for it again. The swearers were for tearing him to pieces; but the laughers were most numerous and carried the day.

MISCELLANY.

From Ellis's Historical Inquirer

CONFESSION OF THE EXECUTIONER OF CHARLES I.

There have been great disputes about the person who beheaded Charles I. Mr. Ellis says, "it seems most probable that the person who actually beheaded the king was the common executioner." And then adds the following valuable and interesting note, which seems to us to settle the question.

"Among the tracts relating to the civil war, which were given to the British Museum by his late majesty King George III. in 1763, there are three upon this subject. One is entitled, 'The Confession of Richard Brandon the Hangman (upon his death-bed,) concerning his beheading his late Majesty. Printed in the year of the hangman's downfall, 1643.' The second is entitled; 'The last Will and Testament of Richard Brandon,' printed in the same year. The third, is, 'A Dialogue or Dispute between the late Hangman (the same person,) and Death,' in verse, without date. All three are in quarto."

The following are the most important paragraphs of the first tract:

"The confession of the hangman concerning his beheading his late majesty the king of Great Britain, (upon his death-bed) who was buried on Thursday last in Whitechapel church-yard, with the manner thereof:—

"Upon Wednesday last (being the 20th of this instant, June 1649,) Richard Brandon, the late executioner and hangman, who beheaded his late majesty, king of Great Britain, departed this life; but during the time of his sickness his conscience was much troubled, and exceeding perplexed in mind, yet little shew of repentance for remission of his sins, and by past transgressions, which had so much power and influence upon him, that he seemed to live in them, and they in him. And on Sunday last, a young man of his acquaintance going to visit him, fell into discourse, asked him how he did, and whether he was not troubled in conscience for cutting off the king's head. He replied 'yes, by reason that (upon the time of his tryall, and at the denouncing of sentence against him,) he had taken a vow and protestation wishing God to punish him body and soul, if ever he appeared on the scaffold to do the act, or lift up his hand against him.'

"He likewise confessed that he had thirty pounds for his pains, all paid him in half-crowns, within an hour after the blow was given; and that he had an orange stuck full of cloves, and a hand-kircher out of the king's pocket, so soon as he was carried off from the scaffold, for which orange he was proffered twenty shillings by a gentleman in Whitehall, but refused the same, and afterwards sold it for ten shillings in Rosemary-lane. About six of the clock at night, he returned home to his wife living in Rosemary-lane, and gave her the money, saying, that it was the dearest money that ever he earned in his life, for it would set him at liberty; which prophetic words were soon made manifest, for it appeared, that since he hath been in a most sad condition, and the Almighty's first scourging of him with the Jewesses, and the friendly admonition of the calling him to repentance, yet he hath been in his vicious ways, and would not therewithal be reformed, and still pointing out his own sin, which he conceived to be impossible before him."

"About three days before he dy'd, he lay speechless, uttering many a sigh and heavy groan, and so in a most desperate manner departed from his bed of sorrow. For the buriall whereof great store of wines were sent in by the sheriff of the city of London, and a great multitude of people stood waiting to see his corpse carried to the church-yard, some crying out, 'Hang him, rogue!' 'Bury him in the dunghill!'

others pressing upon him, saying, they would quarter him for executing of the king; insomuch that the churchwardens and masters of the parish were fain to come for the suppressing of them, and (with great difficulty) he was at last carried to White Chappell church-yard, having (as it is said) a bunch of rosemary at each end of the coffin, on the top thereof, with a rope tyed crosse it, from one end to the other."

"And a merry conceited cook living at the sign of the Crown, having a black fan (worth the value of thirty shillings,) took a resolution to rent the same in pieces, and to every feather tied a piece of pack-thread dyed in black ink, and gave them to divers persons who (in derision for a while wore them on their hats."

"Thus have I given thee an exact account and perfect relation of the life and death of Richard Brandon, to the end that the world may be convinced of those calumnious speeches and erroneous suggestions which are daily spit from the mouth of envy against divers persons of great worth and eminency, by casting an odium upon them for the executing of the king; it being now made manifest that the aforesaid executioner was the only man who gave the fatal blow, and his man that waited upon him, was a ragman of the name of Ralph Jones living in Rosemary-lane."

"UNWRITTEN" COUNTENANCES.

How little does he know of humanity, who looks to the countenance as an index of the "inner man," and how slight and shallow is that man's acquaintance with the workings of human feeling, who believes every one happy that wears a smile upon his lip! "Flavius is a happy fellow, for you never meet him but you find that comical countenance of his, lit up in the sunshine of its own whimsicality; and he never opens his mouth but to utter one of his own peculiar queerities. He lives upon his humour, and it is not possible that ought save fun, and wit and fancy ever occupies his mind. He is living a life of unembittered mirth, and travelling over the rugged pathway of humanity with griefless tread;—threading the sinuosities of life with light mind and untroubled footstep." This is a language that we have but too often heard used, and used too, to a being, himself the victim of the most intense sensibility, and who while he was listening to the convivial merriment around him—perhaps contriving his full quota to it, was at the same moment writhing under the agonies of mental distress. Depend upon it, there is no judging of any man's feelings, by his looks, or by his language. He may be setting a table into a full roar of laughter, or he may be making you forget every thing but hilarity and the philosophy of old Democritus, in reading his pages, while his bosom is throbbing under the visitations of its own misery! We have known more than one such man. We have seen him imparting the liveliest feelings to those about him; we have seen every ear prepared to hear something witty from his lips, and every countenance holding itself in readiness to "stretch forth" to its utmost elongation of laughter, at what he should utter; and we never knew him to disappoint the expected luxury. But while we have witnessed this, we have known full well that he who admitted to the mirth of others, knew nought but sorrow himself! Apparent cheerfulness, very often covers concealed woe, and a bright countenance is but too frequently the false flag which the desperate unfurl, when they would commit piracy upon human discernment!

POLISH REVOLUTION.

We are no lovers of revolutions. We know their almost necessary evil, their fearful summoning of the fiercer passions of our nature, the sullen civil hatred by which brother is armed against brother, the long ordeal of furious license, giddy anarchy, and promiscuous slaughter. Of all this we are fully aware. But the Polish Revolution is justified by every feeling which makes freedom of religion, person, and property dear to man. Poland owes no allegiance to Russia. The bayonet gave, and the bayonet will take away. So perish the triumph that scorns justice, the so rise the holy claim of man to enjoy unfettered and being that God has giving him. Hating, as we sincerely do, all unprovoked violence, and deprecating an unnecessary change, it is impossible for us, without a bandoning our human feelings, to refuse the deepest sympathy to the efforts of our fellow-men, in throwing off a despotism ruinous to every advance of nations, degrading to every faculty of the human mind, and hostile to every principle alike of Justice, Virtue, and Christianity.

THE NEWGATE LITERATURE OF ENGLAND.

The rabid passion for the romantic literature of the Old Bailey, which we have witnessed at its height during the by-gone year, has been perhaps, unparalleled in any other age or country. All the minor theatres, stringently prohibited from acting the higher forms of the drama, put Jack Sheppard into a red riding-coat, and, night after night, captivated the imaginations of their motley audiences, by the magnanimity, courage, and, generosity of the burglarious hero.—The horrible became so fashionable in the stews, that Jack was even hanged upon the stage amidst the tears of the sympathising spectators; and such was the frenzy of popularity that followed this galantic show of mingled ribaldry and bombast, that one of our cleverest actresses did not hesitate to assume the character of the fascinating felon upon the stage, breaking gaol with the most ineffable agility, and dangling two tipsy wives upon her delicate arms, to the unspeakable delight of the congenial rabble! Did Victor Hugo or Alexander C. mas, or any of the French melodramatists ever conceive such a disgraceful me'ange as this!

Elveskin set the town on fire. "Nix my dolly" filled the police-officers for many weeks in succession with riff-raff roysterers—fortunate in their glorification if they escaped the treadmill. But unfortunately the influence of this celebrated novel did not end with the inspirations of the gin-palace. A poor youth, emulating some fanciful image of despair that had got into his head, threw himself off the monument, and was found with a dirty fusicle of Jack Sheppard in his pocket! The truth is, that books of this description exercise a most melancholy influence over the minds of the lower orders, working them up to crime, and impressing them with deranged notions about the grandeur of robbery and murder. It is difficult to conceive an infatuation of this kind, but we have too many fatal proofs of the fact to question its existence for a moment. The illustration is the most convincing and the most appalling of all. One of his confessions, the wretched Courtoisier stated, that the first idea of taking the life of his venerable master was suggested to his mind by the perusal of the ignominious story of Jack Sheppard! Humanity shudders at such revelations.

THE JEWESSES.—Fortanes asked Chateaubriand, "If he could assign a reason why the women of the Jewish race were so much handsomer than the men?" To which Chateaubriand gave the following truly poetical and Christian one;—"The Jewesses" he said "have escaped the curse which alighted upon their fathers, husbands, and sons.—Not a Jewess was to be seen among the crowd of priests and rabble who insulted the Son of God; scourged him; crowned him with thorns, and subjected him to ignominy and the agony of the Cross; The women of Judea believed in the Saviour, and assisted and soothed him under afflictions. A woman of Bethany poured on his head precious ointment, which she kept in a vase of alabaster. The Sinner anointed his feet with perfumed oil, and wiped them with her hair. Christ, on his part, extended his mercy to the Jewesses. He raised from the dead the son of the widow of Nain, and Martha's brother, Lazarus. He cured Simon's mother-in-law, and the women who touched the hem of his garment.—To the Samaritan woman he was a spring of living water, and a compassionate judge to the woman in adultery. The daughters of Jerusalem wept over him; the Holy Women accompanied him to Calvary; brought balm and spices, and weeping, sought him at the sepulchre. 'Woman, why weepest thou?' His first appearance, after his resurrection, was to Mary Magdalene. He said to her, 'Mary'—At the sound of his voice, Mary Magdalene's eyes were opened, and she answered—'Master.' The reflection of some very beautiful ray must have rested on the brow of the Jewesses."

When Oxford fired at the Queen and Prince Albert, why was he like O'Connell? Because he was for a repeal of the union.

HISTORICAL.

From the Knickerbocker.

THE 'ROBINSON HOUSE';

OR REMINISCENCE OF WEST-POINT AND ARNOLD THE TRAITOR.

Colonel Jameson, after a careful examination of the papers, notwithstanding the fact that they were all in the hand-writing, and bore the signature of Arnold, and carried on their face the indisputable evidence of his treason, ordered the prisoner to be sent directly to Arnold! This conduct was indeed most extraordinary, and justified the remark of General Washington, 'that either on account of his egregious folly, or bewildered conception, he seemed lost in astonishment, and not to know what he was doing.' The prisoner was accordingly sent off to Head-Quarters, the papers despatched by an express to General Washington. Major Tallmadge, the second officer in command under Colonel Jameson, was absent from the post when the prisoner was brought in; but having returned very shortly after the guard had departed with him, and being apprized of the facts, he at once declared his full conviction of Arnold's treason, and urged so earnestly that the prisoner should not be sent to Head-Quarters, that Colonel Jameson yielded a reluctant assent that an express should be instantly despatched; and in a few hours Lieutenant Allen returned with Andre to North Castle; from thence he was removed for greater security to Salem, and placed under the charge of Major Tallmadge. Upon reaching this post, Andre found that he was not to be taken to Arnold; and utterly despairing of escape or concealment, he wrote his first letter to General Washington, dated Salem, 24th September, 1780, in which, with a soldier's frankness, he disclosed his situation, and all his proceedings. He then handed the letter open to Major Tallmadge, who read it with a strong emotion, and sealed and forwarded it to General Washington.

The commander-in-chief was then on his way from Hartford, and changing the route which he had first proposed, came by the way of West Point. At Fish kill he met the French minister, M. de la Luzerne, who had been to visit Count Rochambeau at Newport, and he remained that night with the minister. Very early next morning he sent off his luggage, with orders to the men to go with it as quickly as possible to 'Beverly,' and give Mrs. Arnold notice that he would be there at breakfast. When the general and his suite arrived opposite West Point, he was observed to turn his horse into a narrow road that led to the river. La Fayette remarked, 'General, you are going in a wrong direction: you know Mrs. Arnold is waiting breakfast for us.' Washington good naturedly said: 'Ah, I know you young men are all in love with Mrs. Arnold, and wish to get where she is as soon as possible. You may go and take your breakfast with her, and tell her not to wait for me: I must ride down and examine the redoubts on this side of the river.' The officers, however, with the exception of two of the aids, remained. When the aids arrived at 'Beverly,' they found the family waiting; and having communicated the message of General Washington, Arnold, with his family and the two aids, sat down to breakfast. Before they had finished, a messenger arrived in great haste, and handed General Arnold a letter, which he read with deep and evident emotion.

The self-control of the soldier enabled Arnold to suppress the agony he endured after reading this letter.—He rose hastily from the table; told the aids that his immediate presence was required at West Point; and desired them so to inform General Washington, when he arrived. Having first ordered a horse to be ready, he hastened to Mrs. Arnold's chamber, and there, with a bursting heart, disclosed to her his dreadful position, and that they must part, perhaps for ever. Struck with horror at the painful intelligence, this fond and devoted wife swooned, and fell senseless at his feet.—In this state he left her, hurried down stairs, and mounting his horse, rode with all possible speed, to the river. In doing so, Arnold did not keep the main road, but passed down the mountain, pursuing a by-path thro' the woods, which Lieutenant Arden pointed out, and which is now called 'Arnold's Path.' Near the foot of the mountain, where the path approaches the main road, a weeping willow, planted there no doubt by some patriot hand, stands, in marked contrast with the forest trees which encircle and surround it, to point out to the inquiring tourist the very pathway of the traitor.

In our interesting visit, we were accompanied by the superintendent, Major Delafield, and in the barges kindly ordered for our accommodation, we were rowed to 'Beverly Dock' and landed at the spot where Arnold took boat to aid his escape. He was rowed to the 'Vulture,' and using a white handkerchief, created the impression that it was flag-boat: it was therefore suffered to pass. He made himself known to Captain Sutherland, of the Vulture, and then calling on board the leader of the boatmen who had rowed him off, informed him that he and his crew were all prisoners of war. This disgraceful and most unmanly appendix to his treason, was considered so contemptible, by the captain, that he permitted the man to go on shore, on his parole of honor, to procure clothes for himself and comrades. This he did, and returned the same day. When they arrived in New York, Sir Henry Clinton, holding in just contempt such a wanton act of meanness, set them all at liberty.

When General Washington reached 'Beverly,' and was informed that Arnold had departed for West Point, he crossed directly over, expecting to find him. Surprised to learn that he had not been there, after examining the works he returned. General Hamilton had remained at 'Beverly,' and as Washington and his suite were walking up the mountain road, from 'Beverly Dock,' they met General Hamilton, with an anxious face and hurried step, coming toward them. A brief and suppressed conversation took place between Washington and himself, and they passed on rapidly to the house, where the papers that Washington's change of route had prevented his receiving, had been delivered that morning; and being represented to Hamilton as of great and pressing importance, were by him opened and the dreadful secret disclosed. Instant measures were adopted to intercept Arnold, and prevent his escape, but in vain. General Washington then communicated the facts to La Fayette and Knox, and said to the former, 'more in sorrow than in anger,' 'Whom can we trust now? He also went up to see Mrs. Arnold, but even Washington could carry to her no consolation. Her grief was almost frenzied; and in its wildest moods, she spoke of General Washington as the murderer of her child. It seemed that she had not the remotest idea of her husband's treason; and she had even schooled her heart to feel more for the cause of America, from her regard for those who professed to love it. Her husband's glory was her dream of bliss—the requiem-chant for her infant's repose; and she was found, alas! as many a confiding heart has oft been found,

'To cling like ivy round a worthless thing.'

Arnold wrote to General Washington, declaring the innocence of Andre; that he came on shore under his protection, and was not answerable for any wrong of Arnold's, and seeking also protection and kindness for his wife and child, he remarked, 'was as good and innocent an angel, and incapable of doing wrong.'

Washington took active measures to guard against the treason. Not knowing how far the poison had spread, or who of all those about him had been affected by it, he was compelled to a course, which, while it did not distrust any one in particular of his brave compatriots in arms, yet extended over all the tireless vigilance of an eye sleepless in its country's service. Andre was sent under a strong guard to Head-Quarters at 'Beverly,' where he arrived in the custody of Major Tallmadge, on the morning of the 26th. Washington made many inquiries of Major Tallmadge, but declined to have the prisoner brought into his presence, and never did see him while in the hands of the Americans. Andre was next taken to West Point, where he remained until the morning of the 28th, when he was removed down the river in a barge, to Stony Point, and thence, under an escort of cavalry, to 'Tappan.' Some doubt has existed whether Andre was ever at West Point; but it is on record, on the authority of Colonel Tallmadge, who personally attended Andre, from the moment of his arrest to that of his execution, that he was carried to West Point but not imprisoned there.

In passing down the river, he conversed freely with Major Tallmadge, pointed out a piece of table-land on the western shore, where he was to have landed, and pointing to old Fort Putnam, which still stands in lofty grandeur, almost undecayed by time, the constant resort of the pilgrim patriot, he detailed the projected course of the British up the mountain to the attack; and I learn that so well had the preparations been conducted, that the scaling-ladders with which the walls were to be passed, were found afterward, concealed, ready for service, and some of which were preserved until within a few years, by an aged patriot, as relics of that remote period; and even now may be seen the drill-house at West Point, a portion of the hugh chain that was stretched across the Hudson, just below West Point, to obstruct the British shipping, and several links of which Arnold had caused to be cut, that the enemy could break it with greater facility. On their way to Tappan, Maj. Andre was very anxious to know what would be the result of his capture; and when Major Tallmadge could no longer evade a direct reply, however painful to his feelings, he told this short and simple story: 'I had a much-loved class mate in Yale college, by the name of Nathan Hale, who entered the army in 1775. Immediately after the battle of Long Island, General Washington wanted information of the strength, position, and probable movements of the enemy. Captain Hale tendered his services, went over to Brooklyn, was taken just as he was passing the out posts of the British on his return.' Turning to Andre, Major Tallmadge said, with emphasis, 'Do you know the sequel of that story!'

'Yes,' said Andre; 'he was hung as a spy; but surely you do not consider his case and mine alike?'

Major Tallmadge replied: 'Yes, precisely similar, and similar will be your fate!' From that moment, the dejection of his spirits was striking and painful.

On the 29th of September, General Washington, summoned a board of officers, consisting of six majors general and eight brigadiers. They were directed to examine the case of Major Andre, and to report the facts, with their opinion of the nature of the transaction, and its punishment. When the prisoners were brought before them, the president informed him that he was at perfect liberty to withhold an answer to any questions put to him. Declining to avail himself of any legal or technical rights, he proceeded to give a brief narrative of all that had occurred; between his landing from the Vulture and his capture; and stated expressly that he did not come on shore under the protection of a flag of truce. His deportment was manly, dignified, and delicate; and while he sought no disguise or concealment of the part he had played in this transaction, he was scrupulously careful not to disclose the names or acts of others. After full consideration, the Board of Officers reported the facts in detail, and their opinion that Major Andre ought to be considered a spy, and that, according to the laws and usage of nations, he should suffer death. The voice of humanity pleaded loudly for mercy to Major Andre, but the stern realities of the scene which might have been presented, had his agency been successful, forbade all hope. Inexorable justice, and the stern decrees of the law, alike required an example, which should not only prove a warning to all traitors in time to come, but convince the American people that their cause was in the hands of men who knew their rights, and knowing dared maintain them. Appeals the most powerful were made, and no human effort left untried, to induce Washington to save Andre, but in vain. His heart was full of the milk of human kindness; his sympathies were all enlisted for the interesting prisoner, whose life was in his hands; and it required the firmness of a Roman father, to withstand the promptings of his own generous nature. But he never shrunk from the rigid performance of a public duty, or permitted his heart to dictate what honor and patriotism alike forbade.

One plan however, suggested itself to Washington, by which, if successful, the life of Andre might be spared; and that was, to exchange Andre for Arnold. It was a forlorn hope; but the bare attempt proves the nobility of the heart that would make the suggestion. Washington knew that an open proposal of this kind to the British commander would be likely, from its very publicity, to be rejected, and he therefore adopted an expedient. He despatched Captain Aaron Ogden, of New Jersey, who was at that time, with Washington, ardently engaged in the cause of his country with the proceedings of the Court of Inquiry, to Sir Henry Clinton; and he was directed to remain at Jersey City all night, after delivering his despatches, and in the course of the evening, which he would spend with the British officers, to speak of the arrest of Andre, and to suggest the certainty of his death, unless he could be exchanged for Arnold. After supper, he accordingly introduced this subject of painful interest, and found ready listeners. When he spoke of the exchange, one of the officers eagerly inquired if he had authority for that remark: "No," said Captain Ogden, "not directly from General Washington; but I think if the proposal is made, he would agree to it.—The officer who made the inquiry was seen shortly to leave the room; crossing the river to New York, he went directly to Sir Henry Clinton, and detailed the remarks of Captain Ogden. The next morning, the same officer observed, in a careless manner, to Captain Ogden, as he was about to depart, that the exchange which he had spoken of could not be made: 'it would be such a violation of honor and military principle, that he knew Sir Henry Clinton would not listen to the idea for a moment.' Failing in this, General Washington determined on still another plan to save the life of Andre. He sent for Major Lee, and said to him:

"I have sent for you, in the expectation, that you have some one in your corps, who is willing to undertake a delicate and hazardous project. Whoever comes forward, will confer a great obligation upon me personally, and in behalf of the United States I will reward him amply. No time is to be lost: he must proceed, if possible, to-night. I intend to seize Arnold and save Andre."

Major Lee selected a man by the name of Champe, a Virginian, of tried courage, and inflexible perseverance. He was sent for, and the plan proposed. He was to desert, and escape to New York; to appear friendly with the enemy; to watch Arnold, and upon some fit opportunity, with the assistance of some one whom he could trust, to seize him, and conduct him to an appointed place on the river, where boats should be in readiness to bear them away. Champe agreed to undertake the mission, and departed. Soon after he arrived in New York, he was sent to Sir Henry Clinton, who treated him kindly, questioned him very closely, gave him a couple of guineas, and recommended him to Arnold, who was anxious to procure American recruits. He enlisted in Arnold's legion, and had daily opportunities of watching the General. He discovered that it was his custom to return home about twelve o'clock every night, and to walk in his garden before retiring. This hour was fixed upon; and the period when Champe was to seize him. He then wrote to Major Lee, fixing the third day after for a party of dragoons to meet him at Hoboken, where he hoped to place Arnold in their hands. Every thing was prepared by Champe and his associates for the arrest; but this second attempt was doomed to fail. On the day preceding the night fixed for the execution of the plan, Arnold had removed his quarters to another part of the city, to superintend the embarkation of troops, and the American legion was all placed on board one of the transport ships. And thus it happened that John Champe, instead of having the glory of delivering Arnold to the Americans, was safely deposited on board one of the transports, and carried to Virginia. Thus ended the second attempt of General Washington to save the unfortunate Andre. The proceedings of the Court of Inquiry were laid before a board of officers, by Sir Henry Clinton, and a deputation of three persons appointed to wait on General Washington, and renew the efforts to save the life of Andre. The negotiation was conducted by General Robertson for the British, and by General Greene, for the Americans; but it produced no change in the opinion and determination of General Washington.

When the sentence of death was communicated to Major Andre, he manifested no surprise or concern, having evidently been prepared for the result. His only desire seemed to be, that he might die the death of a soldier, and not be hung as a felon. This wish was repeated in a most impressive letter to General Washington, but it could not be. The rules of grim-visaged War pointed out the gibbet, and the gentle and pathetic appeals of mercy could neither change the mode, nor win from death respite, reprieve, or forgiveness. The time for execution was fixed for the second of October, at twelve o'clock. Even within a step of the grave, the elegant accomplishments of this interesting man, contributed to throw a light veil over the brief future, and enabled him to leave a sketch, which at this day possesses great interest. In the 'Trumbull Gallery,' at Yale college, is a pen-and-ink drawing, taken by him on the morning of his execution. It is his own likeness, seated at a table in his guard-room; and was presented to Mr. Tomlinson, officer of the guard.

The fatal day at length arrived. Andre partook of his breakfast, which had been sent every day during his confinement from Washington's own table; and after having shaved and dressed, he placed his hat on the table, and said cheerfully to the officer of the guard, he was ready at any moment. The concourse of people was immense. Nearly all the general and field officers, except Washington and his staff were present. Major Andre walked from the stone house, where he had been confined, between two subaltern officers, arm in arm. Until his near approach to the gallows, he had believed that his request to be shot would have been granted; and the dreadful disappointment caused a momentary shudder. He stepped into the wagon beneath the gallows, and took from his pocket two white handkerchiefs: with one his arms were loosely pinioned, and with the other, after removing his hat and stock, he bandaged his eyes, with perfect composure. He then slipped the noose over his head, and adjusted it to his neck, without any assistance. Colonel Scammel now informed him that he had an opportunity to speak, if he desired it. He raised the bandage from his eyes, and said: "I pray you to bear me witness that I meet my fate like a brave man." In a latter instant, his spirit had passed to the God who gave it.

Such was the melancholy fate of a man, whose rare accomplishments had procured for him the friendship and confidence of all to whom he was known. In ten short days, his fairest hopes had been blighted, and his brightest visions dispersed. But it was his singular fortune to die not more beloved by his friends, than lamented by his enemies, whose cause he had sought to ruin, and by whose hands his life was justly taken. There are few Americans who can look back upon the fate of Andre without deep regret. His name is embalmed in every generous heart; and while we condemn his great error, and approve the sentence of his judges, we can truly grieve that a life of so much promise was destined to such an ignominious doom.

The remains of Major Andre, which had been interred within a few feet of the place of execution, were removed in 1821, under the direction of Mr. Buchanan, the British Consul at New York, and sent to England. They were deposited in Westminster Abbey, where a monument, erected by order of the king, marks the last resting place of Major John Andre.

'When cold in the grave lies the friend thou hast loved,
Be his faults and his follies forgot by thee; then;
Or if from their slumber the veil be removed,
Weep o'er them in silence, and close thy eyes.'

Arnold received a commission as lieutenant-colonel in the British army, and continued actively engaged during the war against his country. After its termination he was busily employed in commercial pursuits in the West Indies, and at last removed to England. But there, as here, he was shunned and despised by all honorable men; and after enduring the pangs of a guilty heart, the mark of scorn, even in the very land to which he had fled, the poor miserable outcast sunk to the grave, closing a life of guilt and shame, 'unwept, unhonored and unsung,' having secured an infamy of fame, which time can never efface. When all things else shall be forgotten, then, and not till then, will Arnold and Treason cease to be regarded as synonymous terms:

O'er his grave shall the raven wing flap,
Ho, the false hearted!

Bashful.—There is a man down east, who says he dares not be honest now a-days, for fear they would laugh at him!

THE GATHERER.

THEATRICAL ANECDOTE.

In Paris the theatre is called Paradise. The duchess of Orleans took a fancy to go to the play one night with only a fille de chambre, and to sit there. A young officer who sat next to her was very free in his addresses: and when the play was over concluded by offering her a supper, which she seemingly accepted. He accompanied her down stairs, but was confounded when he saw her attendants and equipage, and heard her name. Recovering, however, his presence of mind he handed her into the carriage, bowed in silence, and was retiring, when she called out, 'where is the supper you promised?' He bowed and replied, 'In paradise we are equals: but I am not insensible of the respect which I owe you, madam on earth.' This prompt and proper reply obtained for him a place in the duchess's carriage, and a seat at her table.

DUELING.

Mr. Macklin once undertook in a lecture, at his school oratory, to show the cause of dueling in Ireland; and why it was much more the practice of that nation than any other. In order to do this in his own way, he began with the earliest part of the Irish history, as it respected the customs, the education, and the animal spirits of the inhabitants; and after getting as far as the reign of queen Elizabeth, he was again proceeding when Foote, who was present, spoke to order. "Well sir; what have you to say on the subject?" "Only to crave a little attention, sir," (says Foote with much seeming modesty) when I think I can settle this point in a few words."—"Well, go on."—"Why, then, sir," says Foote, "to begin, what o'clock is it?" "O'clock!" says Macklin, "what has the clock to do with a dissertation on duelling?"—"Pray sir," says Foote, "be pleased to answer my question." Macklin, on this pulled out his watch, and reported the hour to be half past ten. "Very well," says Foote, "about this time of the night, every gentleman in Ireland, that can possibly afford it, is in his third bottle of claret, consequently is in a fair way of getting drunk; from drunkenness proceeds quarrelling, and from quarrelling, duelling; and so there's an end of the chapter." The company seemed fully satisfied with this abridgement; and Macklin shut up his lecture for that evening in great dudgeon.

HENRY IV. OF FRANCE.

The mayor of a town in Burgundy, hearing that this prince was to pass that way, and thinking himself to be a great orator, determined to display his abilities on this occasion. When the prince approached, the burghers were put under arms, whilst the mayor at the head of the corporation pulling out a long piece of parchment began to harangue as follows: "Of all the towns that have the honor of being within the compass of your most serene highness' government, the very least would be overjoyed to make you sensible, that none has so great a zeal for your service, or affection for your person, as ours. We very well know, that the certain way of pleasing the greatest warrior of the present age, is to receive him with the thunderings of numerous artillery; but for us alas! it is impossible to fire one cannon, for eighteen reasons. The first is, that there never was any such thing as a cannon in this place, since it was built. The second—" "hold, hold," said the king: "I am so well satisfied with your first reason, that I shall excuse all the rest."

THE ROSE.

'I see all the flowers around me fade and die, and yet men call me alone the fading, the early perishing rose! Ungrateful man! Do I not make my span of life delicious enough to you? Yes, and even after death I build myself a monument in the sweet odors of perfumes and unguents, full of strength and refreshment; and yet I hear you sing and say, alas! the fading, the early perishing rose!'

Thus mourned the queen of flowers on her throne, perhaps already in the first sense of her waning beauty. A maiden, standing by, heard her, and answered,

'Be not displeased with us, sweet little one! Call not that unthankfulness which is, in truth, greater love, the promptings of tender affection. We see all the flowers around us die, and esteem it the fate of flowers; but these, their queen, these only do we wish and deem worthy to be immortal. Since we too, are deceived in our hopes, pardon us the sorrow which mourns ourselves in thee. All the beauty, youth, and joy of our life we liken to thee; and when their blossoms fade like thine, then, too, we sing and say, alas! the fading, the early perishing rose!

WHAT IS BEAUTY?

How various, and even opposite, are the notions which the natives of different countries entertain of personal beauty. Yet there can be no doubt that the expression of the soft emotions of benevolence, pity and love, as shown in the female face, is pleasing to all the world. The different opinions of beauty entertained in various countries, relate to color and to form; and these opinions arise from national customs, or certain prejudices widely extended, which alter the natural taste. In China, the chief beauty of woman is thought to consist in the smallness of their feet; as soon as girls are born, the nurses confine their feet with the tightest ligatures to prevent their growth. The women of Arabia color their eye-brows with a black powder, and draw a black line under their eyes, to make them appear more prominent and expressive. In the time of the old court, the faces of the Parisian ladies were spotted with patches and plastered with rouge. Lord Chesterfield, when at Paris, was asked by Voltaire, if he did not think some French ladies then in company, whose cheeks were fashionably tinted, very beautiful. "Excuse me," said Lord Chesterfield, from giving an opinion—for I am no judge of paintings." A well-looking Englishman, as he was travelling among the Alps, attracted much notice; but the natives thought his person deficient in one important point, which they flattered themselves was a local beauty. "How completely handsome" they said, "this Englishman would be, if he had like us, a swelling under his throat!"

Breaking the law for fun.—They have in Baltimore, as in this city, a law against smoking segars or pipes in the streets, and a very wise and provident law it is. A young sprig of dandyism in the former city the other day undertook to set the law at defiance, or to use his own expression, he "wished to break the law for the fun of seeing how he felt in doing it." He got his fun in the shape of a fine of $20 and costs, and went away with an evident determination not to enjoy any more such fun.

The Farrier and the Physician.—Dr. Moncey was once in company with another physician and an eminent farrier. The physician stated, that among the difficulties of his profession was that of discovering the maladies of children, as they could not explain the symptoms of their disorders. "Well," said the farrier, "your difficulties are not greater than mine, for my patients, the horses, are equally unable to explain their complaints." "Ah!" replied the physician, "my brother doctor must conquer me, as he has brought his cavalry against my infantry."

TEARS OF THE HERO OF AUSTERLITZ.—Who forgets the anecdote of Napoleon, and the village bells of Brienz? He was riding late one day over a battlefield, gazing stern and unmoved on the dying and the dead that strewn the ground by thousands about him, when suddenly "those evening bells" struck up a merry peal. The Emperor paused to listen; his heart was softened; memory was busy with the past; he was no longer the conqueror of Austerlitz, but the innocent, happy school-boy at Brienz; and dismounting from his horse, he seated himself on the stump of an old tree, and to the astonishment of Rapp, who relates the circumstance, burst into tears.—The rock was smitten, and the living waters gushed from it.

TOMBS OF INDIAN KINGS.—In Lambyaque, Peru, are to be seen the stupendous graves of the Indian Kings, which must have died in the time of Incas. These stupendous mounds of earth are just upon the outside of the city, and are built of sundried brick, and are of gigantic dimensions. Some of them are over three thousand feet in circumference, and over one hundred and fifty feet in height, and have required time and a deal of labor in their erection. One of them was opened in Truxillo, and silver and gold taken from it amounting to over $2,000,000. A company of merchants have been organized, and are about opening several others in search of more hidden treasures.

Henry IV. of France asked the Jesuit Cotton, "Would you discover to me the confession of a man who told you he was determined to assassinate me?" "No, I could not," said Cotton, "neither in honor nor conscience; but I would prevent his malice, by placing myself between him and you."

An old gentleman was asked, why he did not marry. He answered, I should not like an old woman.—Why not marry a young one, then, as you have property? He replied, if I should not be pleased with an old woman, how can I expect that a young one will be attached to me?

Battle of Agincourt.—A gentleman long famous for the aptitude of his puns, observing a violent fracas in the front area of a gin shop, facetiously termed it, "The battle of A-gin-Court."

A singer once complained to Sheridan that himself and his brother had been ordered to take ass' milk, but that on account of its expensiveness, he hardly knew what they should do. "Do," cried Sheridan, "why suck one another, to be sure."

Judge Toler, afterwards Lord Norbury, whose severity was at one time proverbial, was at a public dinner with Curran, and observed to him as he was carving a piece of corned beef, that if it was hung beef he would try a bit of it. If you try it, my Lord, replied Curran, it will certainly be hung.

A person once hearing a Lady sing who had a disagreeable breath, was asked how he liked it. "The voice is very good," said he, "but the air is intolerable."

Temperance man.—A son of the Emerald Isle who arrived in New York the other day, was asked by an acquaintance to take a glass of grog, and declined, giving as a reason for his refusal that he had joined the temperance society in Cork, before leaving Ireland.—His friend replied that that was no consequence, as a pledge given in Ireland was not binding here. To this piece of left handed morality, Pat indignantly retorted—"Do you suppose when I brought me body to America, I'd be afther laving me sowl in Ireland?"

A circumstance of rather a novel nature occurred yesterday in the Court House at the closing of the Criminal term. A native of the Emerald Isle, named Henry Smith, stepped forward in front of the bench, and stated to the Judges that he was on bail for Arson, for which crime he wished to be tried without delay, so that he might know whether he was to be hanged, transported or discharged; adding, with much nonchalance, in an undertone, that it was quite immaterial to him which was to be his fate. His securities were released, and he was bound over in his own recognizances to appear at the Court of Oyer and Terminer.—Montreal Herald.

An American Matron.—A lady of Matha's Vineyard, 88 years of age, who was the wife of an officer in the revolutionary army, has made with her own hands, twenty large and beautiful pin cushions, which have been received at the office of deposit in New Bedford for articles for the Bunker Hill Fair.

Rail Road to Canandaigua.—This morning at 4 o'clock, the first regular train of passenger cars started from this city for Canandaigua. This is a new epoch in the history of our city and her eastern neighbors.—The few miles between Batavia and Buffalo, are all that remain to complete the most rapid communication between Lake Erie and the Atlantic cities.—Roch. Dem. of Thurs.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, SEPT. 19, 1840.

An absence of nearly a week, must plead as an apology for any neglect in our paper of this week.

FOREIGN.—The British Queen arrived at New York, on Thursday last, and brings interesting intelligence. An extraordinary express was received from Paris at London, on the 1st instant, announcing that Mehemet Ali, had positively refused to comply with the quadruple treaty, and had determined to resist its execution force by force. Animated preparations for war are going on throughout Europe, Asia and Africa.—The English and French Journals are filled with long articles on the Eastern question, and the probability of war—the former show the rashness and folly of France in attempting to oppose the Four Powers—and the latter, the readiness and Power of France to meet whatever nation attacks her. Louis Philippe, and his family, have had a very narrow escape from shipwreck. In threading the channel, the vessel was driven by the violence of the winds and waves on the new jetty, where she grounded in a situation of imminent peril to all on board. As soon as it was possible to effect a debarkation, the king ordered every person to be landed, and was himself the last person who left the ship. There has been a tremendous storm at Liverpool, which has been attended with considerable damage. Several destructive fires have occurred in London, which has been attended with loss of life, and the destruction of upwards of one hundred thousand pounds. The Chinese continue busily engaged in making preparations for receiving the English expedition.

Full details are given in the London papers of the absurd attempt by Louis Napoleon—which, by the way, may be looked upon as extinguishing forever what little chance he may have had of ultimately succeeding in his designs upon France. The laugh is now turned against him, and Frenchmen will never risk their lives for one who has made himself ridiculous.

NEW SEAT OF GOVERNMENT IN U. C.—It is stated in the Kingston Chronicle that Kingston is decided upon as the seat of Government for Canada. The senior military officer at Toronto, has positive orders to remove his head quarters to Kingston with the greatest despatch. It is also said that the heads of the civil departments are soon to follow to the same place.

The Oswego Herald says, that the reports which have been flying through the country, of the blowing up of an aqueduct on the Welland canal, is without foundation. No such occurrence has taken place, and vessel are continually passing the canal. So that Lett has one less crime to answer for.

LOOK OUT.—Bills purporting to have been issued by the Farmer's Bank at Amsterdam, are in circulation at the West. The backs are red and of the denomination of one and two.

POMPEII.—It appears from the foreign papers that the work of exhuming or uncovering this 'city of the dead,' is still going on, and that a number of temples, statues and paintings have been found more perfect than any which had before been discovered.

DISTRESSING CASUALTY.—We copy the following heart-rending account from the Huntington, Pa. Journal:

On Monday of last week, while moving a small building formerly occupied as an office by J. G. Miles, Esq. Samuel Read, aged fifteen, son of Thomas Read, esq. of our town, unfortunately became entangled, and fell beneath the axle, (on which the building was placed,) when the building was moving. Owing to the great noise consequent upon all such occasions, it was impossible to succeed in stopping the pulling of the horses and the men, until he had been drawn a distance of at least twenty-five feet. The axle not being more than four or five inches from the ground, no part of the lad got under except his legs, one of which was almost torn off at the knee; at least the flesh was literally stripped from the bone. Immediate surgical attendance was procured, but the shaft had sped, and insatiable Death claimed as her victim the young and happy lad, who but a few short hours before had been exulting in all the buoyancy of health.

It was a shocking and an appalling sight to see him, without the least prospect of being able to assist him, crushed as it were alive into his grave; and it spread a general gloom over our town.

Business looking up.—Our exchanges from various sections of the country are beginning to tell the cheerful intelligence of business. The old, stale, and oft repeated song of "hard times," is giving way to the more agreeable information of better things. In Boston, New York and Philadelphia, there has, even within the last week, been a decided improvement in business. Our own city has also experienced a very considerable change. Merchants from the South and West are making their appearance for the purpose of purchasing their fall stock of goods. Clerks who have been idle for some time are getting situations—from morning till night there is a busy stir, indicating a decided advance in commerce. Money is not quite so tight. The truth is, we are beginning to cheer up, and may in a few weeks hence, anticipate a comfortable trade.—Bal. Upper.

FIRE.—A fire broke out yesterday, says the Baltimore American, in the extensive livery stables of Mr. J. Fitzpatrick. The whole building was destroyed, but the horses, of which there were a number, were saved. Loss $4500. Insurance $2000. The flames extended to the adjoining premises, occupied by Messrs. Daley as a chair factory; the chair ware rooms of A. P. Smith; the tinware factory of R. Collier; and Mr. Kennedy's Baltimore Tavern; all of which are more or less injured. The fire was, no doubt, the work of an incendiary.

A Negro Revolt in Louisiana.—It is stated in the New Orleans Picayune that some hundred peaceful slaves, having been wrought upon by some abolition incendiaries, broke out in a furious revolt, on the 25th ult., in the Parish of Lafayette, but the poor misguided blacks were soon taught their error, and forty of them were placed in confinement, while twenty sentenced to be hung upon the 27th. Four white abolition rascals were detected, acting as leaders in conjunction with one yellow fellow, who is notorious for being a great scoundrel.

Heavy Robbery.—A package of twenty thousand dollars of the Union bank of Louisiana, entrusted by Mr. Dumatrait, cashier of the branch at St. Martinsville, to the captain of the Arabian, to be delivered to the branch at Palquemine, was stolen in some manner from the boat during her passage between the two places. How the villain or villains accomplished their scheme, remains a mystery, as nothing has yet transpired to develop the rascality; but prompt measures are already taken, and confident hopes are entertained of securing the guilty and recovering the money.—[N. O. Picayune].

A GALLANT CLERGYMAN.—A lady was rescued from drowning in the Delaware at Trenton, on the 20th ult., by Mr. E. D. Smith, pastor of German Reformed Church. She fell from a floating log, while attempting to cross the water power raceway, and Mr. Smith, being near by, plunged in, and rescued her.

DREADFUL THUNDERSTORM.—On Friday evening the 7th instant, an awful destruction of life was produced by a thunderstorm which passed near Com'ahoe in South Carolina. In the moment of alarm, twenty negroes belonging to the Hon. Henry Middleton, repaired to a house as a place of refuge and were struck down by a vivid flash of lightning, of whom four escaped entirely unhurt, five were stunned, two were severely shocked, and horrible to relate, nine were killed on the spot.—Raleigh Register.

ACCIDENT.—Mr. Wm. Hanna, a merchant of Philadelphia, while gunning in Jersey on Friday afternoon, had one of his hands shattered by the bursting of his gun.—[Phil. Gazette].

Unfortunate Accident.—A young man named Bannister, a fireman on one of the locomotives of the Boston and Worcester rail road, on Friday afternoon, during the movement of the engine from the engine house at Worcester, unfortunately fell upon the track, and a wheel of the tender passed over his ankle. It was so severely injured that amputation was necessary. His brother, who was employed on one of the engines of the Norwich rail road, was severely injured on the same day and both were carried to the house of another brother in Worcester. The wound of the latter is believed not to be dangerous.—Boston Daily Advertiser.

A black boy of 14, named John Williams, accidentally killed himself at Gettysburg, Pa., a few days since. He had been gunning, and it supposed, from the circumstances, was sitting on the fence loading his gun, when it was discharged, and the ramrod entered near the eye, and passed through the head, protruding from the back of the head about an inch and a half, producing, no doubt, instant death. In this situation he was found. It was impossible to extricate the ramrod, and it was cut off upon each side.

Literary Festival.—The annual commencement of Brown University, was celebrated at Providence, on Wednesday last, and the exercises appear to have given general satisfaction. This institution has been built up and supported by private liberality, the legislature of the State never having public spirit enough to bestow any grant upon it. No honorary degrees were conferred. President Wayland, probably, thinking they had been heretofore distributed in too plentiful a manner.

Do not kill your Bees.—The common puff ball, or fungus maximus, gathered at this season of the year and dried so as to hold fire, has a stupefying effect, upon bees, and renders them as harmless as brimstone does without the deadly effects of the fumes of the latter article.

Poisoned by Cheese.—Nine boys, between the ages of eleven and fourteen, residing in the neighborhood of Seventh and Coates street, were all taken very ill on Saturday afternoon from eating some cheese that they had purchased, among other refreshments, to celebrate a little innocent frolic gotten up among themselves. Several of them came nigh dying. Yesterday they were all doing well.—Phil. Gaz.

POETRY.

THE WATERFALL—A LAY.

BY T. H. CUSHMAN.

In a deep glen's seclusion, refreshed and alone,
I mused where the cataract's wild waters stray;
The voice of the bird and the wind's gentle tone,
Like lovers unheeded, went sighing away.

As those waters came tumbling a-down the blue steep,
And foamed like a courser along the rough path;
I thought of the passions that headlong will leap
And cover our hopes with the fury of wrath.

But yet, as they sank in the clear pool below,
A feeling of joy in my bosom arose; [flow,
For I thought how those passions will stay their rude
When met by Affection's sweet smile of repose.

Oh then, as the rainbow appeared in the spray, [night,
Like the brightness of stars mid the loneliness of
I asked who will falter in Life's rugged way,
While Love hath its rainbow of Peace and Delight!

And oft in my wandering fancy again
I live o'er that moment, so radiant with bliss;
For Mem'ry will picture each scene on my brain,
And sigh for the joy of that love-lit abyss.

MASONIC ODE.

Let Fancy rear her gorgeous pile,
To please with art the tasteful eye,
On shadows based—with ruthless hand
Time sweeps it off while hastening by;
By Wisdom planned, our temple rears
Its arch above the lofty spheres!

And Strength his massive pillar lends,
The glorious fabric to sustain.
On which, in wildest rage and strife,
The elements may pour in vain.
Fixed on a rock it stands secure,
And will eternally endure!

Beauty, with chaste and lovely hand,
Adorns the work thus ably done,
Completing with the richest grace
The dwelling of the Holy One;—
Her meanest gem will far outvie
The rarest pearl that wealth can buy!

Thus formed our Temple, let our hearts
Be worthy of a place within,
Ranged round its altars, safe
From the polluting touch of sin;
Bound by the tip of mutual love,
Find peace on earth, and bliss above!

FAME.

High on the crimson car of fame
I saw the victor ride;
He came from far through flood and flame,
In all the pomp of pride;
And loud the war-trump pierced the skies—
All hail! the conqueror comes!
From every hill let shouts arise,
And sound, ye doubling drums.

The crimson crown the conquerer wore,
Waved o'er the conqueror's head;
But his right arm was red with gore;
A hundred hearts had shed:
A hundred hills in echoes rung,
O'er ocean's sounding surge—
A hundred harps awoke and sung
Of Europe's dreadful scourge.

They sung the fame of him whose scroll
A tide of tears had wet;
They sung the fame of him whose soul
Had oft in murder met,
And oft had spread dark midnight o'er
The weeping widow's mind,
And wrote her griefs with human gore:
Dread vampire of mankind,

No so with him who wore the plume
When fair Columbia bled;
The sun that set on Vernon's tomb
Smiled on the mighty dead;
The blood that dyed Columbia's land
Was paid for liberty;
The great, the good, and glorious bond,
The western world set free.

The scroll of him who sleeps in earth
Gave liberty a name;
And virtue's heroes then had birth,
And virtuous valor fame.
Gore gush'd from many a hundred veins
On that immortal morn:
Great God! 'twas then were rent the chains
Of millions yet unborn.

"THE WHIP-POOR-WILL."

Above this still and sleeping world
Of ours, the meditative Night
Her starry pinions has unfurled,
And in a wide and shadowed flight,
From her dark, jewelled throne on high,
Has flung her star gems to the air;
And in the deep blue rolling sky,
Spread out her glorious beauties there.

The breeze has folded up its wing—
The weary winds have gone to rest—
And weeping the willows fling
Their tresses on the river's breast.
The songsters of the air had flown,
To dream the hours of night away,
And one far voice is heard alone
To sing a requiem for the day.

And list—'tis from yon mountain's brow,
The ever pensive whip-poor-will!—
Her midnight song in music now
Comes floating o'er the waters still:
Hushed are the low tones of the flute,
That erst in sweetness flowed along,
And all the listening earth is mute,
As swells that night-bird's lonely song.

Through all the glaring day, the bird
Sits musing in the greenwood shades,
And its clear voice is only heard
When twilight in the azure fades:
'Tis then beside the placid stream,
That gently winds around a hill,
I love to sit, and dream,
And listen to the whip-poor-will.

How gladly light winged fancy flies,
To revel in its youthful sky,
And what dear recollections rise,
As thus I muse on days gone by;
I may forget my childhood's friends,
I may forget my native hill,—
But not while heaven above me lends,
The music of the whip-poor-will.

I hear it in the twilight hour,
I hear it in my midnight dreams,
And when I yield to memory's power,
An echoed strain of music seems
To float around my wandering brain,
And links together scenes of joy.
Which, in my musings, once again
Make's me a happy dreaming boy!

Addressed to a beautiful little girl of four years old, sitting in her baby house, surrounded with her play-things.

BY A LADY.

Little queen of infant treasure,
Smiling on thy throne of pleasure,
Happy in each fancied blessing,
More than monarchs, worlds possessing.
Culling sweets from every rose
That in the fairy garden blows:
Thy breast as yet untaught by sighs,

To check the transports as they rise;
No dread thy little bosom fills,
Of physical or moral ills.
With pure delight thy eye surveys
The splendid toys that round thee blaze;
Nor could a richer joy be thine,
Did all Polosi yield her Mine.
Thy tiny cup of silver, brings
A sweeter draught than cups of Kings.
The doll, for whom thy love prepares
These emblems of maternal cares,
For whom this little hoard is spread,
For whom thou deck'st this little bed,
Obedient to thy magic wand,
Still eats or sleeps at thy command;
And though thou play'st the mother's part,
No mother's pang corrodes thy heart.
O, ever might thy future years
Be thus exempt from hopes and fears!
Thus with smooth current glide away,
While beams of joy, thus round thee play,
But thou a blended lot must share,
And with the blessing take the care.
Then, lovely Betsy, hug thy toys,
Unsuited source of infant joys;
And, while thou can'st, the pleasure keep,
To lull thy waxen babe asleep,

A FRAGMENT

Eternity! Oh thou recording angel,
That dost with thy unwasting pen, dipp'd deep
In dies of heaven, write the long fates of men,
And angels' fates, thine own—Thou who hast oft
Stamp'd with eternity's broad seal, the doom
Irrevocable—What is eternity?

Thou first created spirit, eldest born
Of Heaven—Nature's first son; that sprung to life
Some time in the far eternity—
Thou most sagacious Seraph, thou hast cast
Thy daring look farthest into the future—
Tell me, What know'st thou of Eternity?

Gabriel, of giant intellect! and thou,
If indeed thou art a creature, Michael!
Bid thy far excursive fancy, farther
To trace the untravell'd path of thought, and see
If there be not, in some long distant stage
Of the mind's progress, a vast Idea
That may embrace the whole Eternity?

Or, if thou hast been taught to read what God
Alone could write, the volume of foreknowledge—
Say, if among the latter pages, that treat
Of high inventions, it be not written,
That some tall Seraph, by long stretch of thought
And force of high wrought genius, shall disclose
The way, now hid in mystery, by which
To know Eternity, and estimate
This grand ingredient of heaven and hell.

MASONRY AND REPUBLICANISM.

It has been well remarked, in regard to the history of Masonry in modern times, that it has received countenance and protection from governments, in proportion as the people were free and enlightened. It is true there have been redeeming exceptions to this general course of events, and despotic princes have been brought to see its light and beauty, and have saved the Institution from the vengeance of its enemies. In looking into the history of the persecutions which the Craft have been called to endure at different periods, the fact is striking, that where Masonry has been most bitterly opposed, when it has languished under the unrelenting vengeance of religious bigotry, or civil despotism, the people at large have also felt the scourge of both, and the reason is obvious—the Institution being in its nature free and independent, would naturally become a special mark for the hatred and persecution of tyrants who permitted nothing to exist that was calculated to enlighten mankind and give them a true idea of natural right and justice. It found no haven more secure than in Great Britain, where no attempt to repress its usefulness has ever been seriously made except under the reign of the haughty Elizabeth.—Hence it was transplanted into a land, of all others, the most congenial to its prosperity, even our own free republic; and here, located under a government free in its constitution and securing freedom to all its citizens, has Masonry found a home of security, a field of usefulness, where it might pursue the even tenor of its way, declining "under the shade of its own vine and fig tree, and where none dared to make it afraid;" and thus shall it ever be, so long as our national Institution shall remain unimpaired. In a word, so long as the American people shall be free, Masonry shall be free, unmoved by the storm that has been brewed by the crafty designs of disappointed ambition and urged on by deluded ignorance.

ARCH MASONRY.

The degree of Royal Arch Mason, "is one of the most august, sublime, and important in the order of Freemasonry, and is the summit and perfection of ancient Masonry." There can be little doubt that it was primitively reckoned the fourth degree in order, and was originally conferred in Lodges. In England, we believe, and certainly in many parts of Europe, it is now so reckoned and conferred. The Chapters of Pennsylvania as holden "under the authority and sanction of a regular subsisting warrant granted by the Grand Lodge, according to the old institution; and the G. M. of the Grand Lodge for the time being is, ex-officio, at the head of the Grand Chapter. The Arch is, in Pennsylvania, as in South Carolina, considered to be the fourth degree. In this, and most of the other States, it is conferred as the seventh; and the Chapters are independent of the Grand Lodge, as are also the Encampments and Councils.

Each Chapter has power to confer the preparatory degrees of M. M. and M. E. M., and are under the jurisdiction of Grand Chapters, composed of the H. P., K. and S. of the Chapters within a certain State or District. Grand Chapters were established in Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut and New York, in the year 1798; in Vermont, 1806, South Carolina, 1812; Maryland and District of Columbia, 1814; Ohio and Kentucky, 1816; New Hampshire, 1819; Maine and Georgia, 1821; North Carolina, 1822; New Jersey, Virginia and Alabama, unknown. Chapters are also holden, under the jurisdiction of the General Grand Chapter, in Michigan, Tennessee, Missouri, Mississippi, Indiana and Delaware.

It will be seen that, until the year 1765, no Grand Chapter of Royal Arch Masons was organized in America. Prior to that date, a competent number of companions, possessed of the requisite abilities, under the sanction of a Master's Warrant, proceeded to exercise the rights and privileges of Royal Arch Chapters, whenever they thought it expedient and proper.

This unrestrained mode of proceeding was subject to many inconveniences; unsuitable characters might be admitted; irregularities in the mode of working introduced; the purposes of the Society perverted; and thus the Order be degraded by falling into the hands of those who might be regardless of the reputation of the Institution. If differences should arise between two Chapters, who was to decide upon them? If unworthy characters should attempt to open new Chapters, for their own emolument, or for the purposes of conviviality, who was to restrain them? If the established regulations, or ancient land-marks should be violated or broken down, where was there power sufficient to remedy the evil?

Sensible of the existence of these and many other inconveniences, the Chapters in nearly every part of the United States have, therefore, formed Grand Royal Arch Chapters, for their better government and regulation. In the year 1797, a convention of representatives from the several Chapters in the State of Pennsylvania, met at Philadelphia, and, after mature deliberation, formed a Grand Royal Arch Chapter for that State.

Actuated by similar motives, on the 24th of October, 1797, a convention of committees from several Chapters in the northern States, assembled at Boston; being appointed to meet with any or every Chapter of Royal Arch Masons within the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Vermont and New York, or with every committee or committees duly appointed and authorised by any or all of said Chapters and to deliberate upon the propriety and expediency of forming and establishing a Grand Chapter of Royal Arch Masons, for the government and regulation of the several Chapters with the said States.

Of this convention, the Most Excellent Thomas Webb was chosen chairman. The convention having taken the matter into consideration, came to a determination to forward to each of the Chapters within the six States before mentioned, a circular letter, expressive of their opinions on the subject, and recommending a meeting of delegates to be holden at Hartford, in the State of Connecticut on the fourth Wednesday of January, 1798, investing them with full power and authority to form and open a Grand Chapter of Royal Arch Masons, and to establish a constitution for the government and regulation of all the Chapters then, or thereafter to be erected within the said State.

In consequence of this address, the several Chapters within the States therein enumerated, appointed delegates who assembled at the time and place appointed, and after several days deliberation, formed and adopted a constitution for the government of the Royal Arch Chapters and Lodges of Mark Masters, Past Masters, and Most Excellent Masters, throughout said States, and having elected and installed their Grand Officers, the Grand Chapter was completely organized.

Agreeable to the constitution thus adopted, Grand Royal Arch Chapters were established in several northern States where there were Chapters of Royal Arch Masons existing; and in every instance the private Chapters have united with, and acknowledged the authority of the said Grand Chapters.

The long derived and necessary authority for correcting abuses, and regulating the concerns of Royal Arch Masonry in the Northern States being thus happily established, the sublime degrees became flourishing and respectable. Royal Arch Masons in the southern States, observed with satisfaction, the establishment of Grand Chapters in the northern States, under the authority of a general constitution, and became desirous of uniting with them under the same authority. Applications were accordingly made for the privilege of opening new Chapters in the southern States; but there being no provision made in the constitution for extending its authority beyond the limits first contemplated, the State Grand Chapters took the subject into consideration, and passed a concurrent decree vesting power in the three first General Grand officers, or any two of them, conjointly to grant and issue letters of dispensation for the institution of Lodges of Mark Masters, Past Masters, Most Excellent Masters, and Chapters of Royal Arch Masons, within any State in which there was not a Grand Chapter established.

At a succeeding meeting of the General Grand Chapter, the powers before mentioned were confirmed and made permanent in the General Grand Officers, and the proceedings of the General Grand Officers under the decree before mentioned were approved and confirmed.

On the 9th January, 1806, the General Grand Chapter met at Middletown, Connecticut, and having resolved itself into a committee of the whole, upon the General Grand Royal Arch Constitution, sundry resolutions and amendments were proposed and considered, and afterwards ratified and confirmed, by the General Grand Chapter.

Among other amendments was the following, viz:—The style and title to be, "The General Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the United States." The jurisdiction was declared to extend throughout the United States, and to any state or Territory wherein no Grand Chapter was regularly established. The meetings of the General Grand Chapter were held semi-annually in the city of New York.

The origin of Royal Arch Masonry, is traced to the erection of the second Temple, 532 years before Christ, when, in the fulfilment of prophecy, the founders of this degree, repaired from Babylon to Jerusalem, to rebuild the house of the Lord, which had been destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. Although the number through whose fidelity we have received the information it imports, is comparatively small, yet the identity of the facts, in different countries, and among men of different languages, affords conclusive evidence of their truth. We cannot close this article better in words of Cutbush;—"The very principles of the institution of Arch Masonry cannot fail to arrest our attention, and call forth our active powers, in the contemplation of a field so extensive, and a superstructure so exalted. Indeed, knowing from experience the truth of this assertion, I can add without hesitation, that it is one of the most sublime, august, and beautiful systems with which the world has ever been enriched. And as it comprehends in itself, many important particulars with which the Master Mason is totally unacquainted, and without which, as we have before observed, the Masonic character cannot be complete, it certainly claims the attention of every member of the Institution."

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

FACILITY OF SWIMMING.—The lighter the body is in relation to its magnitude, the more easily will it float, and a greater portion of the head will remain above the surface. As the weight of the human body does not always bear the same proportion to its bulk, the skill of the swimmer is not always to be estimated by his success; some of the constituent parts of the human body are heavier, while others are lighter, bulk for bulk, than water. Those persons in whom the quantity of the latter bear a greater proportion of the former, will swim with a proportionate facility.

PROOF SPIRIT.—If oil which rises to the surface of water, be mixed with alcohol or some other spirit, it will settle at the bottom. A weaker spirit is heavier, bulk for bulk, than a stronger one, and its strength may be so far reduced that it will no longer float on the surface of oil, but will sink below it, this is the test which fixes the strength of proof spirit. All spirit which floats upon oil is said to be above proof.

DIFFICULTY OF WALKING IN WATER.—Every one who, while bathing, has walked in the water, is sensible how small a weight rests upon the feet. If the depth be so great that the body is immersed to the shoulders, the feet are scarcely sensible on the bottom. The want of sufficient pressure in this case renders the body easily upset. In attempting to ford a river in which there is a current, considerable danger is produced by this cause; even though the river should be sufficiently shallow to leave a large portion of the body above the surface. The pressure on the bottom being diminished by the buoyancy of the liquid, the feet have a less secure hold on the ground, and the force of the current acting on that part of the body which is immersed, without affecting that part of the body which is above the surface, has a tendency to carry away the support of the feet.

Palm wine.—This beverage, which is often mentioned by the ancients, is obtained by making an incision of the palm-tree, and inserting a quill or reed, through which the juice exudes. It is very pleasant to the taste, but powerfully intoxicating; and people in the East are frequently amused by observing its effects on lizards, which, as soon as the tree is left by those who have been extracting the liquor, run up and such it with eager delight. They soon become intoxicated, and in that state lie listless, looking up in the face of the spectator with a stupid stare. Parrots and other birds also sip the palm wine, but they seem to be proof against its effects, or else they are seasoned toppers, for none have ever been observed to be the worse of it.

Colour of the Air.—The atmosphere is in the same circumstances; the colour from even a considerable portion of it, is too faint to be perceptible. Hence the air which fills an apartment, or which immediately surrounds us when abroad, appears colourless and perfectly transparent. But when we behold the immense mass of atmosphere through which we view the firmament, the colour is reflected with sufficient force to produce distinct perception. But it is not necessary for this that so great an extent of air should be exhibited to us as that which forms the whole depth or thickness of the atmosphere. Distant mountains appear blue, not because that is their colour, but because it is the colour of the medium through which they are seen.

EASIER TO SWIM IN A SEA THAN IN A RIVER.—Sea water has a greater buoyancy than fresh water, being relatively heavier, and hence it is commonly said to be much easier to swim in the sea than in a river; this effect, however, appears to be greatly exaggerated. A cubic foot of fresh water weighs about 1000 ounces; and the same bulk of sea water weighs 1028 ounces; the weight, therefore, of the latter, exceeds the former by only 28 parts in 1000. The force exerted by fresh water by about one thirty-sixth part of the whole force of the latter.

Advantage of Rail-Roads over Canals.—The moving power has in each case to overcome the inertia of the load; but the resistance on the road, instead of increasing as in the canal, does not increase at all. The friction of a carriage on a rail road moving 60 miles an hour, would not be greater than if it moved but one mile an hour, while the resistance in a river or canal, were such a motion possible, would be multiplied 3500 times. In propelling a carriage on a level rail-road, the expenditure of power will not be in a greater ratio than that of the increase of speed, and therefore the cost will maintain a proportion with the useful effect; whereas, in moving on a canal or river, every increase of speed, or of useful effect, entails an enormously increased consumption of the moving principle.

MISCELLANY.

From the Dublin Literary Port Folio.

THE NARROW ESCAPE.

Terrence was a stout, broadfaced, good-humoured boy about fifty, who would rather talk than work, and rather sing than do either. He was a sort of agricultural dependant upon Farmer Mullins: he was his hedger, his ditcher, reaper, mower, gardener, and factotum; and the farmer won by his humor and good nature, kept him as a hanger, on about the farm, more than for any particular industry of which he was seldom found guilty.

An elderly gentleman, who lodged in the farm-house, had been repeatedly amused with the vocal powers of Terrence, particularly at day break, when he had much rather "his morning's winged dreams" had not been broken, as he heard him pass to the stable, where he was to perform the augural process. Terrence had just rested himself on his pitchfork, to give more effect to the last cadence of "Sheela na Guira," when the gentlemen complimented him by saying, "You've a fine voice of your own, Terrence."

"Faith, sir," replied he, "you may say that, and thank God for it, although it had like to have been the ruin of me, so it had."

"The ruin of you, my good fellow, how so?"

"I can soon incense you how, sir," said he; "but you should hear the songs first, and by them you will see what they had nearly done for me."

"Well, Terrence," said the gentleman, "if you will come in, in the evening, and sing me the songs, I'll hear your story, and give you a half-a-crown."

"Oh, by dad, that I'll do! and thank your honor," said Terrence. So according, he brushed his brogues, washed his shining face, put on his long-tailed grey frieze, and made himself "clean and dacent," to go into the priscence, and made his bow among the family party, and commenced "The Groves of Blarney," "The Cruiskeen," "The Boys of Kilkenny," Donybrook Fair," and many others, when he came to a full stop.

"Now, sir," says he, "I'll give you the one that was near the ruin of me." This was none other than "The Wake of Teddy Roe," a song as well known as the writer S. W. Ryley author of the Itinerant; which, when Terrence had finished, he said "There, sir, that's the one; and I never sing it, but I think of the narrow escape I had. And now I'll tell you how that was I was loading the cart with manure, God help me!—one morning, and singing that song, when a gentleman came by, and stood to listen to me. Faith! I little thought of the mischief he was putting on me. 'You've an excellent voice,' says he, 'my boy and that's a good song you're singing.' 'Faith, I have sir' for I had been told it often before; 'and for the song, shure it bates Bannohir and that bates all the world entirely.' 'Well, says he, 'have you any more of them songs?'"

"Shure I have, sir," says I; "one for every day in the week." "Well, then, come up to my house in Dublin, and sing all you know, and I will see what I can do for you; but would you be afraid to sing before a large company?" "Not in the least, sir; the larger the better, and then they'll hear at once."

"He told me where he lived; and accordingly I went, and was shewed up to a most beautiful drawing-room, where sat one beautiful crater at the piano and another at the harp. 'Terrence O'Farrell,' says I to myself, 'bould yourself up, you're among quality intirely; and sure enough there was a great company. One of the beautiful craters handed me, with her own hands, a glass of wine, saying, 'Take this, Mr. O'Farrell, before you begin.' 'Och,' that I, 'Mister O'Farrell,—but I wish mother heard that.' So I plucked up a spirit, and says I, 'I'm obleeged to you, ma'am, for the compliment, but barriu its all the same to you. I'll sing 'better afther the smallest taste in life of whiskey.' So wid that, the gentleman up and filled a cruiskeen for me, and that made all the differ wid me. 'Will, I sit down, or stand up, sur?' says I. 'As you please,' said the gentleman. 'Well, then, as you're all sated, shure I'd be but one like yourselves, so I'll stand up, and then I can give ye the thruc maning.' Well, to be sure, I sang to their entire satisfaction, and grate diversion they had wid me.

"When I finished, 'Now,' says the gentleman, 'Terrence, I'll give you thirty shillings a week to sing me three of them songs three times a week.' I soon agreed to the bargain; and putting the card he gave me with a trifle of writing on into my pocket, which I did not stop to make out, I made the best of my way home, to tell my mother how my fortune was made all at once.

"Well, as luck would have it, who should be setting wid my mother but Tim Dooley. Now Tim had been brought up at the Sunday School, and had the gift, more nor any other man, a mighty proud he was—for there was no speaking to him since he larned to read and write—but he'd no notion of singing. Well, 'May be,' thought I, 'Mister Tim, you won't be so consequence, when you see who the rich man is before you.' So I up and told them all I'd done, and sung, and said. May be my mother's eyes did not shine, the ould cratur! and may be she did not bless her son Terry.—Faiks she did; but it was left Tim Dooley to spoil all.

"Where is this you are to go to?" says he. 'Och; wait awhile till I show you,' says I. 'Show me the ticket,' says he; and taking it out of my pocket, he set up such a howl! 'What's come over you, sir?' says I. 'Och hone! och hone! is it come to this you are?—is it going to disgrace your family you are?—and the mother that's sitting before you?' Shure I thought there was some ill wind in the mighty good fortune all of a suddint. But for you to bring your ould mother with sorrow to the grave, by goings on of the like, is what she neither deserves from you.' 'Let's be knowing my sin,' says I 'and I'll thank you.' Faith here's your sin and your shame before you; and if you go to the place of this present writing,' says Tim. 'why, you're a lost mah, that's all!' 'Will you please to give us the benefit of your larning now, and no more words from you,' says I, not very well pleased at the sarmon he was beginning, 'and let's see the way I am going to my ruin?' 'Shure it's straightforward foreint you here.' And he read the direction—'Mr. Ryder, manager of the Theatre Royal, Crow Street, Dublin!!!' 'Och, save my poor boy!' says my mother. 'And has your mighty fine pipe brought you to this disgrace?' says Tim. 'Och, the spalpeen!' says I. 'to go to make a layatrical of a dacent woman's child! Och, is that the game you're after, M. Ryder? And if I'd known that, may be but I would have seen you, and all your iligant friends, hanging by the fifth wheel of Pharo's chariot in the Red Sea, before I'd call up my lungs for your diversion.'

'Well I burned the card before ther faces, and blessed the star that lit Tim to the cabin that night, to save me from the narrow escape I had of being ruined man by my beautiful voice, bad luck to it! and from becoming a diverting vagabond by Act of Parliament.

CHARACTER OF THE PRINCESS AMELIA OF ENGLAND.

This princess, though very kind to her domestics as well as the poor in the vicinities of Cavendish-square and Gunnersbury, had all the German hauteur about her upon every occasion that she thought infringed upon her dignity. There was no relaxation in the minutest part of duty in her household, and she once dismissed a young page, though strongly recommended to her, because he did not pull off his hat, as she crossed one of the antichambers. His friends petitioned for him, pleading his youth and inadvertence, but in vain; she however made him a present of an Ensign's commission in a marching regiment.

Being at a party of whist in the rooms at Bath, an officer who stood by her chair, seeing her snuff-box open, on the table, imprudently took a pinch. The princess observing it, immediately called to one of her attendants, and desired him, in an imperious tone,

"to throw that snuff in the fire." The order was complied with, and the officer retreated in much confusion.

Another time being at a party of whist at Bath, and being partner to a young Irish Gentleman of rank, who was previously introduced to her, recollecting the state of the game she exclaimed, "Let me see! Oh! we are eight love!"—upon which the other, either misunderstanding the last expression, or from an ill-timed gallantry, replied, "Yes my dear." Upon this she immediately laid down her cards, paid her game, and left the room.

A young gentleman, remarkably tall, being one day, in the rooms at Bath, the Princess saw him, and asked who he was? Being answered about his name and family by a nobleman present, he added, "that the young gentleman was designed for the church."—"For the church, my Lord!" she cried with some surprise, "I should rather think for the steeple."

THE CROTON AQUEDUCT.

New Yorkers are not generally aware that in their Croton Aqueduct, they are surpassing Ancient Rome in one of her proudest boasts. None of the hydraulic structures of that city, in spite of the legions of slaves at her command, equal, in magnitude of design, perfection of detail, and prospective benefits, the Aqueduct which the City of New York is now constructing. The main trunk consists of an immense mass of masonry, six feet and a half wide, nine feet high, and forty miles long, formed of walls three feet thick cemented into solid rock. But this water channel, gigantic as it is, is far from being all the work. The dam across the Croton, which retains the water in a grand reservoir, is a mound of earth and masonry, forty feet high, and seventy feet wide at bottom, and has connected with it many complicated but perfect contrivances to enable the engineer to have complete control over the mighty mass of water. The river, thus thrown back toward its source, will form a lake of five hundred acres, which will retain a supply for emergencies of some thousand millions of gallons, and also offer as a collateral advantage, many picturesque sites for country seats upon the woody points which will jut out into its smooth basin. A tunnel leads the water from this reservoir into the Aqueduct, and eleven more of these subterranean passages occur before reaching Harlem River, having an aggregate length of seven-eighths of a mile, and many of them being cut through the solid rock. At intervals of a mile, ventilators are constructed in the form of towers of white marble, which give to the water that exposure to the atmosphere without which it becomes vapid and insipid; and these dazzling turrets mark out the line of the Aqueduct to the passengers upon the Hudson.

The streams which intersect the line of the structure, are conveyed under it in stone culverts, the extremities of which afford the engineers an opportunity of displaying their architectural taste. Sing-Sing creek, with its deep ravine, is crossed by a bridge of a single elliptical arch of eighty-eight feet span, and a hundred feet above the stream. Its unusually perfect workmanship was proved by its having settled but one inch after the centres were removed. The view of its massive grace from the narrow valley beneath, is one of the most striking points upon the line. Sleepy Hollow, well known to the readers of imaginative lore, is spanned by a series of graceful arches.

The Bridge crossing Harlem River has been the subject of much controversy. The admirers of magnificent symmetry and perfection, and those interested in preserving the navigation of that stream, have warmly advocated the erection of a bridge, over which the water might pass upon its regular level: while the friends of more measured economy, recommended a lower and cheaper structure to which pipes should descend and rise therefrom after the manner of an inverted syphon. The plan finally adopted is that of a High Bridge, but still with its surface ten feet below the usual grade, which falls 14th inches to the mile. It will be a quarter of mile long, 116 feet above high-water, and its estimated cost exceeds three-quarters of a million. Across this the water is conveyed in huge iron pipes, protected from the frost by a covering of earth four feet deep. Near Manhattanville is a tunnel, a quarter of a mile long, through the hill at that place and its valley is crossed by pipes descending 105 feet. Glendinning Valley is passed at an elevation of 40 feet, and arches of appropriate size, upon the lines of the streets, leave symmetrical carriage ways and foot walks. The Receiving Reservoir, thirty-eight miles from the starting point at the dam, covers 35 acres of ground, and will contain 160,000,000 of gallons. The Distributing Reservoir at Murray's Hill, covers 5 acres, and will hold 20,000,000 of gallons, which is secured from escape by a bank of puddled clay, supported by walls of granite, the external ones of which present massive yet tasteful fronts. From this point the ordinary distributing pipes convey the water into the city.—New Yorker

AN INCIDENT IN REAL LIFE.—The Philadelphia Inquirer relates the following affecting incident as having recently taken place in Philadelphia: A poor woman with an intemperate husband, who was all kindness and affection when the demon of drunkenness was not the master of his mind, had after various trials, abandoned the miserable man, and become a domestic in a family in the western part of the city. The husband, rendered desolate and desperate by this conduct on the part of his wife, plunged still more madly into the vice which had nearly destroyed him. For some days the poor wife, who, with all his faults, clung to him with the tenacity of woman's love, and still cherished a hope of his ultimate reform, could learn no tidings of him, and was miserable indeed. All his words of kindness and affection crowded upon her memory; she saw him only as he was in his early manhood, when he came to her with looks of gentleness and drew bright pictures of their wedded life, before he had lost his energy of spirit, had fallen a victim to the temptations of the convivial circle. She conjured up a thousand phantoms of his wretchedness and despair—of his sickness and death, with none to close his eyes or shed one tear of pity or of grief upon his lifeless corpse. The poor creature wandered about the house for a few days in deep mental distress, and almost unable to discharge the duties of her humble position.—She then went to the lady with tears in her eyes, confessed the weakness and virtue that was struggling in her bosom and asked permission to go in search of her unfortunate husband. It was granted freely and promptly, for the cunning eye of woman had already read the whole story in the features and the actions of the poor domestic. She was absent two weeks, when she returned, the very shadow of her former self, and clothed in a deep suit of mourning. She had found her wretched husband in some low hovel in the suburbs, the spark of life just flickering in the socket. He recognised his faithful wife—seized her hand, pressed it to his lips, and asked her forgiveness. She fell upon her knees, and as she joined her prayers with his, the soul of the poor drunkard parted from the body and passed onward to eternity. Her last farthing was expended in providing him with a decent burial, and when she related the story of his unhappy end, last embrace and dying smile, the heart of the poor woman seemed as if it would break with the convulsive nature of her grief. And such is woman's love!

THE EXECUTION OF MAJOR ANDRE.—Dr. Hall, of East Hartford, a surgeon in the army of the revolution was an eye witness to the execution of Major Andre, standing within four or five rods of the scene. Noticing some inaccuracies in the article we published from the Knickerbocker a few days ago, he has called and related to us the following particulars. He states that Andre walked to the place of execution behind the cart, accompanied by two officers, one on each side, and stopped under the gallows. Arrived there he immediately stepped up into the cart, when the officer of the day, Col. Scammell, said to him, if you have anything to say, you now have an opportunity.—He replied, I have nothing to say, but to have you bear witness that I die like a brave man. Col. S. then said to the hangman, do your duty. He went to work so awkwardly in attempting to put the noose over Andre's neck, that Andre took it from him and made an effort to do it himself. But his hat being in the way, he let go the rope took off his hat and stock and laid them on the coffin, and unbuttoned his shirt collar and turned it down. He then put the noose over his head, and adjusted it to his neck; took out of his pocket a white handkerchief, with which he bandaged his eyes; and a blue ribbon, which he handed to the executioner, requesting him to tie his hands behind him. This being done, Col. Scammell directed the cart to be driven away. Andre was a small man and seemed hardly to stretch the rope, and his legs dangled so much that the hangman was ordered to take hold of them and keep them straight. The body was cut down after hanging fifteen or twenty minutes and buried near the gallows. From the location of the grave, Andre must have passed it in going to the place of execution.

The Doctor thinks the account relative to the attempt made by Washington to secure Arnold and liberate Andre, must be incorrect. The Court which sentenced Andre to death having been held on the 29th September, only three days before his execution, the time allowed was not by any means sufficient to permit such plans to be successfully carried out especially the one in which Champe was said to have been concerned.

THE "DIVINE FANNY," continues to be the rage in our fashionable cities. Two hundred and eighty-seven dollars, was paid at the Tremont theatre at Boston, for the choice of boxes. The following remarks from the pen of Blackwood, are scorching, as applied to the Madame Taglioni. They may with equal propriety be applied to the fooleries of Fanny Elssler.—Speaking of Taglioni, he says:

"This woman, whose sole merit is that she dances well—of all merits the least meritorious—is actually fêted throughout Europe; received at the table of emperors and empresses, huzzaed by courts, presented with a purse of diamonds by one super opulent fool, and with a chariot with solid silver spokes to its wheels, by another—demanding for a few nights of pirouetting and bounding at the Italian opera, a sum which would feed the peasantry of a province for a month; amassing money which might raise the drooping sculpture, painting, music, and literature of an empire.

What was the engagement which Taglioni had the modesty to demand at the theatre of Drury Lane!—One hundred pounds a night for herself three nights a week, and £600 to be paid for the services of her father as ballet master; £900 to her brother and sister to dance with her; with two benefits to herself, guaranteed to her at £600, one-half a benefit to her brother, guaranteed at £200—in all £6,000! All this is monstrous; it actually disgusts the mind to think of such sums lavished on a parcel of jumpers—even the effrontery of the demand is offensive. Here a knot of the meanest of mankind—the very dross of partisan life—actually think their caperings worthy of being paid at a rate, which the liberality of nations has scarcely ever offered to their greatest benefactors. The noblest poet, the most profound philosopher, the greatest mechanical inventor, the most gallant soldier all would be regarded as exorbitantly overpaid by half the sum which those vulgar contributors to the cupidity of the Italian opera think themselves entitled to demand, and by the prodigal folly of fashion actually obtain.

The Many Headed Wheat.—The many headed wheat is an indigenous plant of California, six heads of which were procured by Major Spering from a man in the Osage nation of Indians, who had been trading in the Pacific Ocean. The six heads produced six hundred grains, which were planted by Mr. Pipeus Baker, of Abbeville, S. C., the production of which was ten thousand heads. The ground on which the wheat grew was measured by an accurate surveyor—the heads counted—and one head shelled out, and the grain weighed; a calculation was then made, the result of which was, the wheat produced at the rate of two hundred and thirty bushels to the acre. It was planted about the last of January, and cut on the 20th of June. The land on which it grew is poor and sandy and was unassisted by manure.—Wilkes County (Geo.) News.

FREYA THE FEARLESS.

THE BLACK BUCCANEER OF BARBADOES.

During the years 1810 and '11, I possessed a tolerably good berth on board the "Fire Fly," a new schooner, mounting twelve guns, eight nines, and four six-pounders. She was a remarkably fine vessel, sharp in the bows, a splendid sailer, and of the most exquisite mould that I think I have ever seen. Her run from stern to stern was in such perfect good taste, and there was such a proportionate, yet almost imperceptible rise in her quarter-deck and fore-castle, which added to the elegant and symmetrical form of her hull, the delicate tapering of her upper spars, the tautness and exactitude of her standing and running rigging, and the neatness of her general trim, excited an astonishing degree of pleasure and admiration in the eyes of every real sailor that looked upon her. Our station during these two years was the West Indies.

We sailed from Kingston on the 17th of October, 1810, and stood away to the south-eastward, with a bright azure sky and a smooth sea. Our cruise was to be one of six months, between eight and thirty-four degrees of N. latitude, and forty and seventy of W. longitude, and we were amply provided with every thing that might be necessary. Our craft had been newly coppered, and, with fresh paint and bunting flying, we made a most gallant appearance in going out of the harbor.

About this time, a pirate, unusually fortunate and audacious, had chosen to make the West Indian seas the scene of his depredations. A great many heavily laden ships of all nations, and from all parts of the world, fell into his hands. The crews were generally treated in the most barbarous manner; often their lives were sacrificed, or they were subjected to the most cruel tortures.

This rascal was known throughout the islands by the name of the "Black Buccaneer of Barbadoes;" that fanciful piece of alliteration having been assigned to him, first, because he was born in that island, and next, because his distinguishing colors were sable. His mode of proceeding was this: under the flag of some friendly nation he used to decoy every vessel that he thought he could master into his power, then, when they were alongside of him, down went his assumed ensign, and up went his own black bunting. The conflict was seldom of long duration: of boarding he was very fond, and at it, very expert. A thousand varying statements were made of his vessel and force. By some, the former was described as a large schooner, carrying eighteen guns; by others, as a powerful brig of twenty; and again, as a small frigate of four-and-twenty. His crew was computed at between two and three hundred, and some even went so far as to make it amount to a much larger number. However, all agreed in maintaining that he was a most bloody and truculent fellow, and that his vessel was one of the fastest sailers known. Many insisted that no man would be suffered to infest the ocean with such daring impunity, and to defy the power of the law with such barefaced effrontery, unless protected by some evil spell. Some even rumored that he had disposed of his soul to the Evil One, in consideration of his protection, or hinted that he was the very devil himself, in propria persona. His nom du guerre of "Freya the Fearless," added to the general terror; and the fact strongly asserted to, by-the-way, that one day he was seen twenty leagues to the eastward of the Bermudas, in a heavy squall, with his main-topmast down, and in a most perilous condition, and the same evening running between Guadaloupe and Dominica, corroborated the reports of that mystical character which had so ready been assigned to him.

I was told, when in Jamaica, by a person who knew him well, that he was a Spanish Creole, of gigantic stature and fierce aspect; that his crew was composed of refugees, and vile characters, of all nations; men, whose crimes, or violent dispositions had exiled them from their several countries, to the amount of one hundred and ninety, or two hundred, and that knowing, were they caught, gibbets and ropes would be their only greeting on reaching the shore, they were fierce and desperate to the last degree. The accounts of the pirate's force, as I observed before, were so vague and contradictory, that no reliance could be placed on them. We went off, notwithstanding, with no small expectation of coming up with, taking, and bringing him into port.

After two day's sail, with a smart breeze at N. N. W. before which we made good way, the wind chopped round to the east, and after much fluctuation settled in the N. E. by E. Towards the evening of the 20th a dense band of rainy blue clouds, rose majestically to the windward, picturing that quarter of the ocean of an inky hue, and marking out the horizon with its white spray with great distinctness. The breeze began to fag and grow capricious, and seemed inclined to blow up into a gale, so our top-gallant clew-lines were manned, and the royal yards sent down on deck.

The night was as dark as pitch. The wind had gone down, and left us with heaps of heavy vapors right over head. The moon was struggling hard among groups of ragged clouds and cold grey mists, but every now and then a long and solitary pale beam would burst out, and light up a strip of sea in the distance, showing us the tumbling waves, gleaming and flashing like liquid silver, and then it would fade gradually away, and appear quite unexpectedly in another place. The dull glimmering of the sky, and the heavy, monotonous sound of the sea, dashing up against the bows and cutwater, had a lulling effect upon the senses of all on deck.

About ten o'clock, the look-out on our starboard-horn thought he saw something like a speck in the south-westward, and communicated his discovery to Peter Luff, the officer of the watch. While he was speaking, a man stationed in the fore-top sung out, "Sail ho!"

"Where away?"

"Right on our lee-bow, sir," returned the man.

"What kind of craft is she?"

"I can't distinguish sir. While you were speaking, a heap of mists drove smack before her."

Of course, we were all bustle immediately. Just as I jumped hastily on deck, a misty moonbeam glanced out from a silvery break, in one of the clouds to leeward, about two cables' length ahead of the "Fire Fly," and glided along the heaving expanse of water right in the stranger's direction. We looked out with impatience as it sailed along, till at last it settled upon him, and lighting up the sea in its immediate neighborhood, a white sail was distinctly to be seen, in the quarter where it had been discovered.

The officers began to collect in a close group on the quarter deck, scanning the object of our curiosity, some with glasses, and the remainder with their unaided eyes.

"Tack," said our Skipper, in an under tone, and we tacked accordingly; and as we brought the ship's head up to meet the wind, the water rushing up to, and flashing beneath our bows, flung at intervals, with a sudden splash upwards, a shower of fairy moonlit gems. The stranger was not long before he caught a glimpse of us, and tacked likewise, standing partly in our direction, for his course, when first seen, was S. W. inclining S. As he came bowling along we could discern, by a little help from the partial moonlight, and a great deal from our glasses, that the vessel was a large brig, under courses, jib and topsails, the latter single reefed.

"Starboard!" said our captain, as soon as he was enabled to make out these particulars.

"Starboard, 'tis sir," returned our man at the wheel.

"Now keep her steady for a little while. Boatswain's mate, pipe to quarters."

"Aye, aye, sir!"

We soon came up within hailing distance. The brig had got across our bows, and he was now pulling away at his lee-braces, and shortening sail. I was trying through the night-glass to make out her bunting. I counted nine ports in her broadside, and after a great deal of difficulty perceived the scarlet stripes and white stars of the United States. Meanwhile, he had backed his main-top-sail, and we hailed her.

"Ho! the brig, ahoy—a!"

"Hillo!" came faintly through the gloom.

"What vessel is that?"

"The American gun-brig, 'Snarler,' from Boston."

"Very well; Where are you bound to?"

"Rio Janeiro!"

"All very good," said our skipper, in an under tone, taking the trumpet from his mouth, after he had desired them to send a boat on board us. "You put a good face on it—but for all that, I'm thinking you're little better than you should be. What do you think my lad, (to me,) of the account he has given of himself?"

"I'm much of your opinion," said I; "those are not the colors the fellow intends to fight under, depend upon it!"

"Ten to one you're right. You at the helm there luff! luff up! luff, sir! Mr. Brace, (our lieutenant,) cast loose the guns."

We waited a long time, but nothing seemed to stir on board the brig. We hailed her a second time, but got no answer; all was still as the grave. "This is our man, depend on it," said Captain Taffril; "prepare yourselves, for we shall have a tough bout of it. Take my word for it, she is not so quiet for nothing. There's a squall brewing, or I'm a Dutchman; and at all events, it is better that we should be prepared for the worst."

The brig came slowly and majestically onwards, as if it had contained not a living soul. All was quiet as death: she looked like a huge grim giant, marching sullenly over the seas to hattle; not a voice or an order to be heard, not even the creaking of a block; even the billows seemed to have given up, for a time, their nature, and in place of their usual wild dash, only gave forth something like a low, sullen growl, as they washed heavily up against her bow and sides. Up she came nearer and nearer, until the lazy folds of the ensign at her gaff could be seen to slowly expand their gorgeous assembly of stars and stripes, with a fierce and dignified undulating movement.

"The rogue thinks to wear across our bows, I suppose," said Taffril, "but he shall find himself deucedly mistaken. Starboard your helm—starboard! Mr. Brace attend forward! and you, larboard guns, keep yourselves brisk and ready."

Before we had shortened sail the brig opened her fire, and sent her larboard broadside, rattling and cutting along, right for our head and bows. Crash came the shot, and I could hear the grinding of the splinters as they were shaved up from the decks, and off from the bulwarks with a fearful distinctness. Groans, smoke fire, stamping, and uproar followed, and in the middle of the bustle, I jumped to our men at the guns, and strove hard by a vigorous exertion of voice and action, to excite them to pay the rascals well, in return for what they had given us.

We had both bore up with the wind nearly on our quarter; we now ported the helm, and rounded to, pouring in our larboard broadside upon his quarter.—I could see that we had done a good deal of mischief, as noise and execrations rose from all parts of her decks. Smothering clouds of smoke began to ascend into the murky air, and curl about our rigging, while the flashing light of the artillery, momentarily illuminating both ships with a fierce red light, pictured the open port holes and the bristling guns with a beautiful exactitude; marking out the masts, yards, and every simple cord, as vividly as if a body of phosphoric air had traced them out in fire, and shadowing the upraised ports, channels, and cabin-windows. Down came the ensign of America to the deck in a trice, and a large sable flag was hoisted up in its stead. Up it rose to the extremity of the gaff, and like a funeral pall expanded lazily in the breeze. The pirate vessel had brought to the wind again; we ranged up under her lee, all our guns primed, loaded, and pointed, and the men, eager, as so many hungry wolves, to let fly at their antagonist.

"Now, steady my boys," said our captain, "this is no ordinary rascal that we are dealing with. Mr. Brace, call away the boarders, send them up on the fore-castle, and bid them creep low down behind the starboard bulwark. That's right, my fine fellows, take your weapons, and be off with ye forward. No noise now! no rushing! keep yourselves cool and steady.—When the word is given, start up all together, and then board them in the smoke. Mind through the larboard fore-chains. Helm a-port! port, my man! That's it! steady! you at the starboard side there, look to your guns!—Attention!—Fire! Pepper the d—d thieves well! Old England and the British navy for ever! hurrah, lads! hurrah!"

Our broadside was poured in upon the brig with hearty cheers, and was almost instantly answered. The shot came thumping through our weather side, and went crashing along the decks. Showers of musket-balls flew whistling about me, and the bullets from the heavy guns jumped bouncing away, in all directions, now striking the gun carriages, bulwarks and bits, and covering us with shoals of white splinters, and then mowing down, with fearful rapidity, the poor fellows who were firing away with unabated ardor. Good God! I feel sick at the mere recollection.

While I was intently engaged in seeing what was going on deck, I heard something split with a sudden sharp noise, as if a piece of wood had been snapped short in two. I looked instinctively aloft, and had the mortification of seeing our foretop-mast shot right through, and come whirling down with the velocity of lightning; the shrouds and stays cracked and parted like lighted tow, and our men on the fore-castle were sent capering about to escape the falling of the wreck, and the lashing of the flying cordage. All was smoke, fire, and confusion. Drifts of hot sulphurous vapor gathered in thick wreaths, and made my eyes smart and ache, in a most painful way. The pirate, during all this time, looked like nothing but a huge, grey, undefinable mass, all her rigging and spars waving and darkening, as the grey drifts of dense smoke faded and shifted about, and her gloomy hull like some unwieldy monster of the deep, at short intervals vomiting forth sheets of red flame, which gleamed with such a brilliant light, as a lamp might be supposed to throw forth if placed in the midst of a cloud of fog. Just at this unfortunate moment, our steersman, who I suppose, was as much blinded and confounded as I was, happened to let go the helm, and in consequence of having good way we broached to and came alongside of the pirate. During the confusion that reigned on board us from the wreck of the foretop-mast, the rogue poured in about fifty men upon our fore-castle, and they began cutting and hacking about at our rigging, like so many devils. In the light emitted by our artillery, they looked like a company of fiends, let loose red-hot from hell, for mischief. We turned upon them directly, and the hoarse cry, "We're boarded on the bow," soon brought all our boarders on the fore-castle. It was a desperate combat; I even shudder now when I think of it, although nearly three-and-twenty years ago that these events occurred. Steel clinking and glancing in all directions, like so many lightning flashes, blood streaming, pistols and muskets popping, and bayonets and boarding pikes clashing with an unremitting rattle—groans, shrieks, and horrid imprecations, were mingled on every side. At last, we contrived to get them overboard, after killing and wounding about one half, and losing a great many men on our own side. Poor Peter Duff was among the hurt; he received a deep sabre cut over his right shoulder, and a horrid gash along his cheek. It was fortunate that the vessels separated.

The litter and wreck about our forward guns were partially cleared away, and we set to work with them with renewed energy and perseverance. As yet, the brig was untouched in every particular, as if she had been protected by some mighty spell of saving power. She filled her topsail, and began leisurely to fetch away, in order to put herself across our bows. I thought the game was up, and that the proud old British union would be shortly obliged to sweep the deck, as the carnage of our men was excessive; four out of the six guns, on our larboard side, were rendered quite useless, on account of the falling of the masts, and we had no means of extricating ourselves from our disagreeable position. Luckily, however, a good shot flew smack through his foremast, a little below the fishes. A shout burst out from our lips as the tall pine, like a lanky giant, came tumbling down, and went flashing over into the sea, splashing up the water in silver jets, and feathering it into a cascade.

We worked away meantime with all our might. The shot, I could see, was telling fearfully, and drilling great holes in his sides. His fire slackened a little, a cloud of smoke began to rise ominously from his main hatchway, it grew denser and denser. By-and-by we had the pleasure of seeing long streaks of yellow flame leap up, and hearing the splash, splash of buckets of water. We worked hard still, and peppered her without intermission. Confusion and dismay seemed to prevail on board, gruff voices were issuing rapid orders, and the crew were plainly to be seen flying about from deck to deck as if they were bewitched.

A long pillar of scarlet fire now flew brilliantly upwards, it spread joyously to the right and left, and waved and flickered about, licking like a fiery serpent, and crawling up the rigging and sails, which were soon in a blaze. The roaring and humming of the fire in her hold began to re-double, and red strips to look out at the ports. The guns one after the other became heated, and went banging off, and clouds of lurid smoke, pile above pile, rose majestically far, far up into the illuminated firmament. The sea, the skies, the tumbling billows, the clouded moon, our shattered vessel, and its tattered rigging, our bloody decks, and even our very faces, were wrapt in one uniform, and brilliant scarlet light. The brig meanwhile glowed like a red-hot coal in a fiery furnace. Her bristling guns, her chains, her raised ports, her stays, her wales, her anchors, and all her furniture were fetched out so vividly, that to an excited imagination they seemed as if all had been bathed deeply in a flood of ruby light, while her sable ensign fluttered high in the smothering air, like the angel of death rejoicing over his sinking victims.

Her last hour rapidly approached. Our shot had sent in some of their planks, and the hissing waters were gaining hard upon her. Down!—down!—down she went, stern foremost, the scarlet waves, gurgling and tumbling about her, and the cries of her ill-fated crew ringing through the still midnight air. The flames gave a loud hiss, as they touched the water, and were suddenly extinguished, her masts, still kept burning, flaring, and fizzing, like a couple of blazing sticks, but sunk gradually lower and low. At last she gave a sickening lurch, the flashing water boiled and curled about like a whirlpool, and a deep expiring groan emitted from the very bosom of the ocean, told that chief, crew, and vessel had gone to eternity.

CHARACTER.

From Chamber's Edinburgh Journal.

THE PERILS OF WOMAN.

The sufferings of women in this world of ours are peculiar, and greater than the generality of people, who look only on the surface of things, seem to have any just conception of. The conventional rules which hold society in voluntary bondage, press hard on the gentler part of creation, in many respects, of which every one is cognizant; but, in other points, a woman endures much in secret and silence, displaying a patient and unostentatious fortitude more truly heroic than most of the actions which receive from us that misused appellation. In the secluded walks and nooks of life, there are at all times numerous females, young and old, who bear, with virtuous resignation, such toils and privations as would in most instances drive impatient man to vice and crime, and who will thus suffer on even to the death, without a murmur or complaint; while, at the same time the training to which the sex is ordinarily subjected, and the strict and exclusive regulations which hem them in on all sides, neither provide nor admit of any escape from a position so depressing and unfortunate. A thousand sources of employ and subsistence are open to man. Very, very different is the case with woman; and the consequence is an amount of suffering and sorrow, which, being seldom obtruded on its notice, the world in general has but little idea of.

Pauline de Meulan, a young lady of good family in Paris was deprived of the friends who had brought her up, and was compelled to look for some source of support for herself. She had received a good education, and, having a taste for literature, made an attempt to gain her bread by the use of her pen. She sent various little stories and other contributions to several of the newspapers, but all her pieces were too long or too short, too grave or too light—any thing, in short, but entitled to reception. Had Pauline not possessed uncommon energies, as well as uncommon abilities, she would have found it impossible to fight her way through the briary path that leads to literary success. Many a time and oft, in her solitary chamber, she would cast down her pen in despairing lassitude, but the difficulty of seeing any better mode of maintenance made her always lift it anew, with revived determination. Her efforts were at length rewarded with something like success. Her essays found favor with the managers of the periodical paper called the Publiciste, and she became a regular contributor to its pages, being paid for her labors in such a manner as to maintain herself in comparative comfort. She became even the object of considerable notice, and was occasionally an invited member of the literary soirees so common among the Parisians. At M. Suard's, in particular, a well-known member of the world of literature, Pauline met and mingled with many of the rising people of talent, male and female, in the French metropolis.

Things continued thus until Pauline fell ill, and became unable to send her contributions as usual to the Publiciste. Unluckily for her, the capital supplied too many young persons of literary ability to make the cessation of her labors a matter of much consequence to the people with whom she communicated. She was sensible of this, and her sickbed was harassed by fears of indigence and distress. But at this moment, a kind though unknown assistant stepped in to relieve her terrors, and save her from falling a prey to the evils in prospect. One morning, while musing sadly on her state, she received a packet, which proved, on being opened, to contain a contribution, in her own line and manner, for the Publiciste. It was accompanied by a note, in which the writer stated his intention to send her a similar paper at regular intervals, hoping at the same time that they might be accepted in place of her own, until she was well enough to resume her tasks. The handwriting of the note and paper were unknown to Pauline, and she could form no guess who was the author. This promise made was fulfilled, however. Articles of a fitting kind were regularly sent, and they procured for the young invalid, from the conductors of the Publiciste, the same remuneration which her own toils had produced. All necessary comforts were thus assured to her in her illness, and she recovered that health which distress of mind might otherwise have aided to keep back.

Pauline's correspondent dropped his labors when she was enabled to resume her own. It may be imagined that her mind dwelt much on this circumstance, and that she longed to know and thank her benefactor. She was not left long in the dark. A pale and slender young man, with a mild and expressive countenance, called upon her and modestly revealed himself as her unknown assistant. He was immediately recognised by the young contributor of the Publiciste as one whom she had seen at M. Suard's and who had won for himself the repute of being one of the most promising young men of the day. He also had seen her at M. Suard's and it was from no common feelings that he had been induced to act as has been related. After their first interview, they saw each other again and again, and Pauline soon learned to reciprocate the affection which the other had already conceived for her. They were married. At this day they live happily with each other; and while the husband fills one of the highest places in the senate and literature of his country, the wife, while holding no ignoble station also in the world of letters, is elevated high among the matrons of France. Reader the parties of whom we have been speaking, are Monsieur and Madame Guizot. The "Letters on education" and other works of the latter show her to be a worthy partner of a statesman and historian so distinguished as M. Guizot.

MEHEMET ALI.

The following sketch of the character of Mehemet Ali, which appears in a French paper, will be read with interest at the present time:

Mehemet Ali, was born in 1769, at Cavalla, and is now consequently 71 years of age. He is short in stature, but strong and still hale, or far from infirmity. His fine forehead and hazel eyes deeply sunk in their sockets, his short mustache, flowing grey beard, and little mouth, makes up an ensemble which, though it betrays cunning and finesse, yet, on the whole, gives him the appearance of a noble and amiable man.

His hands and feet are remarkably well made, and, what is extraordinary for a Turk, he is incessantly pacing up and down his apartments. He is always remarkably clean and neat in his dress, but never wears any orders, nor any of those gorgeous decorations and embroideries which are so much in fashion amongst his countrymen.

The Viceroy is excessively passionate, and can but ill conceal the emotions by which for the time he is agitated, but he has much frankness and good faith, and abhors dissimulation. Extremely sensitive on all points of honor, religiously faithful to his word, he is utterly incapable of committing a dishonorable action. His generosity is unbounded, and frequently borders on prodigality. He is reported to have been a very great admirer of the fair sex, but is an excellent father; and it is painful to witness his anguish when bereaved of any of his numerous children, or any person to whom he is attached.

Glory is his god, and his whole life has been spent in endeavoring to shed a lustre on his name, and to leave behind him a glorious and unsullied reputation. He is very sensible on the calumnies which the European papers have circulated about him, and causes all of them to be translated and read to him.

Probably there is no man of his age who equals him in indefatigable activity. He allows himself but a few hours of repose; rises at four, when he receives reports from his Ministers and dictates his answers. He then reviews his troops, and inspects his shipping and public works. He is endowed with a most wonderful clear-sightedness, which enables him to grapple with his subject and instantly see the bottom of the most intricate questions; and his unerring judgement renders him capable of forming the most just decisions on affairs with which he was previously unacquainted. Repeated illustrations of this are to be met with in the history of his long political career.

Like Cassio, he is no arithmetician, but his calculations are always correct. He never learnt to read until the age of forty five, when he commenced studying with all the ardor of a youthful mind. The histories of Alexander and Napoleon were always his favorite subjects. He speaks no foreign language, but such is his perspicacity that, whilst conversing with Europeans, he frequently dispenses with the services of his interpreter, having gained from their eyes and gestures a tolerably correct idea of the subject on which they have been conversing. His great delight is to have some distinguished European or scientific person to converse with.

He is religious without being either a fanatic or bigot. But he is the first Mussulman sovereign who has afforded to Christians a sincere protection, which he has caused to be severely respected. Several Christians enjoy his friendship and confidence; he has given them rank and commands, and has raised them to the dignity of bey. Thus, to soar above the deep-rooted prejudices of his court and people, he had to struggle against their intrigues and animadversions when they were jealous of the favors which he bestowed upon foreigners.

His amusements are very simple and primitive—riding, and playing at chess or draughts with his officers inferiors, and sometimes even with private soldiers. At both of these games he is remarkably skilful.

With regard to his warlike qualities, it is only necessary to say that he rose to be what he is from the ranks by means of his courage and talents. His courage and fearless intrepidity have frequently hurried him into great danger. Even last year, notwithstanding his great age, did we see him undertake a voyage to Faozlon, upwards of 1,000 leagues from his capital, braving the rocks of the Nile, suffering shipwreck, swimming ashore, treating it as a joke, and pursuing his journey across the voiceless sands of the desert, mounted on a dromedary? Ali is incontestably one of the most remarkable men of the present age.

AN ANTIQUE.—We were shown, the other day, by a gentleman of this town in whose possession it is, a most superb figured cut velvet vest or jacket, worn one hundred and sixty-seven years ago by his ancestor, John Levento, Governor of the province of Massachusetts, which then included New Hampshire. It is of a dress order—made in the style of those days to reach below the middle, with large pocket flaps. It is altogether the richest specimen of velvet we ever saw, and in excellent preservation. As a relic of the olden time it is a great curiosity.—New Hampshire Sentinel.

Those of our patrons, who intend to render an earnest of substantial patronage, will, we trust, comply with our terms, and either pay their subscriptions to an authorized agent, or hand it to the post master, who is authorized by law to send it free of postage.—Our terms are $2.50, if not paid within six months, or $3, at the end of the year. TEMPERANCE in a general sense, is a prudent moderation which restrains our desires, appetites, and passions within just bounds: but we shall consider it here in a more limited signification, as a virtue that curbs our corporeal appetites, and, confining them to a medium equally distant from two opposite extremes, renders them not only innocent, but commendable and useful.

The principal vices repressed by Temperance are Incontinency, and Excess in eating and drinking; if there be any more, they flow from one or other of these two sources.

It would lead us to too great length at present, to consider this virtue fully in both points of view. To the last, then, as most appropriate to our particular subject, we shall chiefly confine our attention.

"Wine," says an eminent author, "raises the imagination, but depresses the judgement. He that resigns his reason is guilty of every thing he is liable to in the absence of it. A drunken man is the greatest monster in human nature, and the most despicable character in human society; this vice has very fatal effects on the mind, the body, and fortune of the person who is devoted to it; as to the mind, it discovers every flaw in it and makes every latent seed sprout out in the soul; it adds fury to the passions, and force to the objects that are apt to inflame them. Wine often turns the good-natured man into an idiot, and the choleric into an assassin; it gives bitterness to resentment, makes vanity insupportable, and displays every little spot of the soul in its utmost deformity."

Seneca says, "That drunkenness does not produce, but discover faults;" experience teaches us the contrary; liquor throws a man out of himself, infuses into the mind qualities to which it is a stranger in its more sober movements. Some men are induced to drink excessively, as a cure for sorrow and a relief from misfortune; but they deceive themselves; liquor can only sharpen and embitter their misery.

Temperance is our guard against a thousand unseen ills. If this virtue restrain not our natural inclinations, they will soon exceed all bounds of reason and of prudence. The Grecian Philosophers ranked Temperance among the highest of all Christian virtues. It is undoubtedly a preservative against numerous diseases, an enemy to passion, and a security against the dire effects of excessive vices and immoderate desires. The good and true Mason knows its highest value and most appropriate application. Every man of reflection must know, that by keeping this vigilant sentinel always on duty, we are armed and secured against that tremendous host of foes which perpetually hover round the ungarded victims of intemperance.

OPPOSITION.—The Splendid Steamer, American Statesman, is running between New York and New Haven at ONE CENT fare, berths included. If the other boat will find their passengers, there is no doubt but that they would receive all the "patronage."

COOPER THE NOVELIST.—It is probably familiar to most of readers, that this gentleman some time ago procured indictments against the editor of the Courier and Enquirer, for alleged libels said to have been uttered by the C. & E. in relation to the fair fame of Mr. Cooper, which indictments were to have been tried in Otsego county. These indictments have been removed to the Supreme court by the District attorney of Otsego, on the ground that "public feeling was in such a state of excitement, to forbid the hope of getting an impartial administration of justice in the premises." It is to be regretted that Mr. Cooper, so far forgot himself as to meddle with an affair, which can never redound to his character as an author, and which must result eventually in his discomfiture and disgrace. If we understand the subject aright, the indictment was procured on account of some very severe strictures on one of Mr. C's recent works. Mr. C. may have received injustice from the hands of Mr. Webb, but he should be aware that authors like editors, are public targets, made to fire at: and he that laughs the heartiest, at the missiles thrown at him, (always provided that they do not break his head) is looked upon by the community, the best fellow. Mr. Cooper's course in this matter has been a very foolish one, and we regret that an author so deservedly celebrated, should in a weak moment, have given the admirers of his genius, so much cause to pity his extreme sensibility and nervousness!

FOREIGN ITEMS.—The Steam Ship Britania, has arrived at Boston. Lord Falkland, the new Governor of Nova Scotia, who was of the passengers, was landed at Halifax, where he was received with great ceremony. The state of the Eastern question had undergone but little change. Peace would be preserved, if possible, although, war like preparations were making. Professor Mullen, who has been engaged in making excavations at Delphi, died by illness brought on by fatigue. The trial of Louis Napoleon, will take place the first of October. The plague is said to be raging in Rome. The latest accounts from Mexico, are of the most doleful kind; misery, want, and turbulence, seem to be for the time paramount.—The splendid estate 'Hope' the property of the Duke of Buckingham, at Jamaica, W. I., was destroyed by fire. One hundred and ten negro houses, the great house, cane fields, stores, and all the property of master and man were destroyed.

G. L. C. of Savannah, is informed, that favor this has been duly received, for which he will please accept our acknowledgements. His papers have been regularly mailed in the same packet with T's.

*If our friend of the Marietta (Ohio) Democrat, will make the words "will not step forward," read "will now step forward," in our prospectus, which he has kindly published, he will convey an entirely different idea—that's all.

THE MONUMENT FAIR, at Boston, has closed, and it is said, that between 20 and 25 thousand dollars will be realised, after defraying the expenses. This confers immortal honor on the ladies engaged in it.

LADIES LOOK OUT.—Miss Sophia Mitchell, who has been enacting the part of chambermaid on board of one of the Havre Packets, for some time, has been ungallantly deprived of the "short gown, &c." and discovered to be a Mister somebody, by the police of New Orleans.

THE ILL FATED LEXINGTON.—Another body drifted ashore at Smith Town L. Island, on the 12th inst. It was ascertained to be that of the wife of James Bates, of Abington, Mass., formerly of New Jersey.

The Argus is mistaken, when it says the passage of the North America and Albany, was a "test of speed" between the two boats on Wednesday. In the first place the Capt. of the N. A. was forbidden by the Association to run his boat, and in the second place the N. A. made fourteen landings, while the Albany came through without a passenger, and did not make a single landing. It will be some time before Mr. Stevens can make the Albany the crack boat, with such a "test of speed."

CABS.—New York is following London, and Albany is following New York. Mr. Charles Walker, has introduced the Cab here, and our citizens can now ride as cheap as they please.

KENDRICK.—who killed his wife some time since, at Troy, has been acquitted on the plea of insanity.

A REASON.—The London Literary Gazette, in speaking of a performance at the King's theatre, says, "On Tuesday, Othello was repeated to an excellent and applauding house; but we have criticised it so often, that we have nothing new to say on the subject, except that we have discovered the reason why Desdemona takes the lighted candle into bed with her, (which no previous commentator has done,) and it is simply because Othello is so dark."

[The "reason" assigned is not correct. Desdemona undoubtedly took a candle, either because she was afraid to go to bed in the dark—or because she wanted to see where to put her clothes—or, because she wanted to untie the knot in her nightcap. Considerations which certainly require a candle.]

INTELLIGENCE.

Melancholy.—A boat containing six boys was upset on Sunday on the Schuylkill, near Coates street wharf, and four of the six unfortunately drowned. The latest British papers tell of a similar accident, by which eleven youths perished.—Phil. Nat. Gaz.

Fire at Natchez.—A fire occurred at Natchez, on the 9th inst., in one of the outbuildings of a beautiful mansion. There were in the Kitchen two servants, a girl and a boy, and both were destroyed—the boy was in a sick bed and was found in a crisped cinder—the girl was taken out alive, horribly burnt, but died in a few hours in the most excruciating agony and pain.

The fire discovered in the St. Charles Exchange, New Orleans, on the 11th inst., was got under, after it had destroyed portions of the 4th and 5th stories.—Loss about $20,000. The building alone cost over half a million. The fire is known to have been the work of an incendiary, and was set on fire in three or four distinct parts of the attic. Several suspected persons are under arrest.

Distressing Event.—A very sudden death occurred at the City Hotel, on the 18th inst., and under circumstances peculiarly affecting. A Mr. W. R. Chaplain, a native of Massachusetts, and recently a resident of Mississippi, was married on Friday morning to Miss Murdock, of Philadelphia. At the dinner table he suffered a slight attack of vertigo and retiring to his room, the fit was renewed with such violence as to cause his death a short time afterwards, notwithstanding medical aid was properly administered.—Balt. American.

PAINFUL RUMOR.—It is stated in the Pennsylvania of yesterday, that in that city, (Philadelphia) a report was circulated that Governor Buchanan, of Liberia Colony has assassinated. The origin of the report could not be traced.

A young French girl, named Amelia Marcott, died suddenly at Sandwich U. C. on Sunday the 6th inst. while setting at table. Her cousin, Joseph Marcott, a lad of about the same age, 16, while riding for a physician to attend her, was thrown from his horse and killed.

Fatal Shot.—A Mrs. Milligan was shot dead a few days since, while standing at her door in Bolivar street, Cleveland, Ohio, by a rifle ball, which was discharged by a lad named Fisk, at a short distance from the house. The ball passed through two board fences, and the direction was thus twice changed before it struck Mrs. M. who expired immediately.

THE CROPS.—We congratulate the farmers of this county upon the prospect of an abundant crop. Indeed we have rarely, if ever, witnessed more flattering prospects, and should the weather continue favorable, our farmers in the course of two or three weeks, commence picking cotton—a crop which promises to be abundant. We may also boast of the excellent health which our citizens throughout the country enjoy.

A well dressed man was arrested in London for attempting to force his way to the Queen. He stated that he was no other person than George the Fourth; that he had built the palace, and the Queen was his wife. He was going to take her to heaven in a balloon, and he intended to get a lot of soldiers and a company of the Blues to escort him. The officers were to blow trumpets and wear wigs.

The Paris papers announces the death of Sanson, the executioner, well known as one of the lions of Paris. He officiated at the decapitation of Louis XVI. He had acquired some property, was a well informed man, fond of the arts, and past most of his time in reading and playing on the piano. He has left a son and grandson to succeed him in his office, as he succeeded his father and grandfather.

Farmers Bank of Sandstone.—A man is in the city putting off bills on this bank. The bills of some of the banks of Massachusetts, and are dated at Barry. There is, however, no such bank at the East; but there was once such a bank in Michigan; which broke long ago. [N. Y. Jour. Com.]

Terrible Accident.—On Monday afternoon, about six o'clock, George Hansell, a resident of Philadelphia county, was run over by a car, on the Columbia railroad, near the Green Tree Tavern, and both his legs and one arm cut off. He died before reaching Paoli, and was brought to his brother who keeps the hotel at the head of the inclined plane. The accident occurred by his attempting to get on the car when moving.

POETRY.

SONG FOR ST. JOHN'S FESTIVAL.

BY BR. WILLIAM J. WHIPPLE.

When chaos invested the face of the deep,
And to darkness, confusion, and discord gave birth,
The first of heaven mid the tumult was heard,
And nature obeyed the Omnipotent Word.
Jehovah's great mandate was, "Let there be light;"
And harmony triumph'd o'er discord and night.

What joy fill'd the earth, when the herald of love,
On a mission of mercy dispatch'd from above,
While the choir of high heaven re-echoed the strain, Proclaim'd "On earth peace, and good will towards men;"
When raptures extatic, were borne on the sound,
That spread the glad tidings to Creation around.

Thus the moral world joyed, when the shadows of night,
Were chas'd from the soul by the effulgence of Light;
When by Wisdom contriv'd, in Beauty array'd,
And by Strength well supported, our Lodge stood dis-
play'd;
With the "Olive of peace" Freemasonry rose,
And dissension was hushed on the breast of repose.

THE SABBATH BELL.

BY JOHN C. M'CABE.

—When I am gone
That tuneful peal will still ring on;
While other bards shall wake these dells,
And sing your praise sweet evening bells.

MOORE.

'Tis sweet to hear the Sabbath bell,
Whose soft and silvery chime
Breaks on the ear with fall and swell
Wafting our thoughts from time.
I love to hear its mellow strain
Come floating up the dell;
While wending to that sacred fane,
Where chimes the Sabbath bell.

How memory mingles with that peal!
How hours of other years!
How sad the thoughts that pensive steal
Along my trickling tears!
Thoughts rending to my bosom lone,
Yet those I would not quell;
For soothing to my grief that tone
Of thine, sweet Sabbath bell.

For though the 'lov'd and lost' cannot Return my heart to cheer;
Their memory ne'er can be forgot,
While the blest voice I hear.
How pure, how pure the tears that rush
From feeling's briny well;
When swan-like thy soft numbers gush,
Thou much loved Sabbath bell!

A few years more—the sweet cool winds
Will make the young flowers wave,
Which, oh! perhaps, congenial minds
Will plant around my grave.
I'll miss the dear familiar voice
That, ah! so oft could tell
My heart, tho' tempest toss'd, 'rejoice,'
Thou dear, dear Sabbath bell.

THE MOTHER'S VISIT.

TO THE TOMB OF HER DAUGHTER.

Sleep on, sleep on in death's embrace,
I envy thee thy resting place;
I would not wish thee o'er again
To tread life's cheerless path of pain.

The smile that thou wert wont to wear,
In loveliness still lingers there;
And that dim'd eye, in beauty's sleep,
Will wake no more, with me to weep.

Here thou art resting, by my side,
As peaceful as the moments glide.

Those lips for me would breathe a prayer,
But ah! the spirit is not there.

That gentle voice, by nature given,
Whose sound was soft as breath of heaven;
Where is it flown? The list'ning ear
Will ne'er again its accents hear.

'Tis she, who oft, when thou hast slept,
O'er thee a mother's watch hath kept,
That here stands peering o'er that brow,
Seal'd in death's cold embraces now.

Hark! 'twas her voice I heard; it said,
Why weep'st thou here, among the dead?
'Tis gone! 'twas fancy! light as air,
That spake. Her spirit is not there.

Sleep on, in thy unconscious dream,
How undisturbed thy slumbers seem:
Oh! that like thee, in peace, I may
Be soon permitted here to lie.

Adieu! adieu! thou faded flower,
I leave thee now, 'tis evening hour;
I shall be borne to thee again;
And with thy sleeping dust remain.

My thoughts shall linger, when away,
Around this silent house of clay;
'Till death shall set my spirit free,
And lay this aching heart with thee.

THE FAT GENTLEMAN'S COMPLAINT.

A MOURNFUL DITTY.

"Ah me! that I was rather thin!"
How oft I utter that!
Surely quadrilles I would begin,
If I were not so fat.

Down country dances I can go,
(I things heavy can go down.)
Regardless of each lady's toe,
Unheeding lady's frown.

But sooth to say, I'd rather stand
A happy gazer by.
And view the light and cheerful band
Through their quick mazes fly.

And so I stord—the music rang—
The fair looked doubly fair;
As on elastic feet they sprang,
They seem'd embodied air.

To me the gracious hostess came
Smiling with trench'rous glance,
Led me, unwilling, to a dame,
Who wilfully would dance.

Her age was that mysterious one
That never yet was told,
Which smiling sees years onward run—
Years make not ladies old.

Her face was that on which was writ
In rather a strong trace,
So many lines of sense and wit,
That wrinkles found no place.

Her figure was that goodly size
That the well favor'd kine
Show'd to king Pharaoh's close-shut eyes;
In fact, 'twas just like mine.

I led my prize in triumph forth,
What transports then were mine!
As east and west, and south and north,
Our bodies we incline.

The spanish dance I think 'twas call'd,
The dance my partner lov'd,
She heel'd, I reel'd—she crawl'd, I sprawl'd
As waltzing down we mov'd.

As through the whirling dance we haste
Her waist's encircle round,

My precious time I did not waste—
No waist on her was found.

If mirth t' excite the merriment
By dancing is t' excel,
None can my belle and I prevent,
From beating off the bell.

From Planchette's Magazine.

HOPE.

If hope be dead—why seek to live?
For what besides has life to give?
Life, Youth, and love, and Beauty, too,
If hope be dead—say! what are you?

"Life without Hope? Oh, that is not
To live! but, day by day, to rot,
With feelings cold, and passions dead,
To wander o'er the world and read
Upon its beauties, and to gaze,
All vacant, o'er its flowery maze;
Oh! think if this be life? then say,—
Who lives when Hope has fled away?"

Youth without hope! An endless-night,
Trees which have felt the cold spring's blight,
The lightning's flash, the thunder's strife,
Yet pine away a weary life,
Which older would have sunk, and died
Beneath the strokes their youth defied—
But, curst with length of days, are left
To rail at Youth of Hope bereft.

Love without hope? It cannot be,
There is a vessel on yon sea—
Becalmed and sail-less as despair,
And know—this hopeless Love floats there.

And Beauty too—when Hope is gone—
Has lost the ray in which it shone!
And seen without this borrowed light,
Has lost the beam which made it bright.
Now what avails the silken hair,
The angel smile, and gentle air,
The beaming eye, and glance refined—
Faint semblance of a purer mind—
As gold-dust, sparkling in the sun,
Points where the brighter strata run?
Alas! they now just seem to be Bestowed to mock at misery;
They speak of days long, long gone by,
Then point to cold reality,
And with a death-like smile, then say,—
"Oh! what are we when Hope's away?"

Thus Life, Youth, Love and Beauty, too,
When seen without Hope's brightening hue,
All sigh in misery's saddest tone,—
"Why seek to live, if hope be gone?"

MASONIC.

AN ORATION,

Delivered in Christ Church, Savannah, on the Festival of St. John the Evangelist, before Solomon's Lodge No. 1.

BY THE REV. BR. GEORGE WHITE.

MASONIC BRETHREN :

Our act of celebration begins with God. To the incomparable Architect who formed the brilliant globes that float in the regions of interminable space, Free Masonry presents its homage and gratitude. The festival which we this day keep, is the festival of friendship, benevolence, and good will to men. We do not thus annually convene, to make an ostentatious display of our numbers, to devise plans to advance the interests of a particular party, or to canvass the pretensions of candidates, for public favor. To indulge in revelry and intemperance, is not our purpose.

We have assembled to invoke the blessing of the Almighty upon our brotherhood, to strengthen the bonds of our union, to encourage each other in good works, and to renew our vows that we will faithfully endeavor to exemplify the sublime principles of our craft in all the relations we sustain to society.

I bid you welcome to the celebration of this Jubilee. In the name of humanity I bid you welcome. In the name of benevolence I bid you welcome.

What friend to this venerable institution does not feel his bosom glow with pride, when he reflects that amidst the countless revolutions, that have convulsed the world, its principles have been maintained, in their original beauty and undiminished lustre. It carries on its front the marks of venerable antiquity. We are not, it is true, among those who believe that Masonry can be traced to that period,

"When first the golden morn aloft,
With golden breezes whispering soft,
Sprung from the east with rosy wing,
To kiss the heavenly first-born spring;
Jehovah then from hallowed earth,
Gave Masonry immortal birth."

Neither are we satisfied that our fraternity, had any connection with the mystical associations of Egypt, Greece, or Rome. We do not think that any proof exists, that Archimedes, Pythagoras and Solon, were Masons. The principles of speculative Masonry, were doubtless well understood by these illustrious men, but it is asserting too much to say that they were Masons, in the sense in which we now employ that term.

You must allow me respected brethren, to remark, that I believe that the intemperate and extravagant attempts which have been made, to give Masonry an origin, to which it is by no means entitled, have contributed in no small degree, to render it the subject of sarcasm and contempt. We should never permit our attachment for the institution, to lead us into the mazes of improbability. You may justly boast that Masonry is the most ancient institution in the world. The arches, the pillars, the porticoes, the pyramids, the amphitheatres and temples, formed by the hand of Masonry, have perished, but the institution still exists.—Powerful, and well concerted schemes, have been devised, to banish it from the world. Excessive fines, galling chains, gloomy dungeons, painful exiles, furious flames and cruel deaths, are but few of the engines employed by the ignorant, to destroy the beautiful fabric of Masonry; but it has outlived the attacks of its most inveterate foes. Its principles have spread, and they will continue to spread, till

"The great globe itself,
And all which it inherits be destroyed,
And like the baseless fabric of a vision,
Leave not a wreck behind."

No human institution, is so well calculated to promote the happiness of men as Masonry. "Established on a liberal and extensive plan, its benignities extend to every individual of the human race, and its adherents are collected from every nation under heaven. It invites to its lodges the sons of virtue, of love and of peace, that it might connect them by vows of eternal amity, in a most sacred, intimate, and endeared alliance, and unite and invigorate their best endeavours for mutual and general advantage." It is the friend of man, in whatever condition he is found. Every species of human woe, it has endeavoured to alleviate. Liberty never had bolder champions than the members of this fraternity. Against tyranny, oppression, and intolerance, it has ever waged an uncompromising war. A very large proportion of those noble spirits, who toiled, and suffered and bled, in defence of our holy religion, were members of this order. It has restrained the ferocity of passion, and curbed the licentiousness of appetite. It has quenched the fires of persecution, and extinguished the torch of fanaticism. It has brought together, men who were totally estranged from each other, by climate, prejudice, language, and education, and taught them that they were all the children of one Almighty Father, and that therefore they should love as brethren. Protection of the weak, has always been a prominent duty of Masonry, and never was a duty more faithfully discharged, than when woman became the object; indeed, when she became the object, the duty was heightened to a pitch of enthusiasm. Admitting, that in the days of chivalry, devotion to the female sex was carried to a degree of extravagance, yet, it must be acknowledged, that Masonry has been one among the chief instruments, by which woman has been raised from a state of inferiority, to her proper position in society. The very fact, that females cannot be admitted into our lodges, is the highest compliment we can pay them. It is often asked, why are they excluded? Is it because they are considered unworthy? Is it because they are supposed incapable of preserving secrecy? No! these are not the reasons which prevent our offering to woman, the privileges of Masonry. The truth is, this institution cherishes such an exalted regard for the character of females, that it does not think that they stand in need of vows, and emblems to make them virtuous. Masonry, although it is entirely persuaded of the superior advantages it is capable of conferring, thinks that its privileges would be useless to her, of whom it is said:

"Her's is a mild and gentle power
That prospers in affliction's hour;
And when the heartlessness of friends
Falls, like a pestilence, and brings
To hope's own fair imaginings
Its withering breath; then woman lends
Her words of solace; and her smile
Like moonbeams on a ruined pile
Comes with an influence to bless
Where all seemed drear and comfortless;
And sheds around such holy light,
As makes e'en desolation bright!"

"Mark her majestic fabric! She's a temple
Sacred by birth, and built by hands divine
Her soul's the Deity, that lodges there
Nor is the pile unworthy of the God.

Such are the sentiments of Masonry, in reference to woman, and the regulation which debars her from a participation in our mysteries, is our highest praise and her greatest panegyric.

In furnishing pecuniary assistance to the poor and needy, this institution is eminently distinguished. See ye yonder orphan, for whom no mother's bosom throbs in soft sympathy!

"See ye the widow forced in age for bread,
To strip the brook, with mantling crosses spread;
To pick the wintry fagot from the thorn,
Then seek some nightly shade and weep till morn."

These are the objects of the true Mason's most tender care. If our customs allowed, we could easily bring into this assembly, living proofs of Masonic benevolence. No association of men can say, with so much truth as Masonry: "When the ear heard me, then it blessed me, and when the eye saw me, because I delivered the poor that cried and the fatherless and him that had none to help him. The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me, and I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy. I was eyes to the blind, and feet was I to the lame. I was a father to the poor, and the cause which I knew not, I searched out."

Notwithstanding the benevolent and peaceful objects of our order, it has to contend with opposition, arising in most cases from an entire ignorance of the subject. The limits of my remarks will not permit a minute examination of all the objections advanced against our craft. One or two of the most popular of these objections, I will notice. It is said that the profound secrecy peculiar to Masonry, cannot be reconciled with those principles of benevolence which it professes. If Masons are in possession of anything, the knowledge of which would be beneficial to the world, why not divulge it? Why hide their light? We reply, that the privileges of Masonry can be enjoyed by all who possess the requisite qualifications. But who are to be the judges of these qualifications? Not the mass of men at large, but Masons themselves. Every society reserves to itself the right of deciding upon the qualifications of those who offer for admission. It is unfair, therefore, to deprive this institution of a right awarded to all others. To the virtuous the privileges of Masonry are accessible. To communicate them to the vicious, would be to profane their sanctity. To publish them to the world, would be to defeat the very design of the institution—for these are its marks, and the means of its preservation. But secrecy is not peculiar to Masonry. Every profession, every art, every trade has its secrets. Empires and States, have their secrets. Families have their secrets, and there is not a heart in this assembly but what is the repository of some secret. The duty of secrecy is recognised and taught in the volume of inspiration. In the Old Testament as well as in the new, various allusions are made to this duty; and we all know that there are certain actions which the Divine Author of our religion declared, must be performed in secret, in order to be acceptable to him. It is further objected, that the privileges of this order, are frequently conferred upon the worthless and destitute. We admit this charge.—But we ask if perfection can be found on earth? Are not other societies liable to imposition, and why may not Masonry be liable to the same thing? Masonry cannot dive into the hearts of men. It takes men upon their protestations of honesty. If deceived, the institution ought not to be censured, but those who are guilty of the deception. It is unjust to blame any society for the misconduct of its members. The best things are liable to be abused. Our benign religion has been perverted to the very worst ends. Are there not thousands who profess Christianity, whose daily conduct is in direct contradiction to their profession? In the church, have you not seen hypocrisy borrowing the cloak of religion, and officiating at her very altars? Have you not seen pride and ostentation among those who claim to be disciples of the humble Jesus? Have you not witnessed the revolting spectacle of sect arrayed against sect, persecuting each other with unrelenting animosity, on account of slight differences in their creeds, and forms of worship? But who blames Christianity for these irregularities and abuses? No one will venture to affirm that the misconduct of a Christian is an argument against Christianity. And by the same reasoning the immoral behavior of Masons ought not to be attributed to Masonry.

We ask, is it not one of the most reasonable things in the world to expect, that in a society so extensive, and composed of such a variety of persons, that many by immoral conduct, would bring discredit upon the order?

If there be any thing in Masonry, unfriendly to good morals, would it have been supported by the virtuous of every age? In the Masonic ranks have been found the most distinguished men of every age and country. Kings, princes, nobles, bishops, have not hesitated to avow their attachment to our order. WASHINGTON, whose name will ever be dear to the hearts of every American, was a zealous member of this fraternity. In Masonry, there is nothing inconsistent with rigid morality. He who becomes a member of our order, has no motive offered him to become vicious. We do not pretend to put Masonry on a level with our holy religion, yet, we do assert that next to it, there is nothing better calculated to make men wise and virtuous. What mean these badges in which the order now appears? What mean these various symbols? Why give we the scriptures such a prominent situation as that which they now occupy? Think not that they are only appendages, intended merely, to excite the curiosity of the ignorant, and that Masons deal in some very mysterious arts. No! they are all expressive and to the enlightened, fraught with instruction.—To fear God is the first lesson inculcated in our lodges. Under circumstances of peculiar solemnity, Masonry endeavors to impress upon the mind, that a Being, so infinitely above the comprehension of man—a Being, whose goodness is inscribed upon all creation, has unquestionably claims to our highest regard.—To implore and ask His mercy, to depend upon His protection, to reverence His name, and to rely upon His protection, however rough the journey of life may prove, are duties which are constantly enforced at our meetings. Brotherly love, truth, temperance fortitude justice and charity, have always been held in high repute by the friends of mankind, and by none more so, than by the members of this fraternity. Indeed, these have been called, Masonic virtues, from the great importance Masons attach to them. Brotherly love, how amiable in itself! No wonder that the poet king exclaimed, "Behold how good and joyful thing it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." The Saviour, not only taught this duty, but exemplified it in every action of his life—wherever he directed his steps, this virtue appeared to animate him. The disciple, who was honored with a large portion of his Masters affection, John the Evangelist, the patron of our order, in his beautiful writing, lays the greatest stress upon this virtue; and history records, that when the infirmities of old age disqualified him from any considerable participation in the privileges of the brotherhood he would request to be carried to their assemblies, and would say to them, "Let us love one another." Oh! thrice happy would it be for the world, if the influence of this principle were more extensively prevalent. "The world in which we live" says a beautiful writer, "is full of beautiful sights and sweet sounds; it is a treasure house of melody. Whether the eye ranges over the face of nature at large, and marks all the varied, magnificent, the sweet, the bright, the gentle in wood and mountain, and valley and stream, or rests wondering and admiring on the bright delicate fabric of a flower, the rich hues of a butterfly, or the lustrous plumage of the birds—beauty and brightness are every where. The air we breathe, too is full of sweet sounds, whether in the singing of the birds, the murmuring music of the stream, or the hum of insect world, upon the wing is replete with harmony. But of all lovely sights, and of all the touching sounds whereof the world is full, there is nothing so beautiful, as the sight and the words of benevolence."

Misery, is man's inheritance, and he who alleviates it to the extent of his power makes the nearest approach to his Creator. God is merciful, and the best acknowledgments we can render to him, is to imitate his mercy, and then "propitious heaven takes such acknowledgment as fragrant incense, and doubles all its blessings." Brotherly Love is the peculiar characteristic of Masonry. In discoursing upon the frailties of man, and the mutation of earthly good, it softens the heart, restrains the impetuosity of temper, and calms the agitated waters of strife. Truth, is another virtue upon which much importance is placed by Masons. Viewed in every respect, truth possesses the highest value. It is the foundation of all confidence between intelligent beings, and without it, misery would reign uncontrolled throughout every region of intellectual existence. If a regard to truth generally prevailed what a change would be effected in the condition of the world! Confidence would exist in every department of society! What endless disputes would be prevented! How many ruinous litigations would be obviated! Character would then possess a sacredness, which the unhallowed hand of calumny dare not touch. The obnoxious race of slanderers would be extinct; they would no longer swarm like wasps, about the haunts of society, infusing their deadly sting in every fair flower of promise, and seeding the locust on the fresh verdure of growing reputation and fame. The sentiments of England's immortal bard would then be universally appreciated.

"Good name in man or woman,

Is the immediate jewel of their souls;

Who steals my purse steals trash, 'tis something, nothing,

'Twas mine, 'tis his, and has been slave to thousands;

But he that filches from me my good name,

Robs me of that which not enriches him,

And makes me poor indeed."

In this institution, an inviolable regard to truth is maintained, and illustrated by emblems of the most significant character. The upright Mason despises falsehood. Not only the grosser methods of dishonest gain, are objects of his abhorrence, but the more genteel artifices of fraud and circumvention.

Temperance, ranks among the Masonic virtues, and when we use this term, we would be understood to use it, not in the popular sense, as meaning moderation or an entire abstinence from the use of intoxicating drugs, but in the restraining of every passion, humor or habit that might prove injurious to man in his individual or social capacity. We rejoice over the incalculable amount of good achieved by the labors of Temperance Societies. The Genius of Masonry is decidedly favorable to the subjects which they contemplate, but there is a species of intemperance to which it is peculiarly opposed, and which has not been formally recognized by the temperance effort. We mean religious intemperance or bigotry. Would to God that some benevolent individuals would form an association for the suppression of religious bigotry; for of all the detestable evils that disgrace the Christian world, this is certainly the most to be dreaded. It is fashionable to declaim against the evils of enthusiasm and fanaticism, but what are these when compared with the dark malignant spirit of bigotry. He felt and spoke the language of Masonry, who said, "Enthusiasm has the glory of the sun, to kindle up its mists and clouds with beauty. Fanicism has thunder and lightning and meteors in its gloom, and the tempest which threatens may soon be dispersed; but bigotry is the palpable obscure, solid temperament of darkness mixed with drizzling rain; its pestilential vapors, blast the lovely fruit of piety and goodness, while all noxious, —all prodigious things, crawl forth and increase the horrors of the night. Those who yield to its influences possess no common sympathies. He must belong to their sect, imbibe their prejudices, enter into their antipathies, belittle every article of their creeds, or unto them no better than a heathen or a publican." Of bigotry it may be said,

"She hath no head, and cannot think; she hath
No heart and cannot feel; where'er she moves
It is in wrath; or pauses 'tis in ruin.
Her prayers are curses; her communion death;
Eternity her vengeance; in the blood
Of victims her red decalogue is written."

Masonry has reason to congratulate itself, that it has ever been the inveterate foe to bigotry. It is her creed that not to man, is man accountable for his religious opinions, but to God, and indignantly frowns upon any attempt to interfere with that sacred union which subsists between man and his Creator.

To intemperance of every kind, Masonry is opposed and they who assert the contrary do the institution great injustice.

Fortitude is also a cardinal virtue with Masons. By it we understand that calm and steady habit of the mind which, it enables us bravely to encounter the prospects of ill, or renders us serene and invincible under its pressure. We all know that affliction is the lot of humanity. Upon the permanency of this world's comforts, none can place reliance. Cases frequently occur, in which a single week, a day, an hour, sweeps away all vestige of a memorable felicity, in which the ruin travels faster than the flying showers upon the mountain side,—faster than a musician scatters sounds in which, it was, and it is not, are words of the self-same tongue, in the self-same minute, in which the sun that at noon beheld all sound and prosperous, long before its setting, looks out upon a total wreck, and sometimes too upon a total abolition of any fugitive memorial that there ever had been, a vessel to be wrecked, or a wreck to be obliterated. Fortitude enables us to submit to the adverse changes of life with firmness. Never to be discouraged by difficulties, to persevere amidst repeated disappointments, to struggle manfully against opposition, and to trust in providence, are lessons which fortitude teaches. He who is blessed with this virtue, rises superior to all the ills of life. He is like a traveller who has ascended to the summit of some lofty mountain, in the midst of a tempest. The spot on which he stands is luminous, though all around is dark, and whilst the woods and valleys below are wrapped in clouds and ravaged by the storm, he enjoys a glorious sunshine a perpetual calm. Need you be reminded, my Masonic brethren, how frequently, and how forcibly you have been taught the virtue of Fortitude.

Justice is also held in high estimation by the members of this fraternity. It consists in a scrupulous regard to the rights of others. To the violation of this principle may be attributed a large portion of the evils with which the world is afflicted. If the principle of justice were universally recognized, the world would present a scene upon which angels would gaze with delight. To be just in every respect is a primary duty of Masons. they are taught faithfully to respect their engagements, never to take advantage of the ignorance and weaknesses of their fellow men, to give every one credit for integrity of purpose, until the contrary is shown, and not to misinterpret actions by ascribing to them improper motives.

But time warns us that we have intruded upon your indulgence too long, proceed we therefore to consider the last of the Masonic virtues, which is Charity; pronounced by the authority of inspiration to be the greatest of all virtues.

St. Paul, in his inimitable description of this virtue, says, "And now abideth faith, hope, charity, but the greatest of these, is Charity." How can its features be printed. To draw it justly, the pencil must be drawn by the heart. Charity does not merely consist of almsgiving. To confine it to this single exercise, would be a gross abuse of the word. Whatever is kind, whatever is amiable, whatever is lovely, is included in Charity. It is hardly a virtue, which can be described, by some peculiar or uniform mode of operation. It seems to be a combination of every good quality. It is a temper of mind, which induces an individual to look at every thing with delight. "Not a breeze flies o'er the meadow—not a cloud imbibes the setting sun's effulgence—not a song from all the warbling tenants of the shade ascends, but whence the bosom of the charitable man can partake fresh pleasure and delight." Charity, is man exalted to perfection. It is man endowed with the spirit of Deity. It never slanders, it never ridicules, it never undervalues, it never misconstrues a word, it never disregards reasons, it never perverts meaning, it gives to all due praise and credit. But why attempt a description of this God-like virtue?

"For a theme like this would ask an angel lyre, Language of light and sentiment of fire."

These are the virtues which distinguish the order of Masons and they are such as must commend themselves to every lover of the human species.

SIMPLE MEANS OF PURIFYING WATER.

It is not so generally known as it ought to be, that pounded alum possesses the property of purifying water. A large table spoonful of pulverised alum, sprinkled into a hogshead of water, (the water stirred round at the time,) will, after the lapse of a few hours, by precipitating to the bottom the impure parcels, so purify it, that it will be found to possess nearly all the freshness and clearness of the finest spring water. A pailful containing four gallons, may be purified with a single tea spoonful.

MISCELLANY.

GEORGE FOX.

George Fox, the founder of the society of Friends, or Quakers, was born at Drayton, in Leicestershire, in 1624. His father, who was a weaver, educated him religiously. Being apprenticed to a grazier, he was much employed in the keeping of sheep; and it is thought that so solitary an employment confirmed that tendency to enthusiasm which he displayed from his infancy. At the age of 19, he persuaded himself that he had received a divine command to forsake every thing else, and devote himself solely to religion. He accordingly forsook his relations, equipped himself in a leathern doublet, and wandered from place to place, supporting himself as he could. Being discovered in the metropolis, his friends induced him to return; he, however, remained with them a very short time, resuming a life of itinerancy, in which he fasted much, walked abroad in retired places, studying the Bible, and sometimes sat in a hollow tree for a day together. In 1648, he began to propagate his opinions, and commenced public preacher at Manchester; whence he soon after made excursions through the neighboring counties, where he preached to the people in the market-places. About this time, he began to adopt the peculiar language and manners of Quakerism, and he experienced some of the persecutions to which all active novelty, in the way of religious opinion, was in those days exposed. At Derby, the followers of Fox were first denominated Quakers, in consequence of their trembling mode of delivery, and calls on the magistracy to tremble before the Lord. In 1655, he was sent a prisoner to Cromwell, who, having ascertained the pacific tendency of his doctrines, had him set at liberty. He was, however, treated with great severity by the county magistracy, in consequence of his interruption of ministers during divine service, and exclamations in the churches, and was more than once obliged to the interference of the protector for his freedom. On the occasion of a fast appointed on account of the persecution of the Protestants abroad, he addressed a paper to the heads and governors of the nation, in which he forcibly described the inconsistency of similar severity at home. In 1666, he was liberated from prison by order of Charles II., and immediately set about forming the people, who had followed his doctrines, into a formal and united society. In 1669, he married the widow of Judge Fell, in the same simple manner which still distinguishes the marriages of his followers, and soon after went to America, where he remained two years, which he employed in making proselytes. On his return he was thrown in Worcester gaol, but was quickly released, and went to Holland. He soon after returned, and was cast in a suit for tithes which he deemed it unlawful to pay; and in 1684, again visited the continent, where he did not long remain, and, his health becoming impaired by incessant toil, imprisonment and suffering, he lived more retired until his death, in 1690, in the 67th year of his age. Exclusive of a few separate pieces, the writings of Fox are collected into 3 volumes folio; the first of which contains his Journal, the second his Epistles, and the third his Doctrinal Pieces. He was undoubtedly a man of strong natural parts; and William Penn speaks in high terms of his meekness, humility and temperance.—Encyclopedia Americana.

CURIOUS ANECDOTE.

A nobleman, in the early part of the reign of Louis XV., having a very vicious horse, which none of the grooms or servants would ride,—several of them having been thrown, and one killed,—asked leave of his majesty to have him turned loose, into the menagerie, against one of the largest lions. The king consented, and the animal, on a certain day was conducted thither. Soon after the arrival of the horse, the door of the den was drawn up, and the lion, with great state and majesty, marched slowly to the mouth of it, when seeing his antagonist, he set up a tremendous roar.—The horse immediately started and fell back, his ears were erected, his mane was raised, his eyes sparkled, and something like a general convulsion seemed to agitate his whole frame. After the first emotions of fear had subsided, the horse retired to a corner of the menagerie, where, having directed his heels towards the lion, and having reared his head over his left shoulder, he watched with extreme eagerness the motions of his enemy. The lion, who presently quitted the den, sidled about for more than a minute, when, having sufficiently prepared himself for the combat, he made a sudden spring at the horse, which defended itself by striking his adversary a most violent blow on the chest. The lion instantly retreated, groaned, and seemed for several minutes inclined to give up the contest, when recovering from the painful effects of the blow, he returned to the charge with unabated violence. The mode of preparation for this second attack was the same as the first. He sidled from one side of the menagerie to the other, for a considerable time, seeking a favorable opportunity to seize his prey; during which time the horse still preserved the same posture, and still kept his head erect and turned over his shoulder. The lion at length gave a second spring, with all the strength and velocity he could exercise, when the horse caught him with his hoofs on the under jaw, which he fractured. Having sustained a second and more severe repulse than the former, the lion retreated to his den as well as he was able, apparently in the greatest agony, moaning all the way in a most lamentable manner.—The horse was soon obliged to be shot, as no one ever dared to approach the ground where he was kept.—Illustrations of Natural History.

PIGS.

If there be any thing in which perverseness is humorously provoking, it is in the stubborn wrong-headedness of a thorough paced pig. He that drives a pig ought to be blest with even more patience than Job, for surely none other could drive one to market. Imagine yourself at a cross road, with a whip in one hand, and a pig at the extreme end of a long rope, for he will have the whole length of his tether. If you direct the head of your charge, by directing his tail due north, he looks toward the road as if conscious that it led to that "undistinguishable borne from whence no traveller returns," he can not oblige you, so turns round and makes with all his legs for the south. If neither of these ways are agreeable, he has no objection to turning entirely round and retracing his steps back to the sty of his nativity; and if you can not decide on this proposition immediately, he is polite enough to persist in waiting your leisure, and sticks to his point as immovable as a rusted weathercock, at last he veers round like the boxing hand of a compass to all points, but keeps to none, neither making way forward, sideward, or backward. Your patience now begins to fail, and you apply the whip in the most persuasive manner possible; he squeaks very penitently, and utters his shrill laments till all the passengers stop their ears with their fingers, and housekeepers shut down their windows. He seems to regret his incapacity to please you, let him turn which way he will; but relaxes nothing of his perverseness. You then twist his thin and useless tail round your thumb, till you have screwed it as tight as it were in a tourniquet, and endeavor to urge him forward by the last resource of defeated pig-drivers. His counter-tenor squeak is only the more piercing and pathetic; but he is as undecidably decided as ever as to the tenor of his way. And now, stunned by his shrieks, you loose his tail, and pull resolutely at the string which keeps him prisoner by the leg. He was at that moment advancing almost twice his own length on the road we wished him to take, but that pull is construed a direct command to stand still, and once more he is as fixed as monumental marble." You ply the whip till his sides look like a tally of the number of lashes he has received; but he seems to think whipping an unmerited compliment. You pull the leg, twist the tail, and flug the flank, for half an hour longer; he squeaks up and down the whole compass of chromatic scale, till every note is run through, and your head feels as if sharp swords were thrusting through both ears. Meanwhile the blackguard boys swarm round you like bees at a gathering—one volunteers a stick with a nail in it a second a stone, a third pushes his cap in the face of your charge; and the rest raise the exulting halloo, or keep up the roaring laugh. These insults put your pig on his mettle, and he either bolts in between their legs promiscuously, and tumbles them down one after another, or else, selecting some newly breached urchin in particular, he flings the bread-and-butter muncher over his back into the mud. The bystanders laugh louder than ever—seizing the porky perplexity by the hind legs, you fling over your shoulder, and sweat all the way to the market town, while your tender charge is making the streets vocal with one long continued shriek.—London Paper.

PRESERVING WINTER APPLES.

Last April, a year I visited a friend, when he made me a present of a large dish of fine flavored apples, and in being out of season to have apples in such a good state of preservation, I inquired his mode of keeping them. He informed me that in the fall he made a box six feet deep, which he sunk into the ground to a level with the surface, when he filled the box with sound apples, and covered it with boards in the form of a roof, but leaving an opening at both ends. The roof he also covered with straw and earth to the usual thickness of an apple or potatoe hole. In this condition he leaves it till the apples are frozen, but as soon as a thaw comes he makes it perfectly tight, and in a few days the frost is altogether removed, and the apples are as fresh and perfect as when they were taken from the trees.

I am aware that this is an excellent plan because I know that most of the apples and potatoes in holes rot and decay, in consequence of the warm and foul air accumulating, having no opportunity to escape. I thought, however, to improve it. I consequently, last fall, buried my apples in the usual way; then I took four strips of one inch boards and nailed them together in the form of a chimney, leaving a vacancy in the middle, of one inch square, this I placed in the centre of the apple hole, the end resting on the apples inside, and the other end projecting two feet above the ground. This succeeded far beyond my expectations. The vacancy in the chimney was barely sufficient to permit the foul air to escape, and not so large, as to let the frost in to affect the apples. My family during the winter, whenever they wished to have apples for consumption, only removed the chimney and reached in with the hand to get a supply, and then replaced it again; and I can assure you that of eight bushels that were thus buried, only three rotten and five or six slightly affected apples were discovered, whereas my neighbors, who buried their apples in the old fashioned way, lost a large quantity.—Albany Cultivator.

A SCOTTISH LEGEND.

A married couple of the Scottish Highlanders had thrice their only child, each dying at an early age. Upon the death bed of the last, the father became boisterous and uttered his complaints in the loudest tones.

The death of the child happened late in the spring, when, in the more inhabited straths, sheep were abroad; but, from the blasts in the high and stormy region, they were still confined to the cot. In a dismal, stormy evening, the man, unable to stifle his anguish, went out, lamenting aloud, for a lamb to treat his friends at the wake (or funeral feast.) At the door of the cot he found a stranger standing before the entrance. He was astonished at such a sight, so far from any frequented place! The stranger was plainly attired, but he had a countenance singularly expressive of mildness and benevolence; and addressing the father in a sweet impressive voice, asked what he did there amid the tempest?

He was filled with awe which he could not account for, and answered that he came for a lamb.

"What kind of a lamb do you mean to take?" said the stranger.

"The very best I can find," replied he, as it is to entertain my friends; and I hope you will share of it."

"Do your sheep make any resistance when you take away the lambs?"

"Never," was the answer.

"How differently am I treated," said the traveller, "when I come to visit my sheepfold I take, as I am well entitled to do, the best lamb to myself, and my ears are filled with the clamor of discontent by these ungrateful sheep, whom I have fed, watched, and protected."

He looked up in amazement, but—the vision had fled.

"IS IT TIME?" OR THE HEROINE OF THE TYROL.

A STORY FOUNDED ON FACT.

My regiment was quartered in the ancient town of Trent, from the year 1806, when the Tyrol was annexed to the realm of Bavaria, until 1809; and the latter part of this period will ever exist in my recollection, as the most eventful epoch I have hitherto encountered.

The Bavarian sway, as is well known, was exceedingly unpopular throughout the newly incorporated country; and, in consequence, our sojourn was none of the pleasantest; in fact, for a long time we were sedulously cut by the inhabitants of Trent and its neighborhood; and when at length they condescended to notice us at all, it was most frequently to pick a quarrel, and to show their teeth at least, if they dared not bite.

It will readily be imagined, that this state of things was particularly irksome to a party chiefly consisting of young officers eager in the pursuit of diversion, and wearied with the monotony of a garrison life. We were compelled to contract our enjoyments within a very narrow circle, which almost prohibited the chance of variety; when, one evening, after a jovial mess, it was proposed by two or three of the most volatile amongst us, that we should, at any risk, assist at a soirée which we had heard was to be given the same night at a mansion within a mile or two of the town. This mad-headed project was adopted—despite the remonstrances of the more sober and reflecting of our cloth—by myself and some half dozen other swaggering, or rather staggering youths, who most likely deemed themselves the elite of his Bavarian Majesty's—regiment of light dragoons.

Amidst continued and boisterous merriment at the idea of a Tyrolese assemblee, we pursued our route, and reaching the chateau, penetrated, ere the wonder-stricken domestic had to announce us, into the principal saloon, which to our surprise, was filled with a company apparently as well-dressed, and well-bred, as might on an average be found at the conversazioni of Munich itself. Our sudden and unexpected presence seemed to paralyse the whole assemblage; and many eyes were turned upon us as glaring as those of Tybalt at the intrusion of the hostile Montague. As in that instance, however, so now, the host—a courteous and sensible man—betook himself to soften matters; and politely advancing, both welcomed and invited us to sit. We had prepared ourselves for every circumstance save one—which one was precisely that I have just related. We should infallibly, flushed as we were with wine, have persisted in exchanging some chit-chat with the country-belles, even had we been subsequently obliged to retreat, sword in hand to our quarters. But thus received by the master of the house, our heroism fell fruitless, and we certainly cut but a sorry figure: it was fortunate that one of our party possessed presence of mind enough to extricate himself and comrades from so embarrassing a dilemma.

In candid terms, he begged pardon of the host for our unauthorised and unmanly intrusion; pleaded, in excuse, the miserable monotony of our quarters; appealed to the ladies indulgently to step forward as peacemakers between us and their male friends; and, in short, succeeded in placing all parties finally on easy and good-humored terms.

Amongst the numerous damsels present, one in particular attracted and fixed my notice. She was very young; but her whole contour, and the sweet intellectuality of her countenance, impelled me to devote to her my entire attention; nor did the fair Doreatha—for so I found she was called—seem disposed to repel these advances. In fact, the whole of the company grew more and more sociable, with one solitary exception—that of an individual called Rusen, whose dark complexion and wily features looked more Italian than German, and formed a striking contrast to the smiling sunny aspect of Doreatha. It was indeed difficult to imagine that any thing could exist in common between two persons apparently so opposite: but I observed that in proportion to the increase of my familiarity, with the latter, the sinister countenance of Rusen waxed more and more gloomy.

The lady evidently remarked this change; and when it became so palpable as not to be mistaken, she made up to him, and tried sundry little arts and enticements to win him back to complacency. This undoubtedly looked like love; and the strange suspicion was confirmed by a bystander, who, on the young lady's quitting my neighborhood, laughingly said, "Take heed; you will incur the vengeance of Rusen, who is a scheming sort of a fellow, if you continue to flirt with his betrothed." The words sounded unaccountably; for even at that moment, as I gazed on the pair, her anxious agitated manner bore rather the semblance of fear than affection. Indeed, from a feeling I could scarcely define, I resolved that this alleged contract should not prevent my offering to escort the fair one home—which, when the hour of separation arrived, I accordingly took occasion to do. She declined the offer with a bland smile. I did not press it under the circumstances, but turned away to saunter once more through the rooms. On returning however toward the spot, my surprise was great to see Doreatha still seated there, alone, and apparently much chagrined. "Captain," said she as I approached, and striving to assume a tone of gaiety, "I fear you will accuse me of caprice, but were your offer now repeated, I should accept it." Of course, I lost no time in profiting by this alteration, and having summoned Doreatha's attendant, we at once set forward for her home, which I understood to be at some little distance on the Botzen road.

The night was dark and the streets deserted. The domestic preceded us with a torch, and by its rays I could perceive that my companion's features were thoughtful and abstracted. To all my efforts to engage her in conversation, she answered by monosyllables; until at length she suddenly exclaimed, "Captain Lieber, I am now near home, and have no further cause to dread interruption or molestation. You, on the contrary, being unfortunately a Bavarian," (and I thought I could detect a sigh as she spoke,) "are obnoxious to many around us. I entreat you, therefore, to return to your quarters; do so as expeditiously and quietly as may be, and forget a weakness which has possibly caused me to lead you into peril." She uttered these words, though whisperingly, with much earnestness; and, as if to give them greater force, at the same time pressed my arm with fervor. That pressure thrilled through my heart; but its effect was different from what she had intended, for I was the more determined to escort her safely to her door.

On reaching the chateau, we found it enveloped in darkness and silence, but Doreatha having knocked at a window, it was gently opened, and after a moment's whispering, a large cloak and slouched hat were handed out to her. "Take these," said she to me, "disguise may now be necessary. They will serve to conceal your uniform and your cap."

"What dread you then?" I inquired, somewhat startled. "We Bavarians and the Tyrolese now form one people; we are not at war with each other, and even the peasantry will soon become friendly to a government which requires nothing but order and submission to lawful power."

"Lawful power," responded the lovely rebel, "can proceed neither from the sword nor pen—from the issue of battles nor negotiations of peace."

"From whence, then, does it proceed?"

"From the will of the people. But I must not argue with you," pursued she smiling; "all I seek just now is a sound night's repose, which I am sure you will not, by neglecting my caution, deprive me of."

By way of answer, I enveloped myself in the ample folds of the mantle. I raised her delicate little hands to my lips; and, tempted by her acquiescence, exclaimed, "You are obeyed; but ere I go, dear Doreatha, tell me—are you indeed betrothed to that gloomy-looking Rusen?"

"Yes—no!" replied she, and, flinging into the house put a stop to all further communication.

Transported with an indistinct emotion of hope, I quitted the dwelling of the lovely Tyrolese, and commenced my journey homewards. For awhile my imagination wandered into all sorts of delightful prospects for the future, until the obscurity of the path recalled me to the passing moment. I fancied that, through the prevailing gloom, I could distinguish, in the distance, the faint lights of the little town of Trent; and thus encouraged, was walking briskly onward, when my progress was arrested by coming close upon a human figure apparently mantled like myself, and gliding forward with noiseless steps. Whilst listening for some signs of life from this object, it suddenly disappeared. I paused in surprise; and a moment after, a voice behind me murmured softly, "Is it time?"—Instinctively disguising my tones, I replied, "Time to be snug in bed, friend;" on which the challenger, as if mistaken in the party he had addressed, without another word retired.

There was something about this circumstance coupled with the preceding ones, that I did not altogether like—particularly as I thought I recognised, in the voice I had just heard, that of Rusen. Grasping the hilt of my sabre, I struck out of the main road, and took a by-path, which, at the expense of a little detour might, I conceived, save me from the hazard of being waylaid. This path led through some conventual ruins, and I resolved on reaching them, to play the sentinel for a few minutes, and reconnoitre before I penetrated further into the valley before me. I threaded my way among the rotting walls cautiously and in silence—and it was well I did so, or I should have stumbled right upon a man, who with folded arms, was leaning against a parapet. He must have been dozing, for the next moment he started at the voice of a person (who approached from another quarter) uttering the question I had before heard, "Is it time?" The voice was certainly Rusen's, and his interlocutor answered with the word, "Salurn!"

"Has he passed you?" inquired Rusen.

"No: not a mouse could have gone by me unobserved," rejoined the watchful sentinel, "much less an accursed Bavarian."

"Come back with me then to the high road, and we will go onward, for he cannot be much longer, and the more distant we are from the town, the better."

The conspirators (whose purpose was now evident) retired, and as soon as their footsteps grew faint in the distance, I emerged from the friendly buttress which had concealed me, and hastened, with returning confidence, to my quarters.

On inquiry, next morning, I learnt that Rusen was a native of Verona, but possessed of great property and influence in the neighborhood of Botzen. He was considered as the accepted lover of Doreatha, who, however, it was generally suspected, in receiving his addresses, was swayed more by political motives than the hope of connubial happiness. This remarkable young creature, at that time just budding forth a delicate and fragile maiden, had distinguished herself three years previously, when her country fell into the hands of Bavaria, by her ingenuity in suggesting continual obstacles to the domination of the Bavarian government. Yet, urged by my hopes, I could not help imagining (from the interest she took in my preservation) that her hostility to my native land was either decreased, or had been exaggerated.

Some time elapsed, after these occurrences, ere I could again obtain an interview with Doreatha. Meanwhile, I one evening received orders to escort with my troop a supply of money to Botzen. As I must pass her father's chateau on the route, I resolved at all hazards to attempt to see the object of so many both of my waking and sleeping thoughts. I therefore gave instructions to my lieutenant to await me at a village a little further on, and dismounting, struck into a circuitous path which led to the hall-door of the mansion. Finding this open, I was in the act of presenting myself unannounced in the parlor, when I was fixed to the spot by the startling voice of Rusen, "To-morrow night, then!" he exclaimed to some other person in the apartment, "to-morrow night, in the Salurn Castle!"

"Agreed—but stay—hear me!" and I recognised the tones of Doreatha.

I recollect not the precise train of thoughts that whirled through my brain—there was something of jealousy—of disappointment—of indignation; when my consciousness flowed once more in a clear stream, I found myself on a full gallop after my troop in advance.

Upon our return the following afternoon, I shifted the quarters of my company to the village Salurn, and having seen both men and horses properly billeted, crossed, towards twilight, a wild and terrific chasm, forming one of the natural defences of the ruined castle which towered high over-head, its turrets glowing with the rays of the setting sun, whilst beneath all was quickly becoming immersed in gloom. Having never beheld these majestic remains at so favorable a moment, I was for some time absorbed by the contemplation: from this reverie, however, I was aroused by the sudden apparition of a young mountaineer, who leapt from crag to crag with inconceivable agility. To avoid any risk of insult from the peasantry, I had laid aside my regimental dress, and therefore watched the boy's progress, heedless whether or not he should be followed by a train. He passed swiftly as the wind, but in passing threw toward me a scrap of paper, which he took from a small basket on his arm. I eagerly examined it, but found nothing more than the enigmatical words—"Tis time!"

I turned over and over in my mind the probable meaning of these emphatic syllables. Their reference to Rusen's mysterious question was palpable; but what did both conjointly imply? Although the Tyrolese were known to be generally disaffected to their existing rulers, yet no evidences had been given of open, and organised hostility. It is true—for my suspicions now aggravated every occurrence I could not thoroughly explain—that I had latterly observed several groups of persons engaged in close and anxious conversation; and in one instance, saw a considerable body of men fixing their eyes intently on the summit of Salurn Castle; but these were vague circumstances, which yielded to positive deduction.

What was to be done? At first, I felt strongly disposed to return to the village and get my troops under arms; but my interest to discover whether Rusen and Dorothea met at so strange a time, and in so strange a place, was unconquerable, heightened too by their manifest connexion with what I now began to consider a watchword. I resolved finally, since I was so far on the road to satisfy myself first in this matter, and then hasten to Salurn and Trent and take the necessary precautions.

Accordingly, I pushed on my way, nor relaxed in any pace, although I had to struggle with sundry steep ascents and rude crags, until I found myself at the foot of the immense rock whereon the castle stands.—The grand difficulty now was, to discover the direct rough-hewn flight of steps leading up to the structure, in seeking which I explored the entire circumference, and lost so much time it had grown dusk all round me. What my sensations were during this interval it is impossible to describe!

Thus situated, my quick ear detected the voice of Rusen. It sounded from beyond a projecting corner of the cliff. Favored by the darkness, I groped round, and had scarce doubled the point when the transient gleam of a lantern fell on three figures, in whom I recognised Rusen, Dorothea, and a female whom I did not remember to have seen before. This momentary light likewise enabled me to attain a spot whence I could hear, at least whatever passed.

Complete silence was maintained by all three for some time—and in the doubtful light their outlines reminded me of a group of marble statues. "Hear me," at length exclaimed Rusen in a rough and angered voice, "and let us fully understand each other. I am, as you know, not a Tyrolese. I have no personal feelings to gratify by setting this unhappy country in a blaze. On the contrary, those peaceful plans of commerce which have brought me hither, thrive best when public tranquility is established. If, therefore, I stand committed to this confederacy, and throw into the scale my money, influence, and credit, my reward must be rendered certain. Pronounce therefore the word, Dorothea; say that to-morrow you will be my wife, and this moment will I spring up the rocky height. Speak clearly and firmly; for no longer, and least of all, here, will I be trifled with."

A few moments elapsed ere Dorothea answered, and when she did, her tones were so faint and tremulous that it was quite impossible to distinguish them. "She has consented," exclaimed the other female; "up then if you be a man!"

So intense was my excitement that the whole scene was, as it were branded upon my heart. The parties moved away, and with stealthy pace I followed. A minute after, the light was seen ascending, as if spontaneously, the face of the cliff. Its position enabled me to hit upon the steps, which, without a moment's hesitation, I began to mount. They were almost perpendicular—slippery and dangerous; but, as if by instinct, my feet fixed themselves firmly in the friendly cavities. I quickly gained upon the light, whilst I felt my strength redoubled by the tigerlike feeling which works on man when he finds almost within his grasp a deadly foe. Immediately above us was a narrow platform running round the base of the building, and here I overtook my rival.

My advancing footsteps induced him to turn in surprise, and at the same instant I rushed on and seized him by the throat. "Jesu Maria!" cried he, as his fingers convulsively sought some firm hold upon me, "Is it not time?"

"Yes!" I rejoined, "it is time!" and as the gleam of the lantern showed him my features, his own expressed a mingled feeling of exultation and horror.—"In the name of the king," I pursued, "I apprehend you as a traitor. Will you resign yourself my prisoner?"

"Never!" shouted he.

"Then down with you!" and with my collected strength I dragged him to the brink of the awful precipice.

The Italian struggled desperately, and we hung together for several minutes over the abyss. A complexity of passions nerved my arm. Personal antipathy to the man, loyalty to my king, love of Dorothea, all combined to animate me; but my antagonist possessed considerable muscular strength, and I doubt whether the issue would have been successful for me, had he not relaxed his hold in order to draw a poignard. This action was fatal to the unfortunate Rusen. I had obtained considerable celebrity in wrestling, with which manly exercise we often beguiled a wearisome hour in garrison, and the instant, that he loosed his gripe, I got my foot between his, and fairly tripped him up.

He fell heavily and headlong from the platform upon the mass of rock beneath, uttering a piercing yell. I stood a moment almost petrified; but having recovered from this stupor, my next step was to descend again the rocky stairs and discover whether my victim yet lived. On reaching the spot whereon he had fallen, I found already there, Dorothea and her friend, bending with speechless horror over the motionless body of Rusen, at whose breast the lantern still remained suspended and unextinguished.

"Are you here, captain!" exclaimed Dorothea half shrieking: "merciful heaven, is this a dream?"

"Let us think of it hereafter but as one," replied I. "You, at any rate, must have no share in this scene of crime and death."

She answered not, but knelt and unloosed the lamp from the body of Rusen. "Leave me, leave me, Capt. Lieber. I must hence, to obey the call of a sacred duty. As poor Rusen, alas! no longer lives to perform it, I must complete his intention."

"Dorothea!" exclaimed I, "this is the language of madness. You are at present strongly excited, and not able to think for yourself. I must therefore insist on conducting you from this accursed spot. Come, let us begone! my duty summons me away."

"What duty?" rejoined she, firmly but sadly.—"You go to be the means of betraying, perhaps to death, the ill-fated being you have said you loved."

"Never, by heaven!" cried I: "not by a word, not by a look."

"But there may be other witnesses of this transaction, and—" she paused a moment, and then resumed—"In the centre turret of the castle above us are deposited certain papers, which I am resolved to demolish with the flame of this lamp: otherwise I cannot rest in peace."

"If that be all, I will accomplish it. Give me the lamp."

"You, captain!"—and she shuddered as she spoke.

"Nay, dearest Dorothea, hesitate no longer: time presses."

The maiden wrung her hands and wept aloud.

"Do you fear," resumed I, scarce knowing what I said, "that I should examine the papers, and betray their contents?"

"I confess that is my fear," replied she lingeringly. "Shall I then swear not to do so?"

"No, but promise by your honor, by your love for me, that when you have ascended the turret, and found the packet which is placed upon a small box on a flat stone near its top, you will—without looking for any inscription—instantly burn both box and packet, and watch their gradual consumption to ashes. Do you promise this?"

"I do on the honor of a soldier."

The agitating occurrences of the night had thrown my mind into a state of chaos. I was incapable at the moment of any connected train of thought, and my predominant feeling was the renewed hope of at length attaining Dorothea's heart and hand.

I seized the lamp from the grasp of the heroic though trembling girl, and having once more climbed the precipitous steep, gained its pinnacle without accident. I felt dizzy for a moment on reaching the level from whence the unfortunate Rusen had been dashed; but with unflinching resolution waded over broken stones and rubbish, until I was at the foot of the ruined central tower. Its wind-stair was imperfect and dilapidated, and I was half dead with fatigue, ere I had reached the top. The fresh air, however, which then blew unimpeded over my head, did much to revive me, and at length I approached the mysterious packet. It was deposited on a stone which projected a little from the wall.

True to my promise, I averted my eyes whilst applying the flame to the objects mentioned. The paper however, having probably become damp, would not readily ignite, and I was thus unwillingly forced to turn and look toward the stone whereon it rested, when I perceived its surface to be—completely blank!

An icy coldness shot through every vein as I made this discovery. Meantime, the paper had taken fire, and as it blazed, emitted sundry sparks as if from gunpowder; and having communicated to the box beneath, immediately a huge column of blue flame ascended, steadily, high into the air.

My mental perceptions became clear on the instant. All traces of confusion vanished from my brain, and the whole truth was at once developed. With sudden impulse and supernatural strength, I drew the stone from the wall, and hurled it, box and all, into the void below; but it was too late!—the signal was given.—From the summit of every hill, far and near, fires arose, as if simultaneously, tossing about their flames like so many hell-spirits, in the blackness of night, replying to each other's call. The next moment were heard the drums of the infantry, and the trumpets of the dragoons, and these were quickly succeeded by the thunder of small arms and cannon which echoed from valley to valley.

How I descended, first the turret; and then the rock. I have not the most distant knowledge. Tearing myself from the outstretched arms of Dorothea, I sprang like a maniac into the village. Alas! I just arrived in time to see my brave fellows, surrounded and overwhelmed, cut to pieces by armed peasantry. Every where around was shouted the signal cry—"It is time!"—On that fatal night the Tyrol was lost to Bavaria!

Struck by a bullet I fell; and when, after great and protracted suffering, I was once more enabled to conceive what passed around me. I found the mountain-land restored into the arms of Austria, and recognized in my nurse its heroic patriot, Dorothea; who—hostilities having ceased and no further national jealousy existing between us—shortly afterwards became my wife.

I won't be a Nun; or, the Nautical Adventures of a Young Lady.—A singularly romantic affair has just been brought to our notice—namely, that of a female sailor having arrived here some days ago in the ship Bucephalus. We understand that she is a very comely interesting girl of eighteen, (the daughter of an English officer, and related to an English nobleman,) who, having the misfortune to lose her mother at an early age, was placed in an English convent, with the view ultimately of taking the veil. Whilst a boarder in this place, she, for the sake of her health, visited occasionally some friends in the neighborhood, where, in the house of one, she first met the object of her attachment, now an officer in one of the native regiments. Subsequently she was consigned to a convent in Dublin, to the end that she should take the veil: here she remained some months; but resisting every argument to induce her to do so, privation, suffering, and cruel treatment, at the hands of the lady superior, were her lot. She fell sick, and was conveyed to a hospital, whence, through the confidence of a young English lady, an inmate of the convent, who supplied her with the means, she made her escape in the disguise of a boy, and formed the romantic resolution of coming out to Bombay, in search of the young officer above mentioned. We are told it would occupy a volume were we to recount all her wanderings, and the sufferings and privations of the poor young creature in her endeavors to get on board a ship bound to Bombay. This at last she accomplished. A few days after the ship sailed, "the strange boy," on being questioned by the captain whence he came, proved to be a young lady; a cabin was humanely allotted to her at once, and she was treated exactly as a lady passenger.

"Truth is strange—stranger than fiction."

And here is romance in real life that decidedly elucidates the saying of the poet. We understand that this young lady's history has excited considerable interest and admiration among the society of Bombay. Probably the whole ample page of fiction could not present an instance of greater determination and constancy than is exemplified by this case.—Bombay Times.

AN IRISH BARGAIN.

The children of Paddy's land are not less remarkably felicitous than ever for the union of blundering and ingenuity in their intercourse with each other and the rest of the world. A recent and novel incident at Leighlinbridge gives a new testimony to the fact. A maiden resident in that parish—gay and hearty was she, but weary of single blessedness—had the rumour circulated that the lad of her choice could have 10! with her hand. She was comely in person and agreeable in temper—a fortune in herself—as all the country said. A "neighbor's son" was moved with the rumour; he knew Nanny; collared to her; made his bow and proposals together, and was accepted as her darling. But the lass was, with other good qualities, candid—and hinted, before the Priest was put in requisition, that her fortune had become by 4! the "worse for wear." "Awkward enough," says Pat, "what is to be done?" "Ah!"—sighed Nan, laying her dimpled cheek so loving on her swain's—"tis a long lane that has no turn; I'll give my note, love for the deficiency." "Cushlamachree, that's the cut," replied Pat; and, imprinting a buss upon his Nanny's lips, got the knot fastened that evening.—Dublin Pap.

CONSEQUENCES OF ATHEISM.

BY DR. CHANNING.

Few men suspect, perhaps no man comprehends, the extent of the support given by religion to every virtue. No man perhaps is aware, how much our moral and social sentiments are fed from this fountain; how powerless conscience would become without the belief of a God; how palsied would be human benevolence, to quicken and sustain it; how suddenly the whole social fabric would quake, and with what a fearful crash it would sink into hopeless ruins, were the ideas of a Supreme Being, of accountability, and of a future life to be utterly erased from every mind.—Once let men thoroughly believe, that they are the work and sport of chance; that no superior intelligence concerns itself with human affairs; that all their improvements perish forever at death; that the weak have no guardian, and the injured no avenger; that there is no recompense for sacrifices to uprightness and the public good; that an oath is unheard in heaven; that secret crimes have no witness but the perpetrator; that human existence has no purpose, and human virtue no unfailing friend; that this brief life is every thing to us, and death is total everlasting extinction—once let men thoroughly abandon religion, and who can conceive, or describe the extent of the desolation which would follow.

We hope, perhaps, that human laws and natural sympathy would hold society together. As reasonably might we believe, that, were the sun quenched in the heavens our torches could illuminate, and our fires quicken, and fertilize creation. What is there in human nature to awaken respect and tenderness, if man is the unprotected insect of a day? and what is he more if Atheism be true? Erase all thought and fear of God from a community, and selfishness, and sensualty would absolve the whole man. Appetite, knowing no restraint, and poverty and suffering, having no solace or hope, would trample in scorn on the restraints of human laws. Virtue, duty, principle would be mocked and spurned as unmeaning sounds. A sordid self-interest would supplant every other feeling, and man would become in fact, what the theory of Atheism declares him to be, a companion for brutes!

SOLON'S LAWS.

In the third year of the 46th olympiad, Solon being archon the land owners and citizens, debtors and creditors, were in open feud. Solon was called upon to legislate. His first step was to arrange matters between debtor and creditor, which he accomplished by altering the standard, and lowering the rate of interest. He then deprived the nobility of a portion of their former power, by dividing all the people into four classes, regulated by property: thus, while he introduced a democracy, founding a new aristocracy. The nobility, as possessors of the largest properties, as the sole members of the court of Areopagus, as possessed of the priesthoods, and directors of religious ceremonies, still retained an ample degree of influence. By the establishment of the Council of Four Hundred, an annually rotating college, he at once gave so many families an interest in the new order of things, that there remained no chance of its being totally subverted. He finally made all the people swear not to make any alteration during the next ten years, deeming that period sufficiently long for habituating them to the new constitution.

ORIGIN OF PAUL PRY.

Mr. Poole, the author of the popular comedy bearing this title, gives in the course of an amusing article in the New Monthly Magazine, the following account of the original suggestion of the character: "The idea of the character of Paul Pry was suggested by the following anecdote, related to me by a beloved friend.—An idle old lady, living in a narrow street, had passed so much of her time in watching the affairs of her neighbors, that she at length acquired the power of distinguishing the sound of every knocker within hearing. It happened that she fell ill, and was for several days confined to her bed. Unable to observe in person, what was going on without, she stationed her maid at the window, as a substitute for the performance of that duty. But Betty soon grew weary of the occupation: she became careless in her report—impatient and tetchy when reprimanded for her negligence. "Betty, what are you thinking about? don't you hear a double knock at 9? who is it?" "The first floor lodger, ma'am." "Betty! Betty! I declare I must give you warning.—Why don't you tell me what that knock is at No. 54." "Why, Lord! ma'am, it is only the baker with pies." "Pies, Betty! what can they want with pies at No. 54? they had pies yesterday!" Of this very point I have availed myself. Let me add that Paul Pry was never intended as the representative of any one individual, but a class. Like the melancholy of Jacques he is a "compound of many Simples;" and I could mention five or six more who were unconscious contributors to the character. That it should have been, though erroneously, supposed to have been drawn after particular persons is, perhaps, complimentary to the general truth of the delineation.

Death of the oldest Methodist Preacher in the World.—Died, at Kingswood Circuit the Rev. James Wood, Wesleyan Minister, in the eighty-ninth year of his age. He entered upon the itinerancy in 1773; and was, at the time of his death, the oldest Methodist preacher in the world. Having travelled fifty-three years, fourteen years ago (reckoning from next conference) he became a supernumerary. He continued to preach as long as his strength would allow, and only desisted when the infirmities of advanced age had entirely disabled him.

SAD.—On Thursday last, at Baltimore, a Miss Elizabeth Doughty, 16 years of age, lost her life; and her aunt, Mrs. Brittingham, narrowly escaped the same fate, from the effects of arsenic, which, as is supposed became accidentally mixed with their coffee during a fire which burned them out a couple of weeks since.

THE EFFECT.—There is perhaps, nothing in the world, which has given a better illustration of the blessings which follow in the train of the temperance cause, than the effects of total abstinence, in Ireland. Every arrival from that country, is of the most gratifying character. A Dublin paper says, that the gaols are as empty, of prisoners, as the whiskey shops are of customers. The judges take their rounds through the provinces more like tourists, than officers of Justice. At Waterford and Limerick, there were no prisoners and the same thing occurred at other places.

INSTALLATION.—Mixville Lodge, No. — will be publicly installed at Mixville, Hums Allegany county on Wednesday, the seventh day of October next, by Br. Blanchard Powers, acting G. M. Ceremonies to commence at 11 o'clock, A. M. The Brethren, generally are invited to attend.

A man named M'Leod, indicted in 1838, as one of the actors in the cutting out and burning of the Caroline in that year, has been arrested and committed at Lockport. It will be remembered that this vessel was set on fire and sent over Niagara Falls, on account of an alleged connection with Navy Island and the Patriots.

Ex-Gov. Call, of Florida, has stated at a public meeting, that he was the originator of the scheme, calling in aid the blood hounds of Cuba to fight their species in Florida. After the election, we trust, the party in power, will adopt some effective measures to have an end put to the Indian massacres on our frontier. If extermination is necessary, for the preservation of helpless women and children, it should be done with promptness, without any reference to what Mrs. Gundy may say or any of her chicken-hearted sisters. Some of the recent massacres in Florida, makes the blood run cold.

A young man, by the name of Tyrell whose mother resides in Troy was lost overboard on Monday morning at Crum Elbow, in the North River, from the schooner Belvadier, of Troy.

GOLD.—The Great Western brigs £100,000 in gold to the address of Mr. Jaudon, agent of the U. S. Bank, who is himself a passenger.

The treaty of commerce between Portugal and the United states, is at length officially concluded but has yet to be laid before the Cortes.

RIGHT.—The Atlantic steamers, have resolved to remit the customary tax on wine, assessed on the passengers generally; leaving each man who may want it, to pay for it. This is a good regulation.

SMALL POX.—From a late report of the subject, it appears that of 50,600 or 60,000 persons annually afflicted by this disease in England and Wales, from 12,000 to 16,000 die. It is fully established by evidence and medical authority that nearly the whole of this dreadful disease and mortality might be prevented if inoculation by small pox were prohibited, and vaccination made general.

The following table of the electoral vote, of 1836, and of the times of holding the elections in the various states in the union, will be of interest to politicians, if no one else. Those states marked with an * choose members of congress on the same day that state officers are chosen!

DISTRESSING CALAMITY.—We learn from the Rutland (Vt.) Herald, that the house of Mr. Dyer Babbitt, of Castleton, was burnt on the night of the 17th inst.—The wife of Mr. Babbitt and 7 children, were in the house at the time, but the fire had made such a progress before they were awakened, that only Mrs. Babbitt and 3 children were able to make their escape from the house, and the remaining four children perished in the flames—two girls 6 and 12 years of age, and two boys, 9 and 14 years of age. How the fire originated we are not informed. Mr. Babbitt had left home the day before the accident for Illinois.

TRIAL OF MRS. FLOOR.—This trial, after occupying the Court three or four days, terminated on Saturday in the acquittal of the prisoner. The testimony was very strong against her on every point but one—the proof of her identity with the person who gave the cake to the deceased—and on that point the want of proof was so decided that a verdict of not guilty became almost indispensable. That she made the cake, and that it contained poison, seem to be unquestionable.—[N. Y. Com. Adv.]

POETRY.

The little newspaper called the Monument, which was sold at the Bunker Hill Fair, contained the following beautiful lines by Mrs. Sigourney :

THE OBELISK.

Rise, lofty column!—in thy simple grace,
And to the stranger bark, that patient braves
Yon boisterous ocean, point the pilgrim's land.
—Be the first herald to the mariner,
Who homeward bound, upon the brow shall trace
His pictured hearth, and th' expecting group,
Who with flushed cheek, or outstretch'd arms, and shout
Of heart-felt welcome, blot the weary past.
—Touch the electric spark which thrills the breast
Of the exulting patriot, who from pride,
Splendor, and real pomp in foreign climes,
Returns with heightened love to Freedom's shore.
—Warn to thy base, when spring's first violets peep,
Those beauteous groups, who gambol free from care,
Childhood's bliss. Perchance they there may meet
Some aged way-worn man, who, on his staff
Resting doth view thee, with a soul entranced,
Mid long remembered deeds. Hasten to his side,
Ye bright eyed, fair-haired ones, and ask to read
The history which years have graved so deep
Upon his furrowed brow. Then will he lift
The palsied hand and point each fearful charge
Of the dread battle,—where the cannon's flash
Was strongest, and the life-blood from men's breasts
Gushed reddest, till the kingly crest was bowed,
And liberty, with new and wondering joy,
Assumed the victor's robe. But should you mark
The wan lip tremble, as he faintly sighs—
"There Warren fell!"—or trace the flowing tear,
For lost compatriots, on that withered cheek—
Bow down, ye tiny listeners, and revere
The holy zeal of men of other days,
And their heaven-girded night. So shall ye learn
A better lesson than the pyramids
Teach awe-struck Egypt, shadowing forth the might
Of tyranny—yet faithful to its hope,
And yielding to oblivion's mystery
Even their founder's name.

But be thou true,
Recording Column, to thy sacred trust,
And the blest memory of that glorious race,
Who sought no guerdon save their country's weal,
Transmit to unborn ages.

—Humble hands
Would crown thy forehead, such as never reap'd
War's laurels, nor the weight of empire pois'd,—
But such as in their happy patience turn
The busy wheel beside the winter fire,
Guide the swift shuttle, or the needle ply,
Or rock the slumbering babe. Yet ne'er the less
Tower thou in majesty—nor fainter stamp
Thy outline on the clouds.

Brief man may pass
On with his generations to the tomb;
But wait thou till the dull decay of Time—
Yea, stand and gaze on Nature's dying throes,
See the skies shrivel, and the faint stars fall,
And the pale sun, like wounded Cæsar sold
His mantle darkly around him—hear the shriek
Of old creation, when dissolving fires
Envelope her—and so decline at last,
But with the solid globe.

THE SAILOR'S FUNERAL.

The ship's bell tolled, and slowly to the deck
Came forth the summoned crew—bold hardy men
Far from their native skies, stood silent there
With melancholly brows. From the low clouds
That near the horizon hovered, came a sound
Of distant muttered thunder. Broken waves
Heaved up their sharp white helmet o'er the expanse
Of Ocean, which in brooding stillness lay
Like some vindictive king, who meditates
On hoarded wrongs, and wakes the wrathful war.
The ship's bell toll'd! and lo, a youthful form
Which oft had dared the high and slippery shrouds
At midnight's watch, was a burden laid

Down at his comrades' feet; mournful they gazed
Upon his noble brow, and some there were
Who in that bitter hour remembered well
The parting blessings of his hoary sire,
And the fond tears that on his mother's cheek
Went coursing down, when her son's happy voice
Bade them farewell. But one who nearest stood
To that pale shrouded corpse, remembered more,
Of a white cottage with its shaven lawn,
And blossomed hedge, and of a fair hair'd girl
Who at her porch of creeping woodbine watches
His last far-step, and then rushed back to weep;
And close that faithful comrade in his breast
Hid a bright chestnut lock, which the dead youth
Had severed with a cold and trembling hand
In life's extremity, and bade him bear
With broken words of love's last eloquence
To his sweet Mary. Now that chosen friend
Bowed low his sunburnt face, and like a child
Sobbed in his sorrow. But there came a tone
Clear as the breaking moon o'er stormy seas,
—"I am the resurrection!"

Every heart
Suppressed its grief—and every eye was raised.
There stood the Chaplain—his uncovered brow
Pure from all earthly passion—while his voice
Rich as the balm from plant of Paradise,
Poured the Eternal's message o'er the souls
Of dying men.

It was a holy hour!
There lay the wreck of youthful beauty—here
Stood mourning manhood, while supporting Faith
Cast her strong anchor where no moaning surge
Might threaten, and no mortal wave invade.
—There was a plunge! the parting sea complained!
Death from her briny bosom took his own.
The troubled fountains of the deep lift up
Their subterranean portals, and he went Down to the floor of Ocean, 'mid the beds
Of brave and beautiful ones. Yet to my soul,
Mid all the funeral pomp, the measured dirge,
And monumental grandeur with which earth
Indulgeth her dead sons, was naught so sad,
Sublime or sorrowful, as the wild sea,
Opening her mouth to whelm that Sailor Youth.

Episcopal Watchman.

ON SEEING A LITTLE GIRL BEGGING.

Cold blows the bitter wintry wind
On yonder little shivering form,
Ah! would that thou with me could'st find—
Poor child a shelter from the storm.

Hast thou no home, no tender friend,
Is there no mother left to thee,
Or is she forced her child to send—
To ask the bread of charity.

Poor little wretch! how hard thy fate—
To beg for bread from door to door!
How little think the rich and great
What dreadful ills oppress the poor.

Alas! poor little thing of woe!
I watch the still, with anxious eye
I see thee still bare headed go,
And none beholds thee with a sigh.

But I, to thee my sighs have given,
And for my child, my all that's mine,
My fervent prayer ascend to heaven,
To shield her from a fate like thine.

From the New World.

MELANCHOLLY MUSINGS.

BY THE HON. MRS. NORTON.

Ah! who e'er dreamed, when on life's flowers,
All fresh and fragrant, lightly pressed
The velvet footfall of the Hours,
And joy and hope each vision blest,
That sorrows, such as press me now
Would shroud the darkened heart and brow.

Though friendship, when our sky is light,
In beauty o'er our pathway bends,
As clouds gleam beautiful and bright
When tinged with sunshine—faithless friends
E'en like the summer clouds,—are gone—

When darkness and the storm come on.

And love—that incense so divine
Of the fond breast in guileless youth,
Flames oft at some unworthy shrine,
And they who trust to plighted truth,
Lean on a reed that soon may part,
And send its shivers through the heart.

And fame, for which we spend our breath,
Is but a meteor of the mind
That lures us on to toil and death;
And her successful votaries find
Hate's poisoned flowers amid the chain
Of roses wreathed around the brain.

For envy's eye and slander's tongue,
Must lay the aspiring spirit low,
Although the innocent and young
Be more than orphaned by the blow;
And for a Mother's honored name
Be left a heritage of shame.

Joy's fount has long since been dried up;
My soul, by care and sorrow riven,
Turns as I drain life's bitter cup,
From heartless man to righteous heaven:
And oh! I long on earth's soft breast,
To lay my weary head and rest.

ODE TO THE DEVIL.

All hail to thee! thou nicknamed thing,
Of ever changing hue and dress,
Of shapes and titles numberless,
All hail from me!—perchance alone
Thy friend I stand, but "by your leave,"
I'll be your champion, injured one.
Though thou hast erred, why have they heaped
Such endless weight of sin on thee?
Why have they loaded with a host
Of uncouth names, thy majesty?
And made e'en babes to screech with fear,
If but thy scarecrow name they hear?
The harshest words that man can say
To his most bitter enemy
Bids him to flee, poor wretch, away
To thine and thee!

And if some stigma vile they'd fling
On some poor scapegrace abject thing,
They name thy name, and while they call
Him Devil, think they've called him all
Of worst he can be called, and then,
They called him Devil straight again.
And if in any fray,
There's mischief done, they say
Thou art to pay!

As though thou hadst no debts thyself,
And had a countless store of pelf!
And even at their toil,
They persecute thee still,
And say that thou art in what'er
Goes wrong, or queer;
And if an awkward creature
Meets with some droll mishap,
Quick step, they call on thee,
And at thy door the roguery
Must quiet lie.

And when they do pretend to be Quite generous, what give they thee,
But some poor miscreant, whom they call thy due?
Or some untoward accident, which they,
For the mere courtesy's sake,
Bid thee, the Devil, take.

Each place that's dark and lone
They dedicate to thee,
Each spot that's wild and drear,
Thy favorite haunt must be:
There is, I think, a "Devil's nook,"
A "Devil's den," a "Devil's brook,"
A "Devil's bridge," a "Devil's hole,"
A place were Devil's ninepins roll:
A "Devil's foot," a "Devil's rock,"
A "Devil's peak," a "Devil's well,"
What more, the Devil himself may tell,

For I am weary now,
And having counted o'er
Of thy unnumbered wrongs, some few,
I say no more
At present, save, adieu!

MASONIC.

A DISCOURSE

ON THE BEST WAY OF DEFENDING FREEMASONRY.

BY THADDEUS MASON HARRIS.

"With well doing ye may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men. As free, and not using your liberty for a cloak of maliciousness, but as the servants of God."

[1 Peter, II. 15, 16.]

I shall use these words, my brethren, as the motto to a discourse, wherein I propose, after adverting to the injustice of those imputations which are brought forward against freemasonry, briefly to consider the way in which we can best preserve it from misrepresentations, and best defend it against censures.

Whilst we feel our minds enlarged by its discoveries, our hearts expanded by its charities, and our satisfactions increased by its influence, we cannot grow indifferent to its interests, nor hear the reproaches repeated against it with the coldness of unconcerned auditors, without emotion and without reply. With honest zeal we come forward, not to contest the subject in "a war of words," not to discuss, but to demonstrate; not to defend opinions against those whom no reasons will satisfy and no arguments convince; but to vindicate our principles by referring to their effects upon our temper and our conduct.

Modesty, which retires from observation; diffidence which always entertains an humble opinion of its own merit, and avoids ostentation as it does censure; have hitherto restrained us from such a plea; but our enemies impel us to this issue.

1. Freemasonry, you know is, at the present day, viewed in an unfavorable light; and we are considered by some as covenanting off principles and associated on purposes destructive of civil subordination, and tending to dissoluteness and infidelity; to the disavowal of all that is venerable in virtue or sacred in religion. In vain have we repeatedly unfolded our sentiments to public examination, in the most honest, ingenuous, and explicit manner. Our protestations, are disregarded: and while every paltry pamphlet or paragraph written in opposition to us is eagerly read and implicitly believed: what we publish, particularly the book of CONSTITUTIONS, which contains our laws and ceremonies, is never inquired after, never consulted.

My brethren, our inexorable accusers arraign us at the tribunal of the public, to defend ourselves, not against what they know, but what they suspect; to answer, not for what they have experienced, but what they fear. This is taking us at great disadvantage; and the unfairness, as well as injustice, of such allegation, will excuse our passing it by in silent contempt. We challenge them to point out the instance in which we have appeared the advocates or the abettors of immorality or rebellion! We submit our actions to their prying investigation; hoping, besure, some allowance for the frailties and imperfections incident to humanity; arrogating to ourselves no immaculate purity nor indefectible virtue; but neither needing nor asking apology for any thing that is peculiar to us as Masons.

Assured that whatever follies or imprudencies may have injured our credit as men, and that whatever vices have wounded our character as christians, it never justified the former nor allowed the latter, let us exculpate our institution; and frankly declare that our errors and crimes are from another source, the weakness and depravity of human nature, the incitements to evil and the corruptions of the world, to which all alike are exposed.

A distinction must be made between what is attributive to freemasonry, and what is not; between what is within its influence, and what is beyond its sphere.—For though we may safely declare that it is impracticable to ascend into these regions without improvement of the heart and enlargement of the understanding, and without carrying along with us into the world we are obliged to act in, something to purify our conduct and meliorate our condition: yet we do not pretend that freemasonry was instituted for the express purpose of teaching morals. And though all its rites, ceremonies and charges, imply the necessity and express the importance of piety and virtue, and with impressive solemnity inculcate their observance; yet it never professed to be a substitute for natural or revealed religion, nor to prescribe the faith, regulate the conscience, or control the judgment of any. It has enough liberty to allow each man "free," but so much restraint as to prevent him from using his liberty for "a cloak of licentiousness."

We are the more particular in making this discrimination, because some late writers have suggested that Masonry professes to supersede all religions, and to introduce a moral code of its own in their stead.

2. Many are so uncharitable as to lay the blame of every thing erroneous in the sentiments or reprehensible in the conduct of a mason, to the regulations or principles of the institution to which he belongs; falsely arguing, or obliquely insinuating that because he was reproachable, that must have base and immoral tendencies.

Now, this mode of reasoning is not perfectly just. It is not fair to predicate worthlessness of that profession which may have some unworthy professors.

But if freemasonry has not made us better, is it certain it has made us worse? Are we more loose in our principles, more unjust in our actions, more niggardly in our dispositions, or more parsimonious in our charity, than before we entered the lodge? Are we more so than those who are not of the fraternity? Are the most thorough masons conspicuous as the most notorious villains, the most daring infidels, or the most insidious jacobins? Or the base, the atheistical, and the factious always masons?

We confess with sorrow, that there are some of our order who deserve not its protection and dishonor its name. But would our opposers wish to conclude from that that all masons are similar to them? Is it right to argue thus? Are such inferences admitted in estimating other professions? Doth the perfidy of a single Judas give grounds to conclude that all the other disciples were faithless and traitors? Why, then, is a mode of reasoning which is never justified in any other cases, only supportable when directed against freemasonry?

But if we have been disgraced by some, who have walked unworthy of their profession; so likewise have we honored by others, who would reflect lustre on any society. Admitting that there may be seen among us some whose conduct deserves the odium of all the wise and good; are there not others, whose actions even prejudice cannot censure, and whose virtues even malignity dare not impeach? If masonry be made responsible for the ill conduct of the few; ought it not, in all reason, to have credit for the good conduct of the many? The greatest characters in the world have laid aside their dignities, and put themselves on a level with us. Not that I would have it imagined that freemasonry can derive any authenticity or importance from the celebrity of those who belong to the society: it being rather calculated to confer respectability, than necessitated to borrow it. Yet, when we find in every period of its history some of the first rate characters in every estimable respect, belonging to it and glorifying in it, the conclusion cannot be considered extremely arrogant, that the institution has some real excellence; at least, that it is not so "frivolous" or "dangerous" a combination as some would fain represent it. It is not to be supposed that the great, the wise, and the good, of all ages, would have given it their decided support, had they found it containing any intrinsic principles repugnant to the interests of society, or hostile to their religious principles. Would they not, rather, have been the first to have proclaimed the evil of this tendency and to have avowed their condemnation of its spirit and design?

Suffer me now, in conclusion, my brethren, briefly to point out what I consider the best, I might say only effectual method of vindicating the principles and re-establishing the credit of the order.

To remove the veil which misinformation and prejudice have thrown over the eyes of our enemies, it remains for us to convince them by our lives, of the truth of our declarations; and to let our conduct be a letter of recommendation, "seen and read by all men."

This is a kind of conviction which must at length prevail over the most obstinate and unyielding prepossessions.

A good life is an unanswerable refutation of every charge.

By a life and conversation regulated by wisdom and sanctioned by virtue; by discharging every duty with integrity and fidelity; and by exercising to all around us every friendly and tender office of charity; we shall demonstratively prove that our institution does not train us up in demoralizing principles; and that they are either ignorant or foolish men who have said that it did.

By piety towards God and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ; by a veneration of the gospel, an exemplary obedience to its precepts, and a regular observance of its institutions; we shall get clear of the charge of being "Anti-christian Conspirators."

Lastly: By our zeal for the interests our country; by maintaining, supporting, and defending its civil and religious rights and liberties; by paying all due allegiance, honor, and submission to its magistrates, supreme and subordinate; by leading peaceable lives in all godliness and honesty; and by endeavoring to promote harmony and good will, concordance and subordination among all orders of men; we shall put to silence the opprobrious allegations of those who strive to prejudice the public against freemasonry, by insinuating that it is "the hot-bed of sedition," and fraught with purposes for the subversion of all government and rule, all thrones, principalities and powers.

Thus, my brethren,

"We'll dissipate each dark and threatening cloud
That prejudice and rumour can raise,
By radiant probity of heart and life,
And presereing deeds of love and peace."

Defended and illustrated by an edifying example, freemasonry will yet triumph in its influence, and be respected in its effects.

While we evince in practice those principles we profess in theory, our institution will "have a good report of all men, and the truth itself;" and those who "speak evil of us as evil doers, will be ashamed," seeing they falsely accuse and misrepresent us.

Regulated by the precepts of wisdom, supported by the strength of virtue, and adorned with the beauty of beneficence, our actions will escape censure, if they meet not malice. If we live within the compass, act upon the square, subdue the passions, keep a tongue of good report, maintain truth and practise charity; we shall not only display the principles, but honor the cause we have espoused. Such an exemplification of its tendencies, will do more to wipe away the unfavorable impressions which any have received against the institution, and will more effectually conciliate their esteem of it, than all the reasoning of labored argument, or all the eloquence of verbal panegyric.

Then as we honor our profession, our profession will be an honor to us.

Remember, brethren, that the interests of freemasonry are in your hands. Be careful then, not to blend with it your weaknesses, nor to stain it with your vices. Consider how much the world expects of you; and how unwilling to make you any abatements. Consider with what dignity, fidelity, and respectability you ought to support the character you bear: and render the name of freemasonry illustrious, as designating worth and virtue of superior stamp.

It is highly incumbent on you to "walk in wisdom towards them that are without;" doing nothing that should render your principles suspicious, or disgrace your institution in their eyes, nothing that should give them new occasion of dislike, or increase their former prejudices. For, "be assured that, if in your conduct you forget that you are men; the world, with its usual severity will remember that you are masons."

While ambitions of obtaining the favorable opinion of men, let us not be regardless of the honor that cometh from God. His approbation will make us ample amends for all we may suffer from their evil surmises and unjust reproaches. Let us, therefore, seek to please God rather than men. Remembering that we are his servants; let us be fervant in spirit, serving him with fidelity, constancy, and zeal. Let the sense of his adorable presence never for a moment, be estranged from our minds. May all our conduct be strictly and invariably directed by his will and word.—May we "walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing;" and "when a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him."

To conclude:

If, Brethren, we have any true love for masonry; if we have at heart the honor and interest of this most ancient and venerable institution; we shall be careful, not only to rule and govern our faith, but to square our actions by the holy word of God: and, while with each other we literally walk upon the level, may we keep within due bounds with all mankind. Thus shall we merit and obtain the reputation, not only of "good men and true," but of wise and skilful, free and accepted masons. And when he who is "the first born among many brethren," shall again appear "to be glorified in his saints, and admired in all them that believe," may he pronounce condemnation and designate our reward by the declaration, "these shall walk with me in white, for they are worthy!"

MISCELLANY.

MOVING THE GLOBE.

How long would it have taken Archimedes to move the globe one inch, provided he could have found a fulcrum for his lever.

The first thing requisite, to be obtained is the computed gravity of the earth; therefore, considering its diameter to be 8000 miles, its cubical contents in feet, will be 1,189,478,400,000,000; to reduce which to weight, I take 25 feet to be equal to a ton, which on an average, I conceive would be about correct, as the earth contains matter much more dense than that of which, as its surface, we consider 27 cubic feet equal to a ton, according to which ratio the weight to be raised would be 47,579,136,000,000 tons!

A man's power applied at the end of a lever, must not be considered at more than a hundred weight, as whatever may exceed that would only be sufficient to give that end preponderance enough to put it in motion; as the weight therefore to be raised is 951,582,720,000,000 times as heavy as the power, which will be found by reducing the above tons into cwt. the lever must also, according to the principle of mechanics, be so many times as long from the fulcrum to the power as from the fulcrum to the weight to be raised; and: as the time lost is always equal to the power gained, it follows that, to produce a motion of an inch, in the one end of a lever, the other must pass through 951,582,728,000,000 inches, or, 180,224,000,000 miles. Therefore, supposing the strength of Archimedes above one hundred weight allowed, which would produce a balance only, sufficient to have propelled the lever through the air at the rate of twelve feet per minute, it would have taken him, provided he had lived so long, no less a time than 151,184,062 years, to move the globe through the space of one inch only.

The Methuen Gazette propounds the following mathematical question:—"If a man is too poor to pay for a newspaper, how many dogs can he afford to keep?"

SLAUGHTER OF ELEPHANTS.

Elephant shooting is commonly practised in Ceylon by a single sportsman, with only a steady servant or two to hold his spare guns and stand by him.—Thus equipped, he will boldly encounter a whole herd. Thus provided, Captains R— and K—, both of the Ceylon rifles, went out shooting together, and fell in with a herd of six. The elephants made for the jungle, and were pursued by both officers; but Capt. R— being the youngest and most active of the two, gained upon them and lost sight of his friend, and while toiling up a hill, heard three double barrels fired in rapid succession, and, on reaching the scene of action, found Capt. R— coolly reloading, with five dead elephants around him. In the end of 1836 or beginning of 1837, five gentlemen in Ceylon, who are known to us, killed, in the course of five days shooting in the jungle, no less than 104 elephants! The gentleman who was the best shot and most active of the party (he had killed about thirty the first day) was taken ill and obliged to leave the party on the third day. Two of the remaining sportsmen had not had much experience, and consequently could not be expected to do much. The feat of Kieut. G—, of the 9th is well known here. This gentleman killed 83 to his own gun, and that too on his first trip. Several gentlemen in Ceylon, who are in the habit of practising elephant shooting, think nothing of killing fifty in the course of four or five days. There are those amongst them who are ready to bet (and who will be backed for any sum of money) that they will individually kill fifty elephants in one week. The directions for killing an elephant are simple enough. In fact, pluck and coolness are the chief requisites. For a front shot allow the brute to come within twelve yards, and then hit him somewhere in the line from temple to temple, not below the level of the eye, and not more than two inches above it—he will in most cases fall simultaneously. For a side or slanting shot, the butt of the ear or just before it on the temple are deadly shots.

We have known an elephant, when in the act of running away, killed at twenty yards, by a diagonal shot, taking him behind the ear. As for firing into the body or neck, or upper parts of the head, or lower down about the trunk, it only serves to infuriate the animal, and does not give the most remote chance of killing him. No elephant shooter ever thinks of pulling a trigger beyond fifteen or sixteen yards, we have known the diagonal shot mentioned above, as the only exception, and nine out of ten are killed within ten yards. Thousands of elephants have been killed here by single balls fired according to the above directions; Capt. R—, above mentioned, has killed upwards of five hundred, and we could take on us to say, without expending a single charge—not to say "salvo"—of either round or grape. Perhaps the proof of the little risk that is run by encountering these animals, is that only two European sportsmen have lost their lives by elephant shooting in so many years.—Ceylon Herald.

Important to Sufferers from the Tooth-ache.—At a meeting of the London Medical Society, Dr. Blake stated, "that he was able to cure the most desperate cases of tooth-ache (unless the disease was connected with rheumatism) by applying the following remedy to the tooth: Alum reduced to an impalpable powder two drachms; nitrous spirit of æther, seven drachms. Mix and apply them to the tooth.—New Hampshire Patriot.

Anger.—He that keeps anger long in his bosom, giveth place to the devil. And why should we make room for him, who will crowd in too fast for himself? Heat of passion makes our souls to chap, and the devil creeps in at the channies; yea, a furious man in his fits, may seem possessed with a devil; he foams, fumes, tears himself, is deaf and dumb, in effect, to hear reason: sometimes swallows stones, stamps, with fiery eyes and flaming cheeks. Had Narcissus himself seen his own face when he had been angry, he could never have fallen in love with himself.—Fuller.

Assimilation.—A gentleman was asked why he hated Mr. G—? "I do not hate him," said he, "neither do I hate bedbugs, but I don't like to have them around me."

SATURDAY EVENING.

A week is past; let my thoughts run through its business; and let my conscience pass a faithful sentence. Am I a better man, a better husband, a better wife, a better neighbor, or whatever be the duties which it lays upon me? Am I more satisfied with my conduct than I was the week before? If I am not, I have lived in vain. What have I done for the good of the neighborhood; what for the public good? How have I been prospered in business; and how have I shown my thankfulness by administering to the necessities of those around me? Are no sick, afflicted stranger in my vicinity? If not, this is the most favorable spot under heaven. And, if there are, what have I done for their relief? If in none of these things I have been improving; I am living for myself, a selfish niggard, unworthy the name of man of Christian. Am I better prepared for dying than I was last week? And when I look forward, how am I to spend the next week, and what new project for improvement have I in my mind? And what can I do for the good of others?

THE HIGHLAND PIPER.

A highland piper having a pupil to teach disdained to tack his brains with the names of semibreves, minims, crotchets, and quavers. "Here Donald lad, gie's a blast! so, so—vera weel blown munn, but what's sound Donald lad, without sense? Ye may blaw and blaw for aye, without maken a tune o't gin I dinna tell ye how thea queer things on the paper maun help ye.—Ye see that big fallow wi' a round open face?" pointing to a semibreve, between the two lines of a bar—"He moves slowly frae that line to this whiles ye beat ane wi' yere fit, and gie a lang loud blast. Gin ye's put a fit till him, ye made twa o' him, he'll move twice as fast. Gin ye black his face he'll run four times faster than the fallow wi' the white knee, or tie his legs, he'll hope eight times faster than yon chap I shawed ye first. Now when'er ye blaw yere pipes, Donald mind ye this, that the faster ye tie these fallows' legs the quicker they maun dance and the faster they'll be shure to rin!"

BEAUTIES OF THE LAW.

In a late publication of Mr. Charles Butler's, he mentions some astonishing instances of legal absurdity. A gentleman having six estates, wished to settle one on each of his six sons, and the heirs of his body respectively, with what lawyers term cross remainders between them, where in failure of issue in one line, the estate passes to the other branches. Mr. Butler being directed to prepare the deed, conceived at first that one proviso would be sufficient; he then thought six would do; but on examining more minutely how many clauses would be requisite to legally express minutely the whole settlement, he found that it would require 720, being every possible combination of the numbers six—1—2—3—4—5—6—720. The other example is still more striking. Ten gentlemen, partners in a mining company, wished to provide by deed, that if any one of the number advanced money to any of the other, it should be considered a sort of mortgage on the borrower's share and have preference to all subsequent charges. The number of contracts necessary to make provision with legal accuracy were found to amount to 3,028,800, being all possible combinations of ten. On each of these clauses, the benevolence of government has imposed a stamp of duty of 25l.; so that the whole duty would have amounted to £ 98,720,000

PUFFS.

When Mrs. Robinson published her "Sappho and Phaon," she wrote to Mr. Bowden, the newspaper editor in the following terms:—"Mrs. Robinson would thank her friend Bowden for a dozen puffs for Sappho and Phaon." By mistake of the twopenny post, the note was delivered to Mr. Bowden the pastrycook, who sent the following answer:—"Mr. Bowden's respectful compliments to Mrs. Robinson, shall be very happy to serve her, but as Mrs. R. is not a constant customer he cannot send the puffs for the young folks, without first receiving the money."

NAPOLEON.

A suspension of arms was granted by Napoleon after the battle of Austerlitz, and an interview took place between him and the Emperor of Austria. Napoleon had caused a fire to be kindled in his bivouac; and on meeting the emperor, said, "I receive you in the only place I have lived in for two months." "The good living you have derived from it ought to make it agreeable to you," replied the Austrian monarch, with a smile.

The archdeacon Lucien, Napoleon's great uncle, being at the point of death, assembled the family around him, to take leave of them. Joseph, Jerome yet an infant, Louis, Lucien, and his sisters, are in tears: Napoleon, with his eyes fixed on his expiring uncle, as if wishing to be insensible to the grief around him, and the loss he was about to sustain. All at once the dying man seemed to collect his strength, and seizing the hand of Joseph, "You are the oldest of the family," said he, with a feeble voice; "but always recollect that he" (pointing to Napoleon) "is the head."

During the siege of Saint Jean d'Acre, while Napoleon was in the trenches, a shell fell at his feet, and one of the corps of guides threw himself between him and the shell, and shielded the general with his body. Luckily the shell did not explode. At the moment, forgetful of the danger, Napoleon started up, exclaiming, "What a soldier!" This brave man was afterwards Gen. Dumenil, who lost a leg at Wagram, and who was governor of Vincennes to 1814; whose laconic reply to the Russian summons to surrender, was, "Give me my leg, and I will give you the place."

Followed by three or four officers, Napoleon was crossing the halle to return to the Tuileries, without being saluted by the acclamations his presence was wont to excite; an old woman cried out to him, "He must make peace." "My good lady," said the emperor, smiling, "sell your greens, and leave those concerns to me: every one to his trade." A loud and continued hurra was the consequence.

NAT LEE.

When Lee the poet, was confined in Bedlam, a friend went to visit him, and finding that he could converse reasonably, or at least reasonably for a poet, imagined that Lee was cured of his madness. The poet offered to show him bedlam. They went over this melancholy medical prison. Lee moralizing philosophically enough all the time to keep his companion at ease. At length they ascended the top of the building, and as they were both looking down from the perilous height, Lee seized his friend by the arm, "Let us take this leap; we'll jump down together this instant." "Any man could jump down," said his friend coolly, "we should not immortalize ourselves by that leap; but let us go down and try if we can jump up." The madman, struck with the idea of a more astonishing leap than that which he had himself proposed, yielded to this new impulse, and his friend rejoiced to see him run down stairs, full of a new project for securing immortality.

THE INCONSOLABLE WIDOW.

In a certain parish in the upper ward of Lanarkshire, a poor woman had brought herself almost to death's door, out of grief for her husband who seemed dying. Her father coming in to ask for the dying man, found her inconsolable. "Fie, Peggy," said he, "dinna tempt the Supreme—we're a' mortal! let the worst come to the worst, I ken o' anither man for ye." "Ah father, its wringin' my vera heart's blude to hear ye speak that way," sobbed Peggy—"dinna name anither man to me! Gordie Wilson hasna his marrow, there he lies." In less than an hour George breathed his last; the body was stretched out and dressed in its last habiliments, and all was still, save the now fading sighs of the new made widow. In compliance with the custom of "years unnumbered," a glass of mountain dew, with a service of bread and cheese, went round. Peggy was present to her dram; "it would do her gude." It did so—for with eyes uplifted and folded hands, she exclaimed, "Heaven's will be done!" and with calm resignation she whispered to her father, who sat next to her—"Father, the tither man ye was speaking about dinna ken him!"

A MODEST DAMSEL.—"Mother wants to get three yards of cloth for primitive triangular appendages for her baby," said a modest young damsel to one of the clerks in this city,—Chicago Democrat.

A MAN WHO WAS DETERMINED TO BE MARRIED.

In Scotland, some time ago, a man had the bands of marriage betwixt him and a young woman regularly proclaimed in the Albany Church. The wedding night was appointed, and the marriage supper provided. The hour arrived, the company assembled, but they looked in vain for the "bonnie bride." After waiting in anxious suspense for more than an hour, the bridegroom stated that they were not to be baulked of their supper, in consequence of the absence of the bride. The supper was discussed, a few bowls of toddy were drunk, and some jokes were made at the bride's expense, which the bridegroom took in good part. There were a few unmarried females present, one of whom gave the favorite song, "I'm o'er young to marry yet." When it was approaching midnight, it was proposed that the company should break up. To this the bridegroom replied—"There's nae hurry, for I am determined to be married before we part." This announcement created no small surprise—and the unmarried females simpered and laughed. The bridegroom, however, declared that it was no joke, and that he would marry any of them that would accept his offer. To this one of them replied, "the offer has been fairly made and as fairly accepted. I have known you a number of years as a well behaved, industrious young man, and I begin to think that 'I'm not o'er young to marry yet.'" If the company were rather dull before, they now broke into an uproarious mirth, and after drinking the health of the new made bride in a flowing bumper, the marriage was consummated, "a la Gret-na Green;" and the stocking was thrown amid loud cheers and laughter.

The Remains of Napoleon.—The brig Gilpin, which arrived at this port yesterday, sailed from St. Helena on the 21st of August, just as the French La Belle Pouille made her appearance with the Prince De Joinville and his suite on board. Every preparation had been previously made by the English to have the bones of Napoleon disinterred and removed with little trouble.—N. Y. Express.

English Taxation.—We are told by Bulwer, in his work on England, that the taxes in that country amount to just about one third of the earnings of labor. A skilful mechanic, who earns £60 sterling a year, or nearly $300, pays to the government £20, nearly $100.

Extreme Danger.—The steamboat Mohegan passed to the windward of a sloop near Norwalk, (Conn) which was loaded with one hundred or more casks of gunpowder. The Cinders from the smoke pipe literary covered the deck of the sloop, and were only prevented from igniting the powder by the copious application of cold water to which the sloop's captain and crew resorted.

STEEL PENS.—The quantity of metallic pens now used in the world is almost incredible. Extensive manufacturingeries of pens are in constant operation in this country and in Europe. An English paper now before us says that in one single establishment no fewer than forty-five millions of steel pens were manufactured between October 1838, and October 1839.

LORDS AND KINGS.

Henry VIII. could say a good thing, and even a just one, when he was in the humor for it. Holbein having kicked a lord who insulted him, and the apology ordered by the King not having been deemed sufficient by the noble person, Henry told him he must be content, and gave him to understand that he over-rated himself, and undervalued his enemy—"I can make," said he, seven lords of seven ploughmen; but it is beyond my power to make a single Holbein."

Dr. Parr used to swear when occasion called upon him so to do, in the style of the newspapers—by omitting the body of the offensive expletives. Thus, when a poor Curate applied to him for his interest in securing him the degree of Doctor in Divinity, Parr, taken "all a-back," exclaimed "You be d—d!" Thank ye sir," responded the applicant bowing—"For what?" inquired Parr, amazed—"For so kindly expressing your opinion," said the other gravely, "that I am worthy of the dignity I seek, that of being D. D."

A wise Precaution.—It is not perhaps generally known that persons of either sex, who are engaged as domestic servants under the royal family, take an oath not to divulge anything connected with the private habits of their master and mistress.—English Paper.

OYSTERS.—The true lover of an oyster, will have some regard to the feelings of his little favorite, and will never abandon it to the mercy of a bungling operator, but will open it himself, and contrive to detach the fish from the shell so dexterously, that the oyster is hardly conscious he has been ejected from his lodgings, till he feels the teeth of the piscivorous gourmand tickling him to death.

In some of the villages in Kent, when a man is known to have beaten his wife, it is usual to strew chaff before his door; then the joke runs through town, that such a man was thrashing last night, as the chaff was seen in front of his house. Such notoriety is said to be a more wholesome restraint on bad husbands, than any legally enactment.

When Constantine was chosen emperor, he found several Christians in office, and he issued an edict requiring them to renounce their faith, or quit their places. Most of them gave up their office to preserve their conscience; but some cringed and renounced Christianity. When the Emperor had thus made full proof of their disposition and character, he removed all who thus basely complied with his supposed wishes, and retained the others saying, "that those who would desert or deny their Divine Master, would desert him, and were not worthy of his confidence."

ECLIPSES.—There are to be four eclipses of the sun next year, and two of the Moon. None of the former will be visible in this country, and even where largest, they will only be partial. Both the lunar eclipses will be total, and visible throughout the United States. One occurs on the 5th February; the other on the second of August.

SINGULAR CONTRAST.—It has often been observed, that a man will readily face danger and death in one form, and be afraid of it in another; and this remark was strikingly exemplified in Junot, one of Bonaparte's generals, who raised himself by his coolness when Bonaparte was besieging Toulon. He was writing something by order of the latter, when a bomb-shell burst near him; he promptly observed that he wanted sand, and it had come in due time. Yet in Sir Sidney's ship, he was so frightened in mounting the ladder, that it was found necessary to take him on board through one of the port-holes.

A man by the name of McCarty, a resident of Coburg, a nephew, of Wm. McCarty, late a merchant of Rochester, fell overboard from the steamer Gore, while lying at the Carthage dock, on Friday evening, and was drowned.

Polishing.—A person in a public company accusing the Irish nation with being the most unpolished in the world, was answered mildly by an Irish gentleman, "that it ought to be otherwise, for the Irish met with hard rubs enough to polish any nation on earth."

Unlucky Question.—A bishop, upon his visitation, found a curate of the diocese so ignorant that he knew not how to say the mass. The bishop, enraged, asked him, "Who was the ass of a bishop that gave you ordination?" "Your most illustrious lordship," replied the curate, with a humble reverence.

COTTAGE GARDENS.

The comfort and benefits to be derived from a well cultivated garden, by a poor man's family, are almost beyond calculation. What a regular work scarce! What a resource for hours after work, or when trade is dull, and regular work scarce! What a contrast and counteraction is the healthy, manly, employment which a cottage garden affords, to the close, impure, unwholesome air, the beastliness and obscenity, the waste of time, the destructions of morale, the loss of character, money, and, health, which are the inmates of too many common ale houses!

THE LEGENDARY.

From Chambers' Journal.

RICHARD PARKER, THE MUTINEER.

In the year 1797, when the threatening aspect of affairs abroad made the condition of her naval force a matter of vital consequence to Britain, several most alarming mutinies broke out among the various fleets stationed around the shores of the country. In April of the year mentioned, the seamen of the grand fleet lying at Portsmouth, disowned the authority of their officers, seized upon the ships, and declared their determination not to lift an anchor, or obey any orders whatsoever, until certain grievances of which they complained were redressed. After some delay, satisfactory concessions were made to them by the government, and the men returned to their duty. But the spirit of insubordination had spread among other squadrons in the service, and about the middle of May, immediately after the Portsmouth fleet had sailed peacefully for the Bay of Biscay, the seamen of the large fleet lying at the Nore broke also out into open mutiny. The most prominent personage in this insurrection was an individual named Richard Parker, whose history it is our special object in this paper to lay before the reader.

Richard Parker was a native of Exeter, where he was born about the year 1765 or 1766. His father was a reputable tradesman, and kept a baker's shop at St. Sidwell's, in the hounds of the city mentioned. Young Parker received an excellent education, and in the course of time went to sea, which he had chosen as the scene of his future career. He served for a considerable period in the royal navy as midshipman and master's mate, and at one period also, it is said, held the post of lieutenant. He appears to have given up the naval profession on his marriage with Miss Ann Machardy, a young lady resident in Exeter, but of Scottish origin, being a member of a respectable family in the county of Aberdeen. This connection led Parker to remove to Scotland, where he embarked in some mercantile speculations that proved unsuccessful. The issue was, that he ere long, found himself involved in difficulties, and without the means to maintain his wife and two children. In Edinburgh, where those embarrassments fell upon him, he had no friends to apply to, and, in a moment of desperation, he took the king's bounty, and became a common sailor on board a tender at Leith. When he communicated to his wife the step he had taken, she was in the greatest distress, and resolved to set off instantly for Aberdeen in order to procure from her brother there the means of hiring two seamen as substitutes for her husband. Though successful in raising the necessary funds, no time was allowed her to complete her project. On her return from Aberdeen, she was only in time to see the tender sail for the Nore, with her husband on board. Her grief on this occasion was bitterly aggravated by the death of one of her children. Parker's sufferings were shown to be equally acute by his conduct when the vessel sailed. Exclaiming that he saw the body of his child floating on the waves, he leapt overboard, and was with difficulty rescued and restored to life.

It was in the beginning of May, 1797, that Parker reached the Nore, or point of land dividing the mouths of the Thames and the Medway. Probably on account of his former experience and station as a seaman, he was drafted on board the Sandwich, which was the guard-ship, and bore the flag of Admiral Buckner, the port-admiral. The mutinous spirit which afterwards broke out, certainly existed on board of the Nore squadron before Parker's arrival. Communications were kept up in secret between the various crews, and the mischief was gradually drawing to a head. But though he did not originate the feeling of insubordination, the ardent temper, boldness, and superior intelligence of Parker soon became known to his comrades, and he became a prominent man among them. Their plans being at length matured, the seamen rose simultaneously against their officers, and deprived them of their arms, as well as of all command in the ship though behaving respectfully to them in all other respects. Each vessel was put under the government of a committee of twelve men, and to represent the whole body of seamen, every man-of-war appointed two delegates and each gun-boat one, to act for the common good. Of these delegates Richard Parker was chosen president, and in an unhappy hour for himself, he accepted of the office. This representative body drew up a list of grievances, of which they demanded the removal, offering to return immediately afterwards to their duty. It is unnecessary to specify these demands further, than that they related to increase of pay and provisions, a more equal division of prize-money, liberty to go on shore, proper payment of arrears, and other points of naval discipline. A committee of naval inquiry subsequently granted almost all that was demanded, thereby acknowledging the general justice of the complaints made. Parker signed these documents, and they were published over the whole kingdom with his name, as well as presented to Port-Admiral Buckner, through whom they were sent to government.

When these proceedings commenced, the mutineers were suffered to go on shore, and they paraded about Sheerness, where a part of the fleet lay, with music, flags (red in colour—the customary hue of insubordination), and other appendages of a triumphal procession. But, on the 22nd of May, troops were sent to Sheerness to put a stop to this indulgence. Being thus confined to their ships, the mutineers, having thus come to no agreement with Admiral Buckner, began to take more decisive measures for extorting compliance with their demands, as well as for insuring their own safety. The vessels at Sheerness moved down to the Nore, and the combined force of the insurgents, which at its greatest height consisted of twenty-four sail, proceeded to block up the Thames, by refusing a free passage up or down, to the London trade. Foreign vessels, and a few small craft, were suffered to go by, first receiving a passport, signed by Richard Parker as president of the delegates. In a day or two the mutineers had an immense number of vessels under detention. The mode in which they kept these was as follows. The ships of war were ranged in a line at considerable distances from each other, and in the interspaces were placed the merchant-vessels, having the broadsides of the men-of-war pointed to them. The appearance of the whole assemblage is described as having been at once grand and appalling. The red flag floated from the mast-head of every one of the mutineer ships. It may be well imagined that the alarm of the citizens of London was extreme. The government, however, though unable at the period to quell the insurgents by force, remained firm in their demand of "unconditional submission as a necessary preliminary to any intercourse." This, perhaps, was the very best line of conduct that could have been adopted. The seamen, to their great honour, never seemed to think of assuming an offensive attitude, and were thereby left in quiet to meditate on the dangerous position in which they stood in hostility to a whole country. They grew timorous, and more so, as the government had caused all the buoys to be removed from the mouth of the Thames and the adjacent coasts, so that no vessel durst attempt to move away for fear of running aground. The mutineering vessels held together, nevertheless, till the 30th of May, when the Clyde frigate was carried off through a combination of its officers with some of the seamen, and was followed by the St. Fiorenzo. These vessels were fired upon, but escaped up the river.

On the 4th of June, the king's birth-day, the Nore fleet showed that their loyalty to their sovereign was undiminished, by firing a general salute. On the 5th another frigate left the fleet, but its place was supplied by a sloop and four men-of-war, which had left Admiral Duncan's fleet at the Texel to join the mutiny. On the 6th, Lord Northesk met the delegates by desire on board the Sandwich, and received from them proposals for an accommodation, to which the unfortunate Parker still put his name as president. The answer was a direct refusal, and this firmness seems to have fairly humbled the remaining spirit of the mutineers. From that time one vessel after another deserted the band, and put themselves under the protection of the fort at Sheerness. On the 10th, the merchantmen were allowed by common consent to pass up the river, and such a multitude of ships certainly never entered a port by one tide. By the 12th, only seven ships had the red flag flying, and on the 16th the mutiny had terminated, every ship having been restored to the command of its officers. A party of soldiers went on board the Sandwich, and to them the officers surrendered the delegates of the ship, namely, a man named Davies, and Richard Parker.

Richard Parker, to whom the title of Admiral Parker, had been given by the fleet and by the public during the whole of this affair, was the individual on whom all eyes were turned as the ringleader of the mutineers. He was brought singly to trial on the 22d of June, after being confined during the interval in the black-hole of Sheerness garrison. Ten officers under the presidency of Vice-Admiral Sir Thomas Paisley, composed the court-martial, which sat on board the Neptune, of Greenhith. The prisoner conducted his own defence, exhibiting great presence of mind, and preserving a respectful and manly deference throughout for his judges. The prosecution on the part of the crown lasted two days, and on the 26th Parker called witnesses in his favor, and read a long and able defence which he had previously prepared. The line of argument adopted by him was—that the situation he had held had been in a measure forced upon him; that he had consented to assume it chiefly from the hope of restraining the men from excesses; that he had restrained them in various instances; that he might have taken all the ships to sea, or to an enemy's ports, had his motives been disloyal, &c. &c. Parker unquestionably spoke the truth on many of these points. Throughout the whole affair, the injury done to property was trifling, the taking of some flour from a vessel being the chief act of the kind. This was mainly owing to him. But he had indubitably been the head of the mutineers. He was proved to have gone from ship to ship giving orders, and haranguing the men—to have been cheered as he passed along, and treated with the honors of a chief. Nothing could save him. He was sentenced to death. When his doom was pronounced, he stood up, and uttered these words in a firm voice: I shall submit to your sentence with all due respect, being confident of the innocence of my intentions, and that God will receive me into favor; and I sincerely hope that my death will be the means of restoring tranquility to the navy, and that those men who have been implicated in the business may be reinstated in their former situations, and again be serviceable to their country."

On the morning of the 30th of June, the yellow flag, the signal of death, was hoisted on board of the Sandwich, where Richard Parker lay, and where he was to meet his fate. The whole fleet was ranged a little below Sheerness, in sight of the Sandwich, and the crew of every ship was piped to the fore-castle. Parker was awaked from a sound sleep on that morning, and after being shaved, he dressed himself in a suit of deep mourning. He mentioned to his attendants that he had made a will, leaving his wife heir to some property belonging to him. On coming to the deck, he was pale, but perfectly composed, and drank a glass of wine "to the salvation of his soul, and forgiveness of all his enemies!" He said nothing to his mates on the fore-castle but "Good bye to you," and expressed a hope that "his death would be deemed a sufficient atonement, and save the lives of others!" He was strung up to the yard-arm at half-past nine o'clock. A dead silence reigned among the crews around during the ceremony. In closing their account of this affair, the journals of the day state that the body of Parker was put into a shell, and interred, within an hour or two after the execution, in the New Naval Burying Ground at Sheerness. A curious sequel to this account, however, it is now in our power to present to the reader.

Richard Parker's unfortunate wife had not left Scotland, when the rumour came to her ears that the Nore fleet had mutinied, and that the ringleader was one Richard Parker. She could not doubt that this was her husband, and immediately took a place in the mail for London, to save him if possible. On her arrival, she heard that Parker had been tried, but the result was unknown. Being able to think of no way but petitioning the king, she gave a person a guinea to draw up a paper, praying that her husband's life might be spared. She attempted to make her way with this to his majesty's presence, but was obliged finally to hand it to a lord-in-waiting, who gave her the cruel intelligence that all applications for mercy would be attended to except for Parker. The distracted woman took a coach for Rochester, where she got on board a king's ship, and learnt that Parker was to be executed next day: she sat up, in a state of unspeakable wretchedness, the whole of that night.

and at four o'clock in the morning went to the river side, to hire a boat to take her to the Sandwich, that she might at least bid her poor husband farewell. Her feelings had been deeply agonised by hearing every person she met talking on the subject of her distress, and now, the first waterman to whom she spoke, exclaimed, "No! I cannot take one passenger." The brave Admiral Parker is to die to-day, and I will get any sum I choose to ask for a party." Finally, the wretched wife was glad to go on board a Sheerness market-boat, but no boat was allowed to come alongside the Sandwich. In her desperation she called on Parker by name, and prevailed on the boat-people, by the mere spectacle of her suffering, to attempt to go nearer, when they were stopped by a sentinel threatening to fire at them. As the hour drew nigh, she saw her husband appear on deck between two clergymen. She called on him, and he heard her voice, for he exclaimed, "There is my dear wife from Scotland." Immediately afterwards she fell back in a state of insensibility, and did not recover till some time after she was taken ashore. By this time all was over, but the poor woman could not believe it so. She hired another boat, and again reached the Sandwich. Her exclamation from the boat must have startled all who heard it. "Pass the word," she cried, in her delusion, "for Richard Parker!" The truth was now told to her, and she was further informed that his body had just been taken ashore for burial. She immediately caused herself to be rowed ashore again, and proceeded to the churchyard, but found the ceremony over, and the gate locked. She then went to the admiral and sought the key, which was refused her. Excited almost to madness by the information that the surgeon would probably disinter the body that night, she waited around the church yard till dusk, and then clambering over the wall, readily found her husband's grave. The shell was not buried deep, and she was not long in scraping away the loose earth that intervened between her and the object of her search. She got the lid removed, and then she clasped the cold hand of husband in her own!

Her determination to possess the body aroused the widow from the enjoyment of this melancholy pleasure. She left the churchyard, and communicated her situation to two women, who, in their turn, got several men to undertake the task of lifting the body. This was accomplished successfully, and at three o'clock in the morning the shell containing the corpse was placed in a van, and conveyed to Rochester, where, for the sum of six guineas, Mrs. Parker procured another waggon to convey it to London. On the road they met hundreds of persons, all enquiring about, and talking of the fate of "Admiral Parker." At eleven p.m. the van reached London; but here the poor widow had no private house or friends to go to, and was obliged to stop at Hoop and Horse-Shoe on Tower-Hill, which was full of people. Mrs. Parker got the body into her room, and sat down beside it; but the secret could not be long kept in such a place, more particularly as the news of the exhumation had been brought by express that day to London. A great crowd, by and bye, assembled about the house anxious to see the body of Parker, which, however, the widow would not permit. The Lord Mayor heard of this affair, and came to ask the widow what she intended to do with her husband's remains. She replied, "To inter them decently at Exeter or in Scotland." The Lord Mayor said that the body would not be taken from her, but prevailed on her to have it decently buried in London. Arrangements were made with this view, and finally the corpse of the unfortunate Parker was inhumed in Whitechapel Churchyard; although not until it had to be removed to Aldgate Workhouse, on account of the crowds attracted by it, and which caused some fears lest "Admiral Parker's remains should create a civil war." After the closing ceremony was over, Mrs. Parker, who had in person seen her husband consigned to the grave, gave a certificate that all had been done to her satisfaction. But, though strictly questioned as to the parties who have aided her in the disinterment, she firmly refused to disclose their names.

Parker, as has been said, made a will, leaving to his wife a small property on which he had claims near Exeter. This she enjoyed for a number of years, but ultimately her rights, whether erroneously or not, were decided to be invalid, and she was deprived of the pittance which had formed her maintenance. She was thrown into great distress, and was compelled to solicit assistance from the charitable, having become nearly if not entirely blind. The late King William gave her at one time £10, and at another £20. In 1836, the forlorn and miserable condition of poor Parker's widow was made known to the London magistrates, and a temporary refuge was provided for her. But temporary assistance was of little avail to one whose physical infirmities rendered her incapable any longer of helping herself, and again her miserable condition came under the cognisance of the public authorities. An appeal to the charitable has recently been made, by a portion of the daily press, in her favor but with what success we are unable to say. She is now sixty-nine years of age, blind and friendless.—Time and misfortune have not quenched her affection for the partner of her early days. Of him she yet speaks with all the enthusiasm of youthful affection, and still mourns his fate.

THE ESSAYIST.

For the American Masonic Register.

The following dialogue, written by three young ladies of the Leroy Female Seminary, and delivered by them before a recent exhibition of that institution, strongly reminds us in its simplicity and truth, of the pleasing and instructive essays by the late Mrs. Barlauld. We hope the young ladies will not make this their last communication to us.—Ed.

THE ANIMAL, MINERAL AND VEGETABLE KINGDOMS, PERSONIFIED.

PHILOMELA, an inquirer after truth.

ICARUS, Representative of the Animal Kingdom.

IDALIA, Representative of the Vegetable Kingdom.

DEICIMA, Representative of the Mineral Kingdom.

Philomela enters bearing a bouquet of flowers, a shell, and a mineral—

Philomela. Beautiful, beautiful indeed they are, but what can be their use, and whence did they originate. Are they the work of chance, or exists there one formed with faculty sufficient, to form aught so curious and fair. Long, long have I mused upon their strange mysteries. I've digged deep in the recesses of the earth and gathered stores of its hidden wealth. I have wandered oft with eager step o'er lawns and woodlands, and culled the fair flowers that graced my pathway.—O where did Earth derive its mantle of beautiful green, and why does it so often wither away. I love to listen to the song of the aerial warbler. But for what purpose are they created? Is it to lull to rest the wild and changing passions of the heart of man? What can mean those brilliant orbs that glitter in the deep blue vault above? One seems to exceed the others in size and its lustre gilds the hour of night. I love to gaze upon them at the midnight hour and ask them what they are and why they thus move onward in their distant spheres. But in vain have my keenest scrutinies been exercised respecting all these mysterious works of Nature. And is it ever thus to be? Am I destined forever to remain in ignorance of these beauties which thus enchant the mind? O that some kind spirit would this moment appear and reveal to me the long hidden secret!

(Deicima enters.)

DEIC. (Taking the mineral.) Fair stranger, no longer shall this remain a mystery. I will divulge to thee the secrets of Nature. The Great I Am determined in the counsels of Eternity to create a glorious mansion for his worshippers, and I was wheeled into illimitable space and made to revolve, with many sister planets around the vast orb which illuminates our trackless pathway through immensity. This little mineral, is but a fragment of the many beauties of which I am formed. Innumerable gems far surpassing even this in beauty, may be found hid beneath my surface.

PHILO. Thank thee kindly, Deicima. What thou hast already revealed to me is indeed wonderful. But I pray thee stop not here. I am impatient to learn of all Nature's works. Does this fair flower which exhales so sweet an incense flourish also in thy kingdom?

(Icarus and Idalia enters.)

DEIC. From sister Idalia's kingdom does that come. She can unfold to thee the secret.

IDA. Seldom Philomela do we find one who treads upon the velvet carpeting of Earth, and gazes upon the rich and ever varied hues, with which I deck the forest shade, sensible of my beauties, and gladly will I inform thee of my history. Know then, fair one,—that the Almighty, the Creator of us all, seeing the lonely situation of my brother Deicima, sent me hither to enliven his surface, with my presence, and chase away the sadness that was even thus early corroding his happiness. From the first I was beautiful, yea lovely, and the fair exotic, which you so tenderly nourish, is but one of a thousand of my varied beauties. Yet even in this simple specimen, surpassing loveliness is seen, and the work of a superior mind can be plainly traced.

PHILO. Superior indeed must be that mind which has formed aught so beautiful. And was it that same hand that formed this curious piece of mechanism?—This (raising the shell) once possessed life.

ICA. Ah, I can explain the secret of life. When this mansion was prepared, and the Author had finished his work, save giving life and animation, that his work might subserve his grand design, I was created, the breath of life given, and o'er the broad expanse a vital principle instilled. Two angelic forms were placed in a garden, far exceeding in beauty any thing of which we can now conceive. Here our Father had gathered his brightest and noblest works, and given to their dominion every creature of his creation. Here too, Idalia reigned in primeval glory.

IDA. Yea! in glory did I reign and in eternal beauty did I expect to bloom, but alas! how sad the reverse. While we revelled in the joy which Eden afforded, and basked in the sunshine of our Fathers' favor, a creature vile and ungrateful entered our blissful abode. He saw that happiness reigned here and envy rankled in his heart. He felt that all was pure and holy, and sought to destroy the peace of the innocent, and to mar the best of our Creator's works. He presented the tempting offering to the unsuspecting spirit. She received and gave to her companion in bliss. In one moment their glory departed and my fairest beauties became noxious weeds, and the blooming Eden a wild of thorns and thistles.

ICA. But it was thy fruit Idalia that did tempt those pure spirits to transgress the laws of their maker, and to sin against their God. The cruel temptations that thou didst place before their eyes, served but to sow among my happy kingdom the seeds of misery, yea, destruction, and through their rebellion, to call down upon them the vengeance of a just God.

DEIC. In this lies the secret why I too have thus been despoiled of my once perfect form. When first I greeted Icarus I was as I came from the hand of my Maker God,—fair and beautiful; order and symmetry pervaded all my parts. But when one of thy kingdom yielded to temptation, the great Creator, in anger tore my kingdom from centre to circumference, that his creatures should tremble beneath his power, and feel that a mighty hand was raised high over them in judgment. All my hidden treasures were scattered in wild confusion.

ICA. Comfort thyself Deicima. It was wisely ordered that thy realm should be thus rent asunder, for had it been otherwise thy fairest beauties would ever have been hid from view. Thy most precious stones, fairest diamonds, mines of richest gold and purest silver, formed for the gratification of man, would forever have remained hidden in thy deepest recesses; and Idalia, for the same cause, thy sweetest flowers would never have been scattered o'er the earth in such endless profusion.

IDA. Ah! Icarus had this cause never existed, my beauties would have been enjoyed by creatures pure and sinless, and eternal loveliness reigned in this vast expanse. No change would have yearly despoiled me of my robe of green, and left me to an enemy, who, while I shrink at his approach, encircles me in his icy arms.

PHILO. How long is this vengeance to rest upon thee Deicima and noble Icarus? Is the blooming Idalia never to reign in eternal beauty or is she with all that is bright and beautiful, forever to pass away?

DEIC. How long I am thus to remain is registered alone in the folded leaves on high. But this I know; the same Almighty architect, that first fashioned me for his glory, shall stretch forth his hand and mould me once again, more glorious still. Yes! Icarus you too, have ever found me a mighty foe, and the chains I have forged for six thousand years have made you my prisoner.

ICA. Thou wilt triumph but awhile. When the Archangel's trump shall sound the fetters shall be loosed and the slumbering tenant of the tomb shall rise a pure celestial form no more dependant upon thee, and shall join the angelic band, and wing its flight to the throne of God, there to dwell forever a ransomed soul.

DEIC. But then thou mayest return again to gaze upon my new formed glory and delight thyself in the brilliancy of my sparkling gems, and substantial fabric of everlasting strength.

IDA. Know too, fair Philomela that naught which come from the forming hand of our Father, shall ever be annihilated. The glorious adorning with which I deck all worlds, although marred and for a time disrobed of beauty, shall yet again spread wide her ever living green, and send her sweetest odors to regale the bright winged messengers, who stop, on the long flight of ages, to admire my gorgeous robes and talk of the endless diversity of the Creator's work.

PHIL. Tell me Icarus, something of the glory thou shalt inherit, thy form, employment and eternal bliss.

ICA. There the universe "without bound, without dimension, where length, and breadth, and height and time and place are lost," shall be spread wide open for our range. There glorified spirits with wings that never tire, speed their flight through infinity, to visit other bright worlds, the mansions of blessedness, clothed in "eternal youth and undying vigor."

PHIL. Shall I too be a bright winged seraph, and roam with you in those golden realms?

(All join hands and leave the stage.)

ICA. Yea! angelic spirits hand in hand shall roam through immensity; and together explore the magnificent scenes of the creation of our God.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, OCT. 10, 1840.

TERMS OF THIS PAPER.—To subscribers residing out of the city, $2 if in advance—$2.50 if within six months, and $3, if not paid until the expiration of the year. BACK NUMBERS at all times furnished.

ITEMS OF FOREIGN ARRIVALS.—The Steam ship Caladonia, arrived at Boston, on Saturday last, having made the passage, from dock to dock, in 13 days and 14 hours; although she lost 20 hours by the fog. The news by this arrival, is not of much importance. The Princess Augusta, lies in a very low state. A duel has been fought between Earl of Cardigan and Lieut. Truett, in which the Lieut. was handsomely "winged," but not dangerously. There was a revolt at the royal Naval School at Greenwich, among the boys of that institution; about 70 of them deserted. Their excuse for rebellion, is, in the insufficiency of the provisions, and the severity of punishment for slight offences. An anti-slavery sugar company has been formed in London. It is stated as a curious fact, that Mehemet Ali, Napoleon Bonaparte, and the Duke of Wellington were all born in one year. Thirty-five thousand tons of rails, have been ordered from America, and an advance of 10 shillings on the ton has been demanded. [What a pity it is that this country is destitute of iron!!] The blockade of Alexandria was commenced on the 1st inst. by Admiral Stafford. Several of the Pacha's vessels had been sequestered by the British naval authorities. The Viceroy's fleet (Egyptian and Turkish) was drawn up in order of battle, in the roads of Alexandria. The prospects of a general war, had in some measure subsided. Notwithstanding the tardy and partial acquiescence of Mehemet Ali in the demands of the four Powers, the Paris papers of the last dates talk quite as warlike as any time since the commencement of the panic on the Eastern question; though if Mehemet has yielded, we scarcely know what they will make a war out of. There had however, been a considerable rise in the funds on Wednesday, say a franc and a half, and every thing except the tone of the newspapers indicates peace. A treaty of commerce is about to be established between France and England, which is only waiting for the signature of M. Thiers the French minister, who is waiting the satisfactory termination of the Eastern question. The Ottoman Porte had despatched a courier to Rome requesting the assistance of the Pope in having the patriarch of Lebanon to exhort the population of Syria, to observe obedience to the Sultan. If the Pope acceded to the request, there would be 60,000 men in arms in Syria. Orders had been received at Bayonne to put that place in a complete state of defence. The emperor of Russia is making active preparation for war, 100,000 troops are concentrated on the Turkish frontier. The Chamber of Peers of France have commenced the trial of Louis Napoleon, who has a large number of counsel to assist him.

THINGS AS THEY SHOULD BE.—It will be a source of felicitation, to the brethren of the I. O. O. F. throughout this State, to be informed, that the differences which have existed for some time past in relation to the location of the Grand Lodge of this Order, has finally resulted in the almost entire return of the disaffected brethren to their duty. This is as it should be. The distinguishing principles of the order, are "Friendship, Love and Truth," and whatever differences of opinion may have heretofore existed as to the merits of the controversy which has been attended with so much evil; one thing is certain, that it is the bounden duty of the minority to submit to the will of the majority, when emphatically expressed through its legally constituted organs. The meeting at Firemen's Lodge, on Tuesday evening last, was unusually large, consisting of a great portion of three of the former Lodges, who have constituted themselves into one body, under the name of the Phoenix Lodge, No. 41. From the good feeling and spirit exhibited on Tuesday, we are satisfied, that the Order will receive a new impetus among us, and illustrate the great principle of the Order, that where "HARMONY" is, there will be "Friendship, Love and Truth," blended with the other Graces.

DISTRESSING OCCURRENCE.—It again becomes our lot, to record the destruction of life in its worst and most agonizing form. The steam boat Swiftsure, running between this city and New York, on her passage down, on Monday last, when near Castleton, burst her boiler, and shockingly scalded eight persons connected with the boat. Six of the sufferers have since died, and but faint hopes are entertained of one or two of those who are at present living. The names of the dead, are, Mr. Havens, (engineer.) Robert Graves, John Carney, George White, Henry Yates, and Daniel Hagerman.

LARGE CARGO.—The largest cargo ever shipped a Richmond was taken on Thursday last in the ship Alhembra, of Boston, for London. It consisted of 1927 hhds. and 21 half hhds. of tobacco. Value, $132,000.

There has been a destructive fire at Quebec, by which property to the amount of $120,000 has been destroyed.

THE AMISTAD.—This vessel, which has made so much noise in the world, is we learn from the Journal of Commerce, to be sold at New London on the 15th inst. The cargo consists of dry goods, hardware, crockery, &c. The negroes, belonging to this vessel, are still in the charge of the U. S. Marshal. Their case is in the hands of the Supreme Court of the U. S. who meet soon, when if this court sustains the decision of the court below, they will be immediately released.

SMOKING.—The N. Y. Sun relates a fact, which is worthy of a little attention, among our inveterate smokers, and we acknowledge that we come in for a full share. On Thursday of the past week, a gentleman of New York, of wealth and influence, died from a malady which he brought upon himself by excessive smoking; which first produced a prostration of the nervous system, then complete lunacy, and then death.

THE NATIONAL THEATRE.—Mr. A. M. Wilson, who is well known to our citizens as a very clever fellow, as well as a clever actor, has by dint of the most indefatigable exertion and perseverance, at length realised his wishes, in the rebuilding of this stupendous concern. No man could have accomplished this undertaking, under the discouraging circumstances which has followed the footsteps of Wilson, from the laying the first to the last stone, but himself, and his friends, in this and other regions, will offer to him their sincere congratulations, on the successful termination of an effort, believed to have been almost hopeless. The New York Sun says:—

The interior of the house forms a Turkish saloon, and is furnished in the most brilliant manner, carrying out the intent through the drop curtain into the garden of the saloon, from whence is seen entering the females dancing—the three front figures to represent in strong likeness Taglioni, Ellsler, and Celeste. This beautiful establishment has been erected and completed by A. M. Wilson, Esq. who is the sole proprietor and manager of the establishment, and who has by his perseverance, good taste and admirable arrangements, given to the public the best proof for his future success.

☞ We would again repeat to those of our subscribers, who may have lost any No. of the 1st Vol. that if they will apprise us of it without cost, we will forward them, except Nos. 31, 37, 34 and 51. These Nos. have run short.

Wisconsin Tobacco.—The experiment of raising tobacco in Wisconsin Territory has been tried this season, and succeeded beyond expectation.

Eleven hundred dollars has been realised from the dancing of Fanny Ellsler, for one night, at Boston, in aid of the Bunker hill Monument. So Fanny has done one good thing.

THE ROPEWALK at the U. States Navy Yard in Charlestown is said to be the most perfect establishment of the kind in the world. It is 1000 feet long, with granite walls, slate roof, and iron window-shutters. This work is done with an enormous steam engine, by which the hatcheling, dressing, spinning, and almost every other operation in making a rope or cable is done. About one hundred of the spinning, hatcheling and dressing machines are in one room, in operation by steam. By the spinning of hemp in a machine a more even thread, and consequently more perfect rigging and cables are formed. At this ropewalk, we understand, the principal rigging for the navy is or can be made.

Intelligence.

MYSTERIOUS AFFAIR.—Extract of a letter dated, Nassau (N. P.) 27th, August, 1840, received in New Orleans via Havana.

"A singular circumstance occurred a few days ago. A large French ship from Hamburg, bound to Havana, was picked up by one of our little wreckers about a fortnight ago, quite deserted. She was afloat with no sail set but the gib—not the least injured—having a very valuable cargo of wines, silks, fruits, &c. and all in good order, and her papers and every thing on board in their proper places. When sounded, three feet water was found in her hold, which was immediately pumped out; and it was discovered that she had no leak. A few poultry and a cat only were found alive. There were a number of cages, with Canary birds, apparently starved to death. I have seen one of the persons who first went on board, and he says that the cabin and state rooms were elegantly furnished and had all the appearance of passengers having just stepped out of them—one in particular had a ladies toilet, combs, brushes, &c., on a settee lay a bonnet, shawl, work-box, needles, thimbles, &c., as if that minute laid down. There are many cases on board addressed to different merchants in Havana, and the vessel by which I am now writing is despatched to gain some information on the subject. She is a large new ship, built this year, and is named the Rosalie."

AMERICAN CLAIMS ON CHILI.—The Globe of Saturday states that advices have been received from Valparaiso, that our charge d'Affairs has succeeded in obtaining from the Chili Government indemnity for the seizures of American property by Lord Cochrane, when in the service of that power; and that there is a reasonable prospect of an early liquidation of the other American claims.

EXCITING INCIDENT.—We saw a letter, within a few days, written by a young lady who not many weeks since, was journeying from this place to the West. It narrates an exciting occurrence which took place on board the steam boat in which she was a passenger—and of which she was an eye witness. In passing down the Mississippi river, our narrator was summoned from the cabin by alarming shrieks and great commotion on deck. On going up, she found that a young lady had fallen overboard, and the boat in its progress was fast leaving her behind. A gentleman on board immediately divested himself of a part of his clothing, and sprang into the river. He reached the drowning person, and upheld her in the water until a small boat came to the rescue of both. The young lady, thus snatched from sudden death, was the daughter of an elderly gentleman who was on board the boat—foreigners, neither of them could speak English. On reaching the deck, and recovering from the fright, embraced her deliverer and bestowed kiss after kiss upon him, as the only way she could express her gratitude and thankfulness; while the farther rushing from the cabin eagerly proffered him a roll of bank bills. These being refused he ran to his cabin and returned with a bag of gold which he likewise pressed upon his acceptance nor could either father or daughter be made to understand, or feel satisfied why their proffered reward would not be accepted.—Salem Ob.

The Murderer of the Boy at Brooklyn is, it is thought, apprehended. A youth went yesterday on board the New Haven steamboat, and was soon remarked, both from the incoherence of his talk and conduct, and from his answering to the description of the person last seen with the murdered boy. Under these circumstances, the captain, on meeting the down boat, transferred the young man to it, and on its arrival here, the Mayor of Brooklyn was notified of the fact that such a person was on board. He immediately came over, and took him in a carriage to the Brooklyn jail. The lad's name is said to be David Wade, that he is from Elizabethtown, N. J., and apprentice to a shoemaker at Westfield. It will be remembered that one of the surgeons said the wound seemed to have been made with a shoemaker's knife, or some similar sharp instrument.

The wretched prisoner appears to be insane, and during the whole of last night, in prison raved about blond and the Almighty canons against its being shed by man—American.

Spontaneous Combustion.—A Mr. Marsh, chemist, connected with the Royal Arsenal, discovered that it is an invariable rule with iron which has remained for a considerable time under water, when reduced to small grains, or to an impalpable powder, to become red-hot, and ignite an object with which it may come in contact. This he experienced by scraping some corroded metal from a gun which ignited the paper containing it, and burnt a hole in his pocket. The knowledge of this fact may be useful in accounting for spontaneous fires, the origin of which has never been traced.

Increase.—We are informed, says the Christian Adv. by Rev. J. Stinson, just returned from England, that the increase in the Methodist societies under the care of the British conference for the last year is 24,000.

The Proclamation of the Union of the two Canadas is to be issued on the 1st of January, 1841, and the elections under the new constitution will take place on the following month.

Death Warrant.—Gov. Porter has signed the death warrant of Robert McConachy, the wretch who, for the sake of a few dollars, murdered the whole of the Browne family, six in number. He is to be executed on the 6th of November. No sympathy can be felt for such a fiend.

The Census of the city and suburbs of New Orleans being nearly completed, shows a total population of more than 100,000. In 1830 it contained less than 50,000.

THE DEFORMED.

Oh urge me not my mother, to join yon group at play—
They'll gaze awhile in pity, then shrink from me away;
I will not mar their joyousness, but listen to them here,
For though I'm sad their merry laugh is music to mine ear.

I'll listen to the humming-bee that roams from flower to flower

So gayly and contentedly, passing its "little hour,"
And the sweet birds that carol their songs of wildest glee—

For all—yes all, dear mother are happy here but me.

I love thee dearest mother, yet still I long to die,
Though flowers bloom around me and bright the azure sky—

The gushing streamlet runs beside our little quiet cot, Crown'd with the modest violet and sweet forget-me-not—

The moon with soften'd loveliness reminds me oft of thee;

And all, all, yes all, dear mother are beautiful but me.

Full well I know sweet mother, I have thy tender love;
And I have sought and found the same of him who dwells above;

Others have nought but pity to e'er bestow upon
Her for whom nature had no gifts—the poor deformed one;

But I will strive to bear in patience for a while,
Though oft I hear the pitying sigh and see the scorn-
ful smile,

For soon I'll join the throng above in realms all free from care—

Then mother I'll be beautiful and all will love me there.

Albany, July, 1840.

FLORA.

THE FAREWELL.

By J. G. Whittier.

Farewell,—I feel that thou and I,
Must part even now, perhaps forever;
I heard last night thy long good bye
And chained, but with a proud endeavour
The smothered tide of tearful feeling—
I could not bear that other eyes
Should smile upon the heart's unsealing
Of all its hidden sympathies.

Oh—was it not a mocking thing
At that last hour of parting sadness
Over the fount of tears to fling
The light and careless smile of gladness!

Yes—sadder eyes were fixed on thee—
And sadder tones bespoke regret:
And trembling hands were proffered free,
And young, fair cheeks with tears were wet;
And I—the saddest one of all—
Returned thy greeting with a smile—
That smile was for the crowded hall—
My heart was with thee all the while;
And burning thoughts were thronging there—
The hopes and fears affection bath
To prompt its still, unuttered prayer,
For blessings on the loved one's path.

They tell me thou wilt choose the one
Of brighter eyes and glossier curls—
Among the "children of the sun"—
The silver-toned Italian girls:
That she will love thee with the glow
And joy of her voluptuous clime;
And whisper music, like the flow
Of soft winds in the summer time:—
That when the moonlight sleepeth on Gay Venice and her many isles—
And when the gondolier alone
May mark the dalliance hour of smiles,
Thy arm will bear her yielding form—
Thy hand amid her tresses play,
And fervent kisses, soft and warm,
Disturb at times her melting lay.

Alas!—I would believe thee true—
And yet I fear a change will come,
And waste away, like morning dew,
Affection's rich and untold sum.

For thou wilt roam in other lands,
And other eyes will smile on thee,
And thou wilt ask from other hands,
The gifts which I have proffered thee,
For I have seen thee in my dream
Of feverish and unquiet sleeping,
Devoid of all which man should seem
When Love around his path is weeping,
I've seen thee at the altar side,
And listened to the rites which gave
Unto thy arms another bride,
And left forsaken love—a grave!

God grant my dreams may never prove
Their stern reality of wrong;
Nor make the meaning of thy love
A ring—a promise—and a song.
I do believe thou lovest me now—
But will thy boyish dream remain,
When foreign suns have lent thy brow
A darker and a manlier stain?
And wilt thou love my memory, while
Above thee bends the Italian sky?
Or where the Grecian maidens smile—
Or where the Georgian dance goes by?

Farewell!—forgive the doubts which fling
A shadow on our parting hour,—
Nor deem my heart a wayward thing—
A jealous and ungentle dower:
For woman's love is blent with fears—
Her confidence—a trembling one—
Her smile—the harbinger of tears—
Her hope—the change of April's sun!—
Farewell!—and oh! where'er thou art,
Indulge at times a thought of me,
And I will sooth my trembling heart
In one long dream of love and thee.

GENIUS SLUMBERING.

BY J. G. PERCIVAL.

He sleeps, forgetful of his once bright fame;
He has no feeling of the glory gone;
He has no eye to catch the mounting flame,
That once in transport drew his spirit on;
He lies in dull oblivious dreams, nor cares
Who the wreathed laurel bears.

And yet not all forgotten sleeps he there;
There are who still remember how he bore
Upwards his daring pinions, 'till the air
Seemed living with the crown of light he wore;
There are who, now his early sun has set,
Nor can, nor will forget.

He sleeps,—and yet around the sightless eye,
And the pressed lip, a darkened glory plays!
Though the high powers in dull oblivion lie,
There hovers still the light of other days;
Deep in that soul a spirit, not of earth,
Still struggles for its birth.

He will not sleep forever, but will rise
Fresh to more daring labors—now, even now,
As the close shrouding mist of morning flies,
The gathered slumber leaves its lifted brow,
From his half opened eye, in fuller beams,
His wakened spirit streams.

Yes he will break his sleep—the spell is gone—
The deadly charm departed—see him fling
Proudly his fetters by, and hurry on,
Keen as the famished eagle darts her wings;
The goal is still before him, and the prize
Still woos his eager eyes.

He rushes forth to conquer—shall they take,
They, who with feeble pace still kept their way
When he forgets the contest—shall they take,
Now he renews the race, the victor's bay?
Still let them strive—when he collects his might,
He will assert his right

The spirit cannot always sleep in dust,
Whose essence is ethereal—they may try
To darken and degrade it—it may rust
Dimly awhile, but cannot wholly die;
And when it wakens it will send its fire
Intenser forth and higher.

SONG.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

If thou hast crushed a flower,
The root may not be blighted,
If thou hast quenched a lamp,
Once more it may be lighted;
But on thy harp or on thy lute,
The string which thou hast broken,
Shall never in sweet sound again
Give to thy touch a token!

If thou hast loosed a bird,
Whose voice of song could cheer thee,
Still, still he may be won.
From the skies to warble near thee;
But if upon the troubled sea
Thou hast thrown a gem unheeded,
Hope not that wind or wave shall bring
The treasure back when needed.

If thou hast bruised a vine,
The summer's breath healing,
And its cluster yet may grow,
Through the leaves their bloom revealing;
But if thou hast a cup o'erthrown
With a bright draught filled—oh! never Shall earth give back that lavished wealth
To cool thy parched lip's fever!

The heart is like that cup,
If thou waste the love it bore thee,
And like that jewel gone,
Which the deep will not restore thee;
And like that string of harp or lute
Whence the sweet sound is scattered,
Gently, oh! gently touch the chords
To soon for ever shattered!

MASONIC.

WASHINGTON'S MASONIC CHARACTER.

We copy the following from an old Boston Mirror. Some of our Masonic friends may have seen it before; but we are anxious to place on our files for preservation, and future reference, the sentiments of one whose hallowed name and precepts were called in to aid the desperate efforts of our enemies during the strife of Anti-masonry. Washington's attachment to the Masonic Institution, and the estimation in which he held it, will appear from the subjoined correspondence, which breathes throughout, a spirit of brotherly love and kindness, and we earnestly recommend it to the careful and serious consideration of the reader, whether Mason or not; we wish friend and foe to read these letters of Washington. To each they will afford satisfaction; they cannot fail to strengthen the opinion of the one, nor to allay the doubts and prejudices of the other, if any thing can accomplish an end so desirable.

ADDRESS

Of the Master, Wardens, Brethren of King David's Lodge, to GEORGE WASHINGTON, President of the United States of America.

SIR.—We, the Master, Wardens, and Brethren of King David's Lodge, in Newport Rhode Island, joyfully embrace this opportunity, to greet you as a Brother, and to hail you welcome to Rhode Island.

We exult in the thought, that as Masonry has always been patronised by the wise, the good, and the great, so hath it stood, and ever will stand, as its fixtures are on the immutable pillars of Faith, Hope, and Charity.

With unspeakable pleasure, we congratulate you as filling the Presidential Chair, with the applause of a numerous and enlightened people; whilst, at the same time, we felicitate ourselves in the honor done to the brotherhood, by your many exemplary virtues, and emanations of goodness proceeding from a heart worthy of possessing the ancient mysteries of our craft, being persuaded that the wisdom and grace with which heaven has endowed you, will ever square all your thoughts words and actions, by the eternal laws of honor, equity and truth; so as to promote the advancement of all good works, your own happiness, and that of mankind. Permit us then, illustrious brother, cordially to salute you with three times three, and to add our fervent supplications, that the Supreme Architect of the Universe may always encompass you with his holy protection.

MOSES SEIXAS, Master, } Committee.
HENRY SHERBURNE, Warden, }

By order, WM. LITTLEFIELD, Sec'y.
Newport, August 17, 1790.

THE ANSWER.

To the Master, Wardens, and brethren of King David's Lodge, in Newport, Rhode Island.

Gentlemen,—I receive the Welcome which you give me to Rhode Island, and, with pleasure; and I acknowledge my obligations for the flattering expressions of regard contained in your address, with grateful sincerity. Being persuaded that a just application of the principles on which the masonic fraternity is founded, must be promotive of private virtue and public prosperity, I shall always be happy to advance the interest of the society, and to be considered by them as a deserving brother. My best wishes, Gentlemen, are offered for your individual happiness.

G. WASHINGTON.

ADDRESS

Of the Grand Lodge of Ancient York Masons, of Charleston, S. C. to GEN. WASHINGTON, President of the United States.

SIR.—Induced by respect for your private and public character, as well as the relation in which you stand with the brethren of this society, we, the Grand Lodge of the state of South Carolina, Ancient York Masons, beg leave to offer our sincere congratulations, on your arrival in this State.

We felicitate you on the establishment and exercise of a permanent government, whose foundation was laid, under your auspices, by military achievements, upon which have been progressively reared the pillars of the free republic over which you preside, supported by wisdom, strength and beauty, unrivalled among the nations of the world.

The fabric thus raised and committed to your superintendence, we earnestly wish may continue to produce order and harmony, to succeeding ages, and be the asylum of virtue to the oppressed of all parts of the universe.

When we contemplate the distresses of war—the instances of humanity displayed by the Craft afford some relief to the feeling mind; and it gives us the most pleasing sensations to recollect, that amidst the difficulties attendant on your late military stations, you still associated with and patronised the Ancient Fraternity.

Distinguished always by your virtues, more than the exalted stations in which you have moved, we exult in the opportunity you now give us of hailing you brother of our Order, and trust from your knowledge of our institution, to merit your countenance and support.

With fervent zeal for your happiness, we pray that a life so dear to the bosom of this society, and to society in general, may be long, very long preserved; and, when you leave the temporal symbolic lodges of this world, may you be received into the celestial lodge of light and perfection, where the Grand Master Architect of the Universe presides.

Done in behalf of the Grand Lodge.

M. GIST, G. M.

Charleston, 2d May, 1791.

ANSWER

To the Grand Lodge of South Carolina, Ancient York Masons.

Gentlemen,—I am much obliged by the respect which you are so good as to declare for my public and private character. I recognize with pleasure, my relation to the brethren of your society; and I accept with gratitude, your congratulations on my arrival in South Carolina.

Your sentiments on the establishment and exercise of our equal government, are worthy of an association whose principles lead to purity of morals, and are beneficial of action.

The fabric of our freedom is placed on the enduring basis of public virtue, and I will fondly hope, long continue to protect the prosperity of the architects who raised it.

I shall be happy on every occasion to evince my regard for the fraternity. For your prosperity, individually, I offer my best wishes.

G. WASHINGTON.

ADDRESS

Of the Grand Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, to their illustrious brother, GEO. WASHINGTON.

SIR,—Whilst the historian is describing the career of your glory, and the inhabitants of an extensive empire are made happy in your unexampled exertions—whilst some celebrate the Hero, so distinguished in liberating United America, and others the patriot who presides over her Councils,—a band of brothers, having always joined the acclamations of their countrymen, now testify their respect for those milder virtues which have ever graced the Man.

Taught by the precepts of our society, that all its members stand upon a level, we venture to assume this station, and to approach you with that freedom, which diminishes our diffidence, without lessening the respect. Desirous to enlarge the boundary of social happiness, and to vindicate the ceremonies of their institution, the Grand Lodge have published "a Book of Constitutions," and a copy for your acceptance accompanies this, which, by discovering the principles that actuate, will speak the eulogy of the society; though they fervently wish the conduct of its members may prove its higher recommendation.

Convinced of his attachment to its cause, and readiness to encourage its benevolent designs, they have taken the liberty to dedicate this work to one, the qualities of whose heart, and the actions of whose life, have contributed to improve personal virtue, and extend throughout the world the most endearing cordialities; and they humbly hope he will pardon this freedom, and accept the tribute of their esteem and homage.

May the Supreme Architect of the Universe protect and bless you, give length of days and increase of felicity in this world, and then receive you to the harmonious and exalted society in heaven.

JOHN CUTLER, Grand Master,

JOSHUA BARTLETT, } Grand Wardens.
MUNGO MACKAY, }

Boston, December, 27, A. L. 5792.

ANSWER

To the Grand Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Gentlemen,—Flattering as it may be to the human mind and truly honorable as it is, to receive from our fellow citizens testimonials of approbation for exertions to promote the public welfare, it is not less pleasing to know, that the milder virtues of the heart, are highly respected by a society whose LIBERAL PRINCIPLES ARE FOUNDED ON THE IMMUTABLE LAWS OF TRUTH AND JUSTICE.

To enlarge the sphere of social happiness is worthy the benevolent design of the masonic institution, and it is most fervently to be wished, that the conduct of every member of the fraternity, as well as those publications that discover the principles which actuate them; may tend to convince mankind that the grand object of Masonry is to promote the happiness of the human race.

While I beg your acceptance of my thanks for the "Book of Constitutions" which you have sent me, and for the honor you have done me in the dedication permit me to assure you that I feel all those emotions of gratitude which your affectionate address and cordial wishes, are calculated to inspire. And I sincerely pray, that the Great Architect of the Universe may bless you here, and receive you hereafter in his Immortal Temple.

G. WASHINGTON

FROM THE SAME.

The East, the West and the South of the Grand Lodge of Ancient, Free, and Accepted Masons, for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, to their most worthy brother GEO. WASHINGTON.

Wishing ever to be foremost in testimonials of respect and admiration of those virtues and services, with which you have so long adorned and benefitted our common country; and not the last nor least to regret the cessation of them in the public councils of the Union; your brethren of this grand lodge embrace the earliest opportunity of greeting you in the calm retirement you have contemplated to yourself.

Though as Citizens, they lose you in the active labors of political life, they hope as Masons to find you in the pleasing sphere of fraternal engagement. From the cares of state, and the fatigues of public business, our institution opens a recess, affording all the relief of tranquility, the harmony of peace, and the refreshment of pleasure. Of these may you partake in all their purity and satisfaction. And we will assure ourselves that your attachment to this social plan will increase; and that, under the auspices of your encouragement, assistance and patronage, the craft will attain its highest ornament, perfection and praise. And it is our earnest prayer, that when your light shall be no more visible in this earthly temple, you may be raised to the all perfect lodge above, be seated on the right hand of the Supreme Architect of the universe, and receive the refreshment your labors have merited!

In behalf of the Grand Lodge, we subscribe ourselves, with the highest esteem, your affectionate brethren.

PAUL REVERE, Grand Master.
ISAIAH THOMAS, Senior Grand Warden.
JOSEPH LAUGHTON, Junior Grand Warden
DANIEL OLIVER, Grand Secretary.

THE ANSWER.

[The following answer was received, and communicated to the Grand Lodge, June 12, 1797.]

To the Grand Lodge of Ancient, Free and Accepted Masons in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Brothers.—It was not until within these few days that I have been favored by the receipt of your affectionate address, dated in Boston, the 21st of March.

For the favorable sentiments you have been pleased to express on the occasion of my past services, and for the regrets with which they are accompanied for the cessation of my public functions, I pray you to accept my best acknowledgements and gratitude.

No pleasure, except that which results from a conscientiousness of having, to the utmost of my abilities discharged the trusts which have been reposed in me by my country, can equal the satisfaction I feel from the unequivocal proofs I continually receive of its approbation of my public conduct; and I beg you to be assured that the evidences thereof, which is exhibited by the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts, is not among the least pleasing or grateful to my feelings.

In that retirement, which declining years induced me to seek; and which repose, to a mind long employed in public concerns, rendered necessary; my wishes, that bounteous Providence will continue to bless and preserve our country in peace, and in the prosperity it has enjoyed, will be warm and sincere; and my attachment to the society, of which we are members, will dispose me always to contribute, my best endeavors to promote the honor and interest of the Craft.

For the prayer you offered in my behalf, I entreat you to accept the thanks of a grateful heart; with assurances of fraternal regard, and my best wishes for the honor, happiness, and prosperity of all the members of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts.

Of the Grand Lodge of Ancient York Masons, in Pennsylvania, to GEO. WASHINGTON, President of the United States.

Sir and Brother.—The Ancient York Masons of the jurisdiction of Pennsylvania, for the first time assembled in general communication, to celebrate the feast of St. John the Evangelist, since your election to the Chair of government of the United States, beg leave to approach you with congratulations from the East, and in the pride of fraternal affection, to hail you as the great master-builder (under the Supreme Architect) by whose labors the Temple of Liberty hath been reared in the West; exhibiting to the nations of the earth, a model of beauty, order, and harmony worthy of their imitation and praise.

Your knowledge of the origin and objects of our institution—its tendency to promote the social affections and harmonize the heart, give us a sure pledge that this tribute of our veneration, this effusion of love, will not be ungrateful to you; nor will Heaven reject our prayer that you may be long continued to adorn the bright list of master work-men, which our fraternity produces in the terrestrial Lodge; and that you may be late removed to that celestial Lodge, where love and harmony reign transcendent and divine; where the Great Architect more immediately presides; and where Cherubim and Seraphim, waiting our congratulations from earth to heaven, shall hail you Brother.

By order and in behalf of the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, in general communication, assembled in ample form.

ADDRESS

From the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts, to Mrs. Washington, occasioned by the death of the General.
Boston, January 11, 1800.

MADAM.—The Grand Lodge of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts have deeply participated in the general grief of their fellow-citizens, on the melancholy occasion of the death of their beloved Washington.

As Americans, they have lamented the loss of the Chief who had led their armies to victory, and their country to glory; but as Masons, they have wept the dissolution of that endearing relation, by which they were enabled to call him their Friend and their Brother. They presume not to offer those consolations which might alleviate the weight of common sorrows, for they are themselves inconsolable. The object of this address is, not to interrupt the sacred offices of grief like yours; but whilst they are mingling tears with each other on the common calamity, to condole with you on the irreparable misfortune which you have individually experienced.

To their expressions of sympathy on this solemn dispensation, the Grand Lodge have subjoined an order, that a Golden Urn be prepared as a deposit for a lock of hair, an invaluable relique of the Hero and the Patriot whom their wishes would immortalize; and that it be preserved with the jewels and regalia of the Society.

Should this favor be granted, Madam, it will be cherished as the most precious jewel in the cabinet of the Lodge, as the memory of his virtues will forever be in the hearts of its members. We have the honor to be, with the highest respect, your most obedient servants,

JOHN WARREN,
PAUL REVERE,
JOSIAH BARLETT.

Mrs. MARTHA WASHINGTON.

ANSWER.

Mrs. Washington's reply to the Grand Lodge of Mass.
Mount Vernon, January 27, 1800.

GENTLEMEN.—Mrs. Washington has received with sensibility, your letter of the 14th inst. enclosing a vote of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts, requesting a lock of her deceased husband's hair, to be preserved in a Golden Urn, with the jewels and regalia of the G. Lodge.

In complying with this request, by sending the lock of hair, which you will find enclosed, Mrs. Washington begs me to assure you, that she views with gratitude the tribute of respect and affection paid to the memory of her dear deceased husband; and receives with a feeling heart, the expressions of sympathy contained in your letter.

With great respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, Gentlemen, your most obedient servant.

TOBIAS LEAR.

JOHN WARREN, PAUL REVERE, JOSIAH BARLETT,
Past Grand Masters.

It gives us pleasure to state that the Urn and lock of hair, are at this time, (1832,) in the possession of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts.

CONCLUSION.

So long as the Masonic Institution shall continue to merit the approbation of such men as Washington; so long as such testimony as that we here present to the public, can be called up in her defence; so long shall the engines of persecution assail her in vain.—The unhallowed object of her enemies shall never be attained,

"Never till substantial night
His re-asum'd her ancient right;
'Till wrapp'd in flames, in ruin hurl'd
Sink the fabric of the world!"

MISCELLANY.

From the Knickerbocker.

TWO YEARS BEFORE THE MAST.

A Personal Narrative of Life at sea, pp 483. New York: Harpers and Brothers.

We have no hesitation in pronouncing this volume one of the most striking and evidently faithful pictures of 'real life' at sea, that has ever come under our observation. It is literally what it claims to be a 'Voice from the Forecastle,' and narrates, from the notes of a journal kept during the entire period, the events of two years spent as a common sailor before the mast, in the American merchant service. The writer is said to be Mr. R. H. Dana, Jr., of Boston, a son of the well-known author of the 'Buccaneers.' The voyage round Cape Horn from Boston to the western coast of North America, was undertaken from a determination to dispel, if possible, by an entire change of life, and by a long absence from books and study a complaint which had obliged him to give up his pursuits and which no medical aid seemed likely to cure.

We give the following melancholy scene at length and not without a sense of pleasure that it is embraced in the widely-spread 'Family Library,' and that it is in our power to place before some forty thousand additional readers a record of tyranny that must stamp the character of 'Capt. T——,' of the brig Pilgrim of Boston, with odium, and hand down his name to the merited scorn and contempt of every humane commander and seaman in Christendom:

"The captain was on board all day Friday, and every thing went on hard and disagreeably. 'The more you drive a man, the less he will do,' was as true with us as with any other people. We worked late Friday night, and were turned to, early Saturday morning.—About ten o'clock the captain ordered our new officer, Russell, who by this time had become thoroughly disliked by all the crew, to get the gig ready to take him ashore. John, the Swede, was sitting in the boat alongside, and Russell and myself were standing by the main hatchway, waiting for the captain, who was down in the hold, where the crew were at work, when we heard his voice raised in violent dispute with somebody, whether it was with the mate, or one of the crew, I could not tell; and then came blows and scuffling. I ran to the side and beckoned to John, who came up, and we leaned down the hatchway; and though we could see no one, yet we knew that the captain had the advantage, for his voice was loud and clear:

"You see your condition! You see your condition! Will you ever give me any more of your jaw?" No answer; and then came wrestling and heaving, as the man was trying to turn him. "You may as well keep still, for I have got you!" said the captain.—Then came the question, "Will you ever give me any more of your jaw?"

"I never gave you any Sir," said Sam; for it was his voice that we heard, though low and half-choked. "That's not what I ask you. Will you ever be impudent to me again?"

"I have never been, Sir," said Sam.

"Answer my question, or I'll make a spread eagle of you! I'll flog you by G—d."

"I am no negro slave," said Sam.

"Then I'll make you one!" said the captain; and he came to the hatchway, and sprang on deck, threw off his coat, and rolling up his sleeves, called out to the mate: "Seize that man up, Mr. A——! Seize him! Make a spread eagle of him! I'll teach you all who is master aboard!"

"The crew and officers followed the captain up the hatchway, and after repeated orders the mate laid hold of Sam, who made no resistance, and carried him to the gangway.

"What are you going to flog that man for, Sir?" said John the Swede, to the captain.

"Upon hearing this, the captain turned upon him, but knowing him to be quick and resolute, he ordered the steward to bring the irons, and calling upon Russell to help him, went up to John.

"Let me alone," said John. "I'm willing to be put in irons. You need not use any force;" and putting out his hands, the captain slipped the irons on, and sent him aft to the quarter-deck. Sam by this time was seized up, as it is called, that is, placed against the shrouds, with his wrists made fast to the shrouds, his jacket off, and his back exposed. The captain stood on the break of the deck, a few feet from him, and a lit le raised, so as to have a good swing at him, and held in his hand the hight of a thick, strong rope. The officers stood round, and the crew grouped together in the waist. All these preparations made me feel sick and almost faint, angry and excited as I was. A man—a human being, made in God's likeness—fastened up and flogged like a beast! A man too, whom I had lived with and eaten with for months, and knew almost as well as a brother. The first and almost uncontrollable impulse was resistance. But what was to be done? The time for it had gone by. The two best men were fast, and there were only two beside myself, and a small boy ten or twelve years of age.—And then there were (beside the captain) three officers, steward, agent, and clerk. But beside the numbers, what is there for sailors to do? If they resist, it is mutiny; and if they succeed, and take the vessel, it is piracy. If they ever yield again, their punishment must come; and if they do not yield, they are pirates for life. If a sailor resist his commander, he resists the law, and piracy or submission are his only alternatives. Bad as it was, it must be borne. It is what a sailor ships for. Swinging the rope over his head, and bending his body so as to give it full force, the captain brought it down upon the poor fellow's back. Once, twice—six times. "Will you ever give me any more of your jaw?" The man writhed with pain, but said not a word. Three times more. This was too much and he muttered something which I could not hear; this brought us many more as the man could stand; when the captain ordered him to be cut down, and to go forward.

"Now for you," said the captain, making up to John and taking his irons off. As soon as he was loose, he ran forward to the fore-castle. "Bring that man aft," shouted the captain. The second mate, who had been a shipmate of John's, stood still in the waist, and the mate walked slowly forward; but our third officer, anxious to show his zeal, sprang forward over the windlass, and laid hold of John; but he soon threw him from him. At this moment I would have given worlds for the power to help the poor fellow; but it was all in vain. The captain stood on the quarter-deck, bare-headed, his eyes flashing with rage, and his face as red as blood, swinging the rope, and calling out to his officers, "Drag him aft!—Lay hold of him! I'll sweeten him!" etc., etc. The mate now went forward and told John quietly to go aft; and he, seeing resistance in vain, threw the blackguard third mate from him; said he would go aft himself; that they should not drag him; and went up to the gangway and held out his hands; but as soon as the captain began to make him fast, the indignity was too much, and he began to resist; but the mate and Russell holding him, he was soon seized up. When he was made fast, he turned to the captain, who stood turning up his sleeves and getting ready for the blow, and asked him what he was to be flogged for. "Have I ever refused my duty Sir? Have you ever known me to hang back, or to be insolent, or not to know my work?"

"No," said the captain, "it is not that I flog you for; I flog you for your interference—for asking question."

"Can't a man ask a question here, without being flogged?"

"No!" shouted the captain; "nobody shall open his mouth aboard this vessel, but myself; and he began laying the blows upon his back, swinging half round between each blow, to give it full effect. As he went on, his passion increased, and he danced about the deck, calling out as he swung the rope: 'If you want to know what I flog you for, I'll tell you. It's because I like to do it! because I like to do it! It suits me! That's what I do it for!'

"The man writhed under the pain, until he could endure it no longer, when he called out, with an exclamation more common to foreigners than with us: 'Oh, Jesus Christ! Oh, Jesus Christ!'

"Don't call on Jesus Christ!" shouted the captain; "he can't help you. Call on Captain T——. He's the man! He can help you! Jesus Christ can't help you now!"

"At these words, which I never shall forget, my blood ran cold. I could look on no longer. Disgusted, sick, and horror-struck, I turned away, and leaned over the rail, and looked down into water. A few rapid thoughts of my own situation, and the prospect of future revenge, crossed my mind; but the falling of the blows and the cries of the man called me back at once. At length they ceased, and turning round, I found that the mate, at a signal from the captain, had cut him down. Almost doubled up with pain, the man walked slowly forward, and went down into the fore-castle. Every one else stood still at his post, while the captain, swelling with rage, and with the importance of his achievement, walked the quarter-deck, and at each turn, as he came forward, calling out to us: 'You see your condition! You see where I've got you all, and you know what to expect! You've been mistaken in me; you didn't know what I was! Now you know what I am!—I'll make you toe the mark, every soul of you, or I'll flog you all, fore and aft, from the bow up! You've got a driver over you! Yes, a slave-driver—a negro-driver! I'll see who'll tell me he is n't a negro slave!' With this and the like matter, equally calculated to quiet us, and to allay any apprehensions of future trouble, he entertained us for about ten minutes, when he went below. Soon after, John came aft, with his bare back covered with stripes and wales in every direction, and dreadfully swollen, and asked the steward to ask the captain to let him have some salve, or balsam, to put upon it. "No," said the captain, who heard him from below; "tell him to put his shirt on: that's the best thing for him; and pull me ashore in the boat. Nobody is going to lay up on board this vessel." He then called to Mr. Russell to take those two men and two others in the boat and pull him ashore. I went for one. The two men could hardly bend their backs, and the captain called to them "give way! give way!" but finding they did their best, he let them alone. The agent was in the stern sheets, but during the whole pull—a league or more—not a word was spoken. We landed; the captain, agent, and officer went up to the house, and left us with the boat. I, and the man with me, staid near the boat while John and Sam walked slowly away, and sat down on the rocks. They talked some time together, but at length separated, each sitting alone. I had some fears of John. He was a foreigner, and violently tempered, and rinder suffering; and he had his knife with him, and the captain was to come down alone to the boat. But nothing happened, and we went quietly on board. The captain was probably armed, and if either of them had lifted a hand against him, they would have had nothing before them but flight, and starvation in the woods of California, or capture by the soldiers and Indian blood-hounds, whom the offer of twenty dollars would have set upon them."

"After the day's work was done, we went down into the fore-castle, and ate our plain supper; but not a word was spoken. It was Saturday night; but there was no song—no 'sweethearts and wives.' A gloom was over every thing. The two men lay in their berths groaning with pain, and we all turned in; but for myself, not to sleep. A sound coming now and then from the berths of the two men, showed they were awake, as awake they must have been, for they could hardly lie in one posture a moment; the dim, swinging lamp of the fore-castle shed its light over the dark hole in which we lived; and many and various reflections and purposes coursed through my mind. I thought of our situation, living under a tyranny; of the character of the country we were in; of the length of the voyage, and of the uncertainty attending our return to America; and then, if we should return, of the prospect of obtaining justice and satisfaction for these poor men; and vowed that if God should ever give me the means, I would do something to redress the grievances and relieve the sufferings of that poor class of beings of whom I then was one."

Now, while all will admit the necessity of discipline on board a ship, and the duty which a captain owes to his station and his employers, yet no one, who is not a brute, in feeling or in practice, will be found to extenuate or defend such acts of wanton and barbarous cruelty as are here described; and we must express the hope that the well-known Boston house of Bryant, Sturges, and Company, do not still maintain in their employ so unworthy an officer. Our author in his closing chapter, to the evidences of good character on shore, which are permitted to weigh with a jury, when such sea-tyrants as Capt. T——, are tried for their gross offences against humanity says:

"There are many captains whom I know to be cruel and tyrannical men at sea, who yet, among their friends, and in their families, have never lost the reputation they bore in childhood. The sea captain would be a brute indeed, if, after an absence of months and years, during his short stay, so short that the novelty and excitement of it has hardly time to wear off, and the attentions he receives as a visiter and stranger hardly time to slacken—if, under such circumstances, a townsman or neighbor would be justified in testifying against his correct and peaceable deportment.—With the owners of the vessel, also, to which he is attached, and among merchants and insurers generally, he is a very different man from what he may be at sea, when his own master, and the master of every body and every thing about him."

IRISH WIT.

There is a peculiar ready wit belonging to the Irish national character, unequalled in its originality and electric in its effects. A Dutchman would require four pipes deliberately smoked, an Italian sixteen macaronis, and a Spaniard his whole life to effect one specimen of ready wit; while an Irishman does it instinctively without thinking "at all." We were somewhat amused the other day by a dialogue which was related to us by a friend, between two Irishmen, both of whom had been to London and were anxious to display their knowledge of its localities: the dispute began and ended as follows, viz.

Michael. Spaking of London is that you are after! Devil a bit do ye know how many taverns there are in that same wid the sign of the Bull; ye spalpeen.

Pat. And is'nt it I that tell ye every mother's son o' them its five exactly—the pot o' whiskey of it ye blackguard.

Mich. Done, and jist tell us their names.

Pat. There's the Black Bull—that's one—the Blue Bull, and that's two—the White Bull, and that's three and then there's—there's (scratching his head) there's Mich. Jist pay over the whiskey and bad luck to ye—did'nt I tell ye that there were but jist four.

Pat. Och murder! I've got it—there's the Brown Cow.

Mich. Murder murder what a bull.

Pat. Yere tight honey—that's five—tip up the whiskey.

POPULAR TALES.

THE VIRGIN WIFE.

AN OVER TRUE TALE.

One of the members of a large family always bore the somewhat dubious title of 'Philosopher.' It was not exactly a nick name, for—being given more in compliment than in banter—it was acquiesced in and adopted by father and mother, brothers and sisters, and tolerated with a smile by the titular personage himself. Harry had received the appellation of 'philosopher' from an old woman, whom in his infancy he used to tease with his questions, and amuse by his shrewd observations. From the old woman the name passed into the family, and among the neighbors; from thence it entered school; and, though it began to drop out of familiar usage when Harry was sent to business, it was still recollected, and occasionally applied. He had, indeed, some claim to the title. Fond of books, he was reading when his companions were at play; and among his young fellow-workers, none were so sedulous, so quiet as he. All difficulties were referred to his decision; he was the living dictionary and encyclopedia of the workshop; and if a problem was started too profound for the 'philosopher' to solve, it was generally dismissed as being beyond the range of his companions' capacity.

When Harry was getting into manhood, it became a standing topic of debate between his mother and some neighborhood matrons, whether the 'philosopher' would ever take it into his head to go 'a-courting.'—His mother stoutly maintained the negative—he was too much of a sober-sided, she said, to think of wasting his time with the girls; and when any one taking up the positive side of the argument, would say, 'Wait a bit—let Henry alone, he'll look after the girls, I warrant ye, for all his philosophy!'—the mother generally retreated to her citadel of defence, which was, that Harry was fonder of poring over a dried skull, which he kept in a box under his bed, than in looking in the face of the prettiest girl in the parish.

One day Harry was passing along a narrow footpath bridge, which spanned a romantic stream, when all at once his eyes rested on the soft expressive look of a female, whose form had several former times flitted before him.

She perceived that Harry was gazing; and maiden modesty threw over a somewhat pale face a flush that might have rivalled some of the hues on a summer's eve. She passed on, and Harry turned to look after her. Up to this period he had hardly been conscious of a sentiment or feeling of beauty. Women had hitherto only been distinguished in his mind by being young or old, dark or fair; and his mother was the 'best of the lot.' Now as he gazed after the sylph-like creature who was descending the slope of the arch, he thought he had never seen a more graceful figure; and when she disappeared from his view, he looked over the balustrade, and perceived, what he had never perceived before, that the wooden bridge on which he had stood was exceedingly light and elegant. Then the shadows which chased each other over the ripples of the water assumed the most fantastic and beautiful shape which imagination could conceive; and the whole outline of the river and its banks entered into his heart in a way which was like the imparting of a new sense. Harry moved gently onwards, but still occasionally looking back to where she had disappeared from his view; and he was now conscious of having in his fancy, not the mere impression of two beautiful eyes, but the whole-length portrait of a most lovely creature, whose soul, in looking out from the windows of her arabesque palace, had dispossessed him of his own. That night Harry caught himself trying to make poetry, and threw his pen down, half-angry and half-laughingly.

For about a week, the philosophic bachelor struggled with the fancy which had entered into his heart, and had he left his native place at that particular time, his fancy would have gradually become dim, until it faded away altogether. But ten days afterwards he met his 'fairy' again; and she seemed even more lovely than at first. Harry could not criticise the details of her personal appearance; all he knew was, that somehow or other—though he could not exactly tell why—she was the most beautiful young woman he had ever seen in his life. Harry's 'philosophy' at last gradually revealed to him that he was in love. His love, however, received a somewhat rude shock before he had contrived to become acquainted with the subject of it.—Passing an open parlor window, through which he caught a glimpse of a large number of young ladies' heads, he saw among them his own 'sweet fancy,' and distinctly heard her exclaim, 'As I live, there's Plum-color!' Harry knew that had been honored with the appellation, and though he had affected to treat 'popular opinion' with a sturdy indifference, the sobriquet of 'Plum-color' had made him change his coat. Still the nick-name stuck to him; and the idea that the first time he ever heard the dame speak about him it should be with a scoff, was deeply mortifying. What! was there, after all, no soul to look through those impressive souls? Was that graceful figure the habitation of a frivolous mind? He went home, and instead of trying to make poetry, or experimenting on his blow-pipe, he sat down, and felt as if he could cry.

Harry, however, was not quit a chicken; and so, like a man, he got over his mortification; and, like a philosopher, resolved to let the ascertaining of facts precede the construction of a theory. For a long time he was in great distress as to how to get introduced—he thought of writing her a sensible letter, and then he thought that was not the sensible way of going about the business; then he wished he had courage to address her personally, and then he was afraid of a repulse; but at last he made a confidant of his sister, and she took up the affair with an energy that was sure to result in success. One or two apparently casual meetings were contrived, during which 'Plum-color' was successful in convincing the fair lady that, though he might be a philosopher, he was not quite a fool; and Harry, on his part, saw that, though the handsome girl laughed heartier and oftener than seemed becoming in the future wife of a philosopher, she yet had a heart, and her beauty was only the setting of a gem.

Eliza required a little time before she could fairly say that the 'philosopher' had won her heart. She had shrewdness enough to remark, long before they became acquainted, that there was something uncommon about 'Plum-color,' and she often had wished to know what kind of a fellow he was, but his supposed boorishness, his somewhat plain appearance, and the ludicrous associations excited by the nick-name in the lively girl's fancy, had all tended to repress any sentiment of what may be termed 'love.' Gradually as their meetings became more frequent, did all these repelling ideas vanish. Greater familiarity enabled Harry to feel less restrained in her company; the desire of pleasing, and the power of pride, came to his assistance, and drew out characteristics hitherto unknown to exist in his disposition; and association with a graceful girl, whose intellect possessed a natural tact, and her manners a natural delicacy, gave a tone to Harry's own manners, which delighted his sisters, and made his mother wonder. He no longer shut himself up, like an ascetic, as if despising all around him; he came out of his cell, and walked abroad. Light-hearted as Eliza seemed, and ready to make the air ring with her merry laugh at the veriest trifle, she yet could pause to listen to her 'philosopher,' when he descanted on higher and graver themes. Greedily she inclined her ear to hear him talk of the wonders in the heaven above and in the earth beneath; and he, delighted with his apt and affectionate pupil, exerted himself till his voice became musical, and his language eloquence. Often and often have they walked under the starry canopy of night, he speaking of the boundless universe of the infinite God, and she listening, as if the spirit of awe had come down to abide in her heart. Often and often have they wandered by the banks of the stream, and talked of their meeting on the bridge; and then she, becoming a more enthusiastic 'philosopher' even than he, would question him about the sun, and light, and heat, and the composition of the water that flowed at their feet, and the growth of the trees which shaded their path. To both a new world was opened; he, rich in the happiness which the love of a confiding girl creates; and she, richer even still in that exquisite joy produced in a pure-mind-heart by reposing on the affection of one who was at once an instructor, a friend and a lover. Yes! there is true, genuine, unalloyed pleasure, in such a courtship as we have been describing; and more of it would he enjoyed if we were less affected and more trusting—more anxious to establish an affection which will endure for a life, than to snatch a momentary admiration.

Some six months had elapsed since the courtship commenced; and to both the time had been but as a pleasant day. The winter set in; and one night, after attending a crowded meeting, the lovers were foolish enough to walk about till the cold drove them homewards, receiving on their way a drenching from a shower of rain. Eliza caught a cold, which settled into a dry, distressing cough; and after the spring had set in, instead of getting rid of it, as Harry had fondly predicted she would, it seemed rather to acquire greater strength. A roseate tinge began to play over her face; but Harry, with all his science, had not experience enough to enable him to understand the warning which it gave. He called one day; she was very cheerful; her eye had an almost supernatural brilliancy; the crimson of her cheek was of the richest dye of Heaven; and her transparent skin seemed scarcely to conceal the coursing of her 'eloquent blood.' Harry thought he had never seen a more glorious creature in human shape, and he burst out with 'My angel!'

'Hush, Harry,' she said, interrupting him 'why should you talk nonsense; you know I am not an angel, and it does not become a sensible man, like you, to say so.'

'Why, Eliza, I am so glad to see you so much better; I never saw you so charming in your life; I am sure you must be much better.'

'Do not be too sure, Harry, about anything. Come here, Harry, and sit down beside me. There, that will do. Now, Harry, look me steadily in the face.'

Harry laughed, looked her steadily in the face, and then kissed her. 'Now, Eliza, will that do?'

'Yes, that will do; but I want you to be serious.'

'Why, now, that is very good of you. Often have I wished you to be serious, and you have as often laughed in my face.'

'Harry—would you like to lose me?'

He started to his feet, repeating—'Lose you! lose you!—what?'

He paused; and as he gazed on her solemn yet animated aspect, and the truth suddenly flashed upon him; and he beheld the word consumption visible in her lovely countenance.

Harry was at first stupified; but on learning some chance remained by removal to milder air, he set to work to prove that his affection lay in his heart. Assiduous were all his attentions; he accompanied her on her journey, and put his invention to task to render absence as durable as possible. The summer passed away drearily; hope and fear alternately counterblanced each other; now would Eliza write, to say that she felt surprisingly well, and again would the mother send up a desponding message. After some months, homeward came the invalid, for she longed to see home once more, and she said, 'If it is to be, I should like to have Harry beside me when I die.' And when Harry on her arrival, took her in his arms and helped her up stairs, something seemed to whisper to him, 'It is to be;' and so all he could say, to her was 'Eliza—dear Eliza!' and then he sobbed passionately.

Eliza had been dull and miserable in the country; but now that she was home again, and had Harry beside her, she became cheerful, and even lively. 'Harry,' she said to him one day, 'and so, my own philosopher, you are going to lose me!'

'Eliza—Eliza—do not be so cruel. Oh, do not talk in that way.'

'Nay, Harry,' she added, 'do not think I talk in a tone of bravado or affected carelessness. I perfectly feel that death is an awful thing, and I would wish to live, if it were only for you!'

Harry stooped forward and kissed her, and bathed her cheek with a tear.

'Harry,' she again said, 'do you remember that passage which you once repeated and which I repeated after you, without missing a word? Well, now, I will repeat it again, just to show you what a good memory I have—'

'Ay, but to die, and go we know not where;
To lie in cold obstruction, and to rot,
This sensible warm motion to become
A kneaded clod; and the delightful spirit
To bathe in fiery clouds, and to reside
In thrilling regions of thick-ribbed ice;

To be imprisoned in the viewless winds,
And blown, with restless violence, round about
This pendulous world, or to be worse than worst
Of these, that lawless and uncertain thoughts
Imagine howling! tis too horrible!
The weariest and most loathed world's life,
That age, ache, beauty and imprisonment
Can lay on nature, is a paradise
To what we fear of death!

There, now, Harry, that is all right, I think. Now, though I certainly have no such fearful ideas of death, fearful as death is, still I so far enter into the spirit of the passage—I know so much of this beautiful world, and so very little of a future state—that I could wish to live, for your sake—just to be your own little wife, Harry! Then, with a quick inclination of the head, she said, "Harry, you are a philosopher—tell me, what is death?"

A death-like paleness overspread Harry's face, but he did not speak.

"Ah! it gives you pain, my dear Harry, to hear me talk in this way. Well, we will change the subject—what is life?"

Still Harry was silent, for "thick crowding fancies," were struggling in his brain.

"Now, Harry," she continued, in a lower tone, "ever since I became acquainted with you, I have lived in a new world. Often, when you have been explaining to me about the sun, and the moon and the stars, and all the wonderful things of this earth, I have longed to be able to sail through the universe to examine everything to understand everything, to be able to comprehend something of the marvellous works of God. Then I have said to myself, 'What a poor stupid thing you are; you don't know anything.' Oh, I wish I were a man. Harry, why did God make us men and women?"

Harry replied, "Nay my dear girl, you will exhaust yourself, if you go on at this rate. You want repose."

"Well, I will take your advice. My body is weak, but I feel as if my mind was wonderfully active. Come tomorrow, Harry, for you have yet much to teach me before I die."

On his way homeward, a dark cloud came over his mind. "What a wonderful creature!" he thought; "noble in body, generous and confiding in disposition, quick in intellect—a rare combination in ordinary life! And yet in all this combination of moral and physical beauty—is this glorious girl about to drop into the dust, and be as if she had never been?" If Harry had no other source of comfort but his knowledge, he might have dropped in despair. But he did as a good man of the olden time did, when he also had a cloud over his mind, when meditating on life and death—he "went into the sanctuary of God;" light pierced his darkness; he returned to Eliza next day, with a lighter step and a cheerfuller heart.

"Oh, Harry, she said, how I have been longing for you to return! I want you to answer my question: why did God make us men and women?"

"It was His pleasure, my dear, to do so, just as he has made the earth a globe, and surrounded it with an atmosphere."

"Yes, yes, I know all that very well. But what I want to know is what you would call the rationale of the question. I will put it in another way—what sort of a world would this be, if we had all been merely intellectual beings, without that division by which we are men and women?"

"All I can fancy of it is, that in this case, human beings would have resembled a forest of pine-trees—dull, dark and uniform."

"Why, Harry, why? I want to know the reason why?"

"This division of the human race into men and women may be termed the kaleidoscope of humanity.—It is a comparatively simple matter, and yet it produces that apparently infinite variety which diversifies human existence. The relation of parent and child—the care of the father—the love of the mother—the affection of the child—the attachment of brothers and sisters—family ties—social interests—national concerns—all spring from our being men and women."

"Good, good—go on Harry."

"Then that universe of mind which springs from the attachment of two such minds as we are—human love, given by God to adorn and elevate human existence—and which prevails in its noblest purity and power where man is most advanced in principle and in civilization."

"Now Harry, I begin to understand. Let me try if I can express myself philosophically, as you would say. The division of mankind into men and women is a great means to a great end is it not?"

"Exactly: the end being the endowing our humanity with moral sentiments—with thought, feeling, hope, effort, love, fear, forbearance, tenderness, &c."

"But Harry, there will be no men and women in a future state of existence?"

"No, Eliza, our Lord has assured us of that."

"Well, then, if there be no parents and children, no husbands and wives, no men and women to love and be loved, what state of existence will it be? There will be no hope, love, fear, as you express it: and what object can our division into men and women serve, when it perishes with this world?"

"Eliza do you remember that passage in which the Sadducees, who did not believe in a resurrection, came to our Lord with what they thought a puzzling question. They supposed a case, where according to the Mosaic law, a woman had been married in succession to seven brothers; and then they tauntingly asked whose wife she would be in the resurrection? What reply did our Lord make?"

"I remember. He said, 'Do ye not therefore err, because ye know not the Scriptures, neither the power of God! For when they rise from the dead, they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels which are in heaven.'"

"Mark the words, Eliza,—'the power of God.' The distinction of sex is the scaffolding of our moral existence: this life is but the first stage of our being; when our characters are built up, the scaffolding will be taken away, and then we enter a nobler and higher state."

"But Harry, what I am afraid of is, that we will not know each other, or that at least we will become quite indifferent to each other."

"Nay, Eliza, nay! I rest perfectly satisfied that in a future state memory will be like night, revealing those innumerable things in our constitution which the light of the present life dims or conceals; that love first created by our connection with an animal existence, will, when dissociated from it, act with a power of which we have no present idea; and that all the intellectual powers, expanding in a body freed from mere animal qualities, will make the human being a wonderful creature—one of the glories of God's universe!"

The vivid flashing of Eliza's eyes showed to Harry that her mind was in a state of peculiar excitement; he therefore, retired, promising to return soon. During his absence, a thought took possession of the girl's fancy.

"Oh," said she to herself, "if memory will be such a powerful reflector in a future state, how I should love to remember that I have been Harry's wife in this world!" Then suddenly blaming herself for being a mere selfish creature, she prayed, while the tears streamed from her eyes, that God would give her affectionate lover a good wife, after she was dead and gone.

But the idea became strong: the thought of being Harry's wife before she parted overcame all idea of singularity or of incongruity: she thought that if she died without bearing the name of "wife" she would depart from this breathing, bustling, working world, without a tie to link her memory even to the grave. She mentioned the idea to her mother, who could not comprehend her meaning, and thought disease had affected her brain. But when her mother mentioned it to Harry, he at once caught and comprehended the spirit of Eliza's wish. "Yes," said he, as he walked into the room, "yes my own girl you shall be Harry's wife before you die!"

One morning a coach drove up to a church—Harry and Eliza, his sister and her mother stepped out, and so elastic were the movements of the bride that a casual spectator never would have imagined that she was already married to death. The proclaiming of the banns had attracted no attention, for it was done in a church, and not a soul beyond the four individuals, was aware of the nature of this singular union. Several other couples were married at the same time; and as they all stood up, Eliza seemed among them a being of another world. She went through the ceremony without evincing symptoms of exhaustion;

though, when she reached home, she fainted repeatedly, as it appeared as if her wedding day was to be her last. Next day she was better; and a momentary delusion came over Harry's mind that she might still live. But the 'wife' felt that it was a delusion; she was done with this world, she said and contented to be done with it—Harry, my own husband—remember me when I am dead!"

Two weeks after the wedding, it appeared evident that her departure was at hand. Harry and her mother sat up during the night, reading at intervals portions of the New Testament. The light of morning had begun to penetrate the window-blinds, when Eliza said in a whispering, but not complaining tone, "Mother, my feet are very cold—oh, mother, I am becoming so cold!" and then the mother whose heart was too dry for tears, made a sign to Harry that Death had of a certainty entered the chamber, and was hovering over the bed.

"Where is Harry?" she murmured, and he took her hand in his. Harry read a verse to me; and he repeated from memory, 'Beloved, now are we sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when He shall appear, we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is.'

"Ah that is good," she said; "science is very good, Harry, but that is worth all science to me just now. Harry, come near me; I cannot see you—where are you?"

"I am here dear Eliza."

"And mother?"

"Here, my child."

"May God bless you both—Harry, call me 'wife' before I die."

He leaned forward to whisper the affectionate word in her ear, and heard her muttering, "What we know hereafter. Then a few incoherent expressions followed, a gentle sigh, and one or two sobs; and just as rays of the sun illuminated the apartment, the spirit of a noble creature departed.

THE GATHERER.

TURKISH WIVES.

There is a general idea prevalent in this country, that the Turks have a plurality of wives, but such a custom has no existence in reality. It is true that the Koran allows the Sultan seven wives, and every other Mussulman four; but there are few instances in Turkey at the present day, of Turks having more than one wife: and I was assured by a bey, that, with the exception of three or four of the wealthiest pachas, there were not five Turks in Constantinople who had more than one wife. On one occasion I asked an old effendi how many wives he had. He replied, "One is all I can afford." I said it would be almost as cheap to keep four in a house as one, and his answer was, "Probably four English wives might live peaceably in one house, but Turkish wives must have separate houses; and a man must have as many establishments as he has wives, for if they were to live in the same house they would scratch one another's eyes out. I was, however, acquainted with one effendi who, getting tired of his wife, sold her, and bought two black ones with the money he got for her.—Reid's Turkey and the Turks.

The word Selah, is met with 74 times in the Bible. The word Eternity, but once. The double asseveration, Verily, verily, it is to be found 25 times in John's gospel, and nowhere else. There are 314 interrogations (?) in Job. The phrase, And God said, occurs 10 times in the first chapter of Genesis. The name Jesus, and Christ are neither of them in the 3d epistle of John. The word Foreordained, is mentioned but once in the whole Bible, 1 Peter i. 20. The word Perseverances is mentioned but once in the Bible, Eph. vi. 18. The word Atonement, is mentioned but once

The words Eternal life, are mentioned but once in the Old Testament, 1 an. xii. 2. The word Predestinate, is mentioned twice; and twice the word Predestinated, is mentioned.—Boston Palladium.

BARON TRENCK.

The famous Baron Trenck, it is known, had an amour with the youngest sister of Frederick the Great; and to this the unrelenting barbarity of the king is commonly attributed. He escaped from Galtz, and took service successively with the Russians and Austrians. Many years afterwards in 1754, as he was passing through Dantzick he was treacherously given up to the Prussian government, and was sent to the fortress of Magdeburg. Here he was confined for nearly ten years, with circumstances of the most aggravated cruelty. He was placed in a damp dungeon loaded with irons of sixty-eight pounds weight, almost starved to death, and, finally, tortured by being waked during his slumbers every half hour. This overwhelming misery did not, however break his spirit; assisted by the pity of the soldiers who guarded him, he contrived to send letters to the Princess Amelia, and to others of his friends. By these means he obtained money with which he bribed the soldiers, to procure him files and other tools, as well as lights, pens and paper. His various attempts to escape are very curious, as well as the herculean labors he went through in the progress of them. Suffice it to say, not one of them was successful; but that he was finally released towards the end of the year 1762, partly from the representations to her brother of the Princess Amelia, and partly in consequence of his having succeeded in bribing the imperial minister at Berlin, who demanded his liberty as an officer in the Austrian service. He afterwards passed a turbulent and discontented life, always engaged in law-suits and discussions respecting the succession of his cousin, Francis Trenck; which ought to have descended to him, but was, by treachery and chicanery, usurped by others. He became, at different times, a wine merchant, an editor of a newspaper, and an author of German poetry. At the commencement of the French revolution he came to Paris, where he was guillotined during the reign of terror.—Lord Dover's Life of Frederick the Second.

GOOD.—Do you publish matrimonial notices for the subscribers of your paper?" said a gentlemanly looking youth, stepping into our office the other morning. "Certainly sir." "Well then I'll go and get married, for I don't see any other way of getting my name into your paper—since you have rejected all my poetical effusions."

CAUTIONSNESS.—A fellow who had ascended the platform for the purpose of being hung told the hangman that he hoped that the rope was strong enough as if it should break and he fall to the ground he might be so seriously injured as to become a cripple for life. His apprehensions were quieted when the hangman assured him that he might venture on the rope with perfect safety!

POLITENESS.—At one of the German battles, a regiment had orders not to grant quarter: an unhappy enemy, wounded and disarmed, begged hard for his life from one of its officers. Touched with his situation, the other replied, "I pity your misfortune: and ask any thing else but that, and upon my honor, I will grant your request!"

Mr. Curran, in his last illness, on being told by his physician on a morning visit, that he seemed to cough with much difficulty, replied, "that is rather surprising, as I have been practising all night."

VERY THIN.—I have just met your old acquaintance Daily," said an Irishman to his friend. "and was sorry to see he has almost shrunk away to nothing. You are thin and I am thin, but he is thinner than both of us put together."

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, OCT. 17, 1840.

TERMS OF THIS PAPER.—To subscribers residing out of the city, $2 if in advance—$2.50 if within six months, and $3, if not paid until the expiration of the year. BACK NUMBERS at all times furnished.

THE MORMONS.—This Sect, which started up a few years since in the neighborhood of Rochester, and whose extravagant notions of religion, visions, golden bibles, gifts of unknown tongues, &c. excited nothing but ridicule, in our own state, and opposition in others has been finally persecuted into a formidable body, dispersed, not only over our own country, but across the 'big pond.' In this city, one of their preachers "holds forth" on each Sunday, and we are told that his doctrines, and apparent humility, commands a respectful attention. The Cincinnati Chronicle states that their church in England, comprises between 2 and 3000 members, mostly in Lancashire: they have also regularly organized societies in Liverpool, Edinburgh, Birmingham, Manchester, &c. About 100 Methodist preachers in England have embraced their faith. In this country, there are about 2800 at Nauvoo, Ill., and about 2000 in Lee county, in Iowa; on the opposite side of the Mississippi. They have churches in Quincy, in Springfield, in Jacksonville, and various other parts of Illinois. There is a church of about 100 members at Dayton, Ohio, and they intend to establish one in Cincinnati shortly, eight persons were baptized by them, in the river in front of that city, a short time since. With the exception of Missouri, Georgia, Alabama, Louisiana, they have regularly organized churches in every State in the Union, those at Philadelphia and New York comprises each about 300 members. They publish a monthly Journal in Manchester, England, and another at Nauvoo, Illinois.—It is a very true remark "that the hardest way to convince a man is to burn him," and the increase of their sect can be accounted for in no other way, than in the barbarous persecution which they have suffered in many of the states. Joe Smith was undoubtedly a hypocrite, and his early followers as credulous a set of fanatics as could well be desired by a cunning leader. But such is the incomprehensible nature of man, that while his religion embraced extravagancies, the belief of which, would almost subject the disciple to a madhouse—no sooner does persecution assail his little band, and martyrdom follow, than the hidden elements of a morbid sympathy is set to work; and what was once the distempered ebullition of downright hypocrisy, or rank fanaticism, unfolds to us "truths," which the greater the absurdity, the more tenacious our belief. We believe such to have been the modus operandi, by which the Mormons have attained their present strength, and it but adds one more lesson to the perfectibility of poor human nature!!!

☞ We have received two complaints this week, that the Register is not received regular. The fault does not lay with us. The Register is regularly mailed to our country subscribers, every Friday evening; so that the fault lies in the transmission, but where, we have yet to learn. We ask for "more light."

CANAL TOLLS.—The amount received on all the canals of this State for the first week of the present month is seventy-four thousand eight hundred and ninety-nine dollars and four cents.

The Rev. Mr. Holmes, the pastor of the Third Dutch Church in this city, preached his farewell sermon on Sunday last, and takes his departure for Athens, where he had received a call. We cannot but offer our sincere regrets, with those of his congregation in the imperious necessity, which has compelled a separation from a Pastor so deservedly esteemed and respected by them. There are some facts connected with this separation, which should be known, that the responsibility may rest where it belongs.

The Third Dutch Church was erected some six years ago in the south part of the city, on a plot of ground, donated by the late Stephen Van Rensselaer. The church originally cost about eleven thousand dollars, of which four has been paid on it, and mortgages now rest on it for the balance $7000. Owing to some peculiar circumstances, it now becomes necessary that the mortgages should be paid, or at least, the interest—this the congregation find, themselves unable to do, besides supporting their Pastor, and defraying other current expenses; repeated applications have been made to the sister churches here, who are abundantly able, to remove these embarrassments, but without effect, and the consequence is, that Mr. Holmes, has in justice to himself, been compelled to leave his charge, and the church will be sold, unless means are devised, to satisfy these mortgages. We understand that the ladies of the congregation are about getting up a fair, from necessity, to meet some of the exigencies under which the church is placed. This state of things is discreditable to those who have the power of preventing it; and the "world's people" do not mince the matter when they speak of it.

CONVICTION OF MURDER.—Jacob Ledding, who it will be recollected some time since shot his wife in the town of Bethlehem in this county, was arraigned at the circuit court in this city, on Tuesday last, and found guilty, and sentenced to be executed on the 4th of December next. We understand that there are no mitigating points in the prisoner's case, on which to found executive clemency. Ledding was a very dissipated man, and of a brutal disposition. While his unfortunate wife, was every thing the reverse of him.—Before he committed the murderous act, he attempted to decoy her without the house, but failing in this, deliberately presented the gun across the cradle where his sleeping infant lay, and in the presence of several of his children shot her in the thigh. Mrs. Ledding lingered along for some weeks, when amputation became necessary, and death came to her relief. Mrs. L. we understand was the mother of thirteen children, and the principal witness against the inhuman monster, was his own daughter. Throughout the trial, and during the sentence of Judge Cushman, the prisoner exhibited the most sullen indifference to his fate; eating chesnuts while the judge was addressing him. His fate can call forth but little sympathy.

DANCING SCHOOL.—Mr. W. Whale's Dancing-School has now commenced at Stanwix Hall, under very favorable auspices. From Mr. W's experience, and the satisfaction he has given among the Albanians for a series of years, there is no doubt, but that the school will continue to enjoy the high reputation, which has so far followed it. Mr. W. is a practical delineator of the art he professes to teach—a gentleman of fair character and morals, and worthy of the patronage of his fellow citizens. We take pleasure also in stating that he has removed a cause of former complaint—by entirely excluding the use of ardent spirits from the establishment.

PLEASANT EXCURSION.—A company of young men have fitted up a vessel of about 100 tons at Buffalo, for an excursion of pleasure for five years to the upper lakes. They intend spending the winter on Lake Huron, in fishing, hunting, &c. and in the spring they intend to cruise in Lake Superior, the Lake of the Woods, and do many other things.

ANOTHER VICTIM.—The mate of a vessel lying at one of the Philadelphia Wharves, was found dead a few days since in the cabin from the effects of burning charcoal. It is strange that grown up people will thus tamper with that, which every child in the country knows is certain death.

OIL.—During the month of September there arrived at the various ports of the United States ten ships, one barque, four brigs and a schooner, engaged in the whale trade. They brought 12,529 barrels of whale oil. Within the last three months $240,000 worth of whale oil has been exported from New Bedford, at a good profit to the north of Europe, and $70,000 worth of sperm oil to Great Britain.

Another Revolutionary Patriot Gone.—Died, in Boston, on Saturday last, Mr. William Pierce, aged 35 years one of the few survivors of the celebrated Boston Tea Party of '75, and a pensioner of the Revolution.

* * The favor of D. M. S. of Talahassee, was duly received, and we will assure him, that his kindness and exertion is one of the best commentaries, on the fraternal affection we profess one to another. We shall send his copy only, until we hear from him.

The interest on the national debt of Great Britain is now a little more than £29,000,000 per annum.

What Next.—At Baltimore, a Mr. Chana has been committed to jail for trial for marrying his step daughter.

SINGULAR DEATH.—Died in Waltham, Mass. Mr. William Bellis, aged 25 years. His disease was singular and distressing. Several physicians made a post mortem examination, and neither they, nor those in charge of the General Hospital at Boston, where he had been kept for some time, till within three weeks of his death, could name the disorder in any class of known diseases. The whole system, internally and externally, even the brain, liver and heart, were filled with tumors, from the size of a hen's egg to that of a mustard seed.—Christian Freeman.

Negroes Executed.—Henry and Don Louis, two slaves belonging to Mr. Augustine Guedry, of the parish of Lafayette, and connected in the late attempt at insurrection, have been apprehended, tried, found guilty and executed.

Joviality in the Highlands.—Every mortal is weary of listening to the accounts of the melancholy festivities which takes place at Highland funerals, but I could not help being amused to hear that when the three Strathpey lairds set out to attend the burial of the late Rothiemurchus, one of them gravely remarked, "How drunk we shall all be at this time to-morrow." At a great chieftain's house where guests used formerly to be over the mast head in claret and champagne but where modern sobriety and decorum have been introduced by the present proprietor; an old Highland laird was heard indignantly muttering to himself as he left the table, "Oich! if this isn't the first time she dined at Castle Grant, and was able to go up the stairs by herself." I was shocked to hear that an old clergyman, well known for his convivial propensities, who died last year, wishing his funeral to become peculiarly jovial, bequeathed a large stock of claret for his friends to finish on the occasion, and his old boon companions, standing in a circle round the grave, filled their glasses to his memory, and afterwards poured a share of the contents of the earth beneath which he was interred."

Extraordinary Circumstance.—We learn that Mr. John Mackintire, chief engineer of the steamship Britannia, has made three passages across the Atlantic Ocean in less than two months—of which time he remained in port eighteen days. The number of days occupied on the passages was thirty-nine, or about thirteen each. He performed the passage from Boston to Liverpool and returned, after remaining in Liverpool six days (from 13th to 19th Sept) in one month and two days.—Aurora.

HORTICULTURE.—Mr. S. B. Williams, late merchant of Albany, but now (with Mr. V. Roth.) in occupancy of the Brewster Farm in German Flats, having this season devoted considerable attention to its Vegetable Garden of about three-fourths of an acre, is estimated to have raised on this small spot 400 bushels of Sugar Beets, and 600 bushels of Carrots, beside a large amount of Cucumbers, Onions, Squashes, &c. too numerous to name. Meanwhile, the regularity and perfect neatness of the plot is of itself an interesting sight to look upon.—Lit. Falls Enterprise.

Arithmetic and Pan Cakes.—The Germantown Telegraph states, that an arithmetician in that place, has figured up, and found that not less than five millions five hundred and forty-seven thousand buckwheat cakes were destroyed by the late frost. Bad news for lovers of slap-jacks.

Oliver Ames of West Bridgewater, Mass. commenced life by making a dozen shovels, which he took to market in a wagon. He now owns three extensive factories at Easton, Braintree and West Bridge water—employs sixty workmen, and has four teams to carry his shovels to market. His profits are $20,000 annually.

CURIOUS BONNET.—A Bonnet is now exhibiting at the Institution in Niblo's Garden; New York, made of Melon seed. It contains 876 seeds and 17,776 stitches, each taken with a needle! This is a monument of both patience and industry.—Troy Mail.

POETRY.

A SCENE IN A PRIVATE MAD HOUSE

BY M. G. LEWIS, ESQ.

"Stay, gaoler, stay, and hear my woe!
She is not mad who kneels to thee,
For what I'm now, too well I know.
And what I was, and what should be.
I'll rave no more in proud despair,
My language shall be mild, though sad;
But yet I'll firmly, truly swear,
I am not mad! I am not mad!

My tyrant husband forged the tale
Which chains me in this dismal cell,
My fate unknown my friends bewail—
Oh! gaoler, haste that fate to tell!
Oh! haste my father's heart to cheer;
His heart at once 'twill grieve and glad,
To know, though kept a captive here,
I am not mad! I am not mad!

He smiles in scorn, and turns the key!
He quits the grate! I knelt in vain!
His glum'ring lamp still, I see!
'Tis gone—and all is gloom again!
Cold, bitter, cold—no warmth! no light!
Life, all thy comforts once I had!
Yet here I'm chained this freezing night,
Although not mad! no! no! not mad!

'Tis sure some dream! some vision vain!
What! I, the child of rank and wealth:
Am I the wretch who clanks this chain,
Bereft of freedom, friends and health?
Ah! while I dwell on blessings fled,
Which never more my heart must glad,
How aches my heart! how burns my head!
But 'tis not mad! no, 'tis not mad!

Hast thou, my child, forgot, ere this,
A mother's face, a mother's tongue?
She'll ne'er forget your parting kiss,
Nor round my neck how fast you clung;
Nor how with me you sued to stay,
Nor how that suit your sire forbade;
Nor how—I'll drive such thoughts away—
They'll make me mad! they'll make me mad!

His rosy lips, how sweet they smiled!
His mild blue eyes, how bright they shone!
None ever bore a lovelier child!
And art thou now forever gone?
And must I never see thee more.
My pretty, pretty little lad
I will be free! unbar the door
I am not mad! I am not mad!

Oh, hark! what mean those dreadful cries!
His chain some furious madman breaks!
He comes! I see his glaring eyes!
Now, now my dungeon grate he shakes
Help! help!—He's gone! Oh! fearful woe,
Such screams to hear, such sights to see
My brain! my brain! I know I know,
I am not mad—but soon shall be:

Yes, soon:—For, lo or while I speak—
Hark how yon demon's eyeballs glare!
He seizes me—now, with dreadful shriek,
He whirls a serpent high in air.
Horror! the reptiles strikes his tooth
Deep in my heart, so crushed and sad!
Ay, laugh, ye fiends! I feel the truth!
Your task is done!—I'm mad! I'm mad!"

ROBIN AND ANNA.

The following beautiful stanza are by Knowles.
She listens—"Tis the wind, she cries,
The moon that rose so full and bright,
Is now o'ercast—she looks, she sighs,
She fears 'twill be a stormy night.

Not long was Anna wed. Her mate,
A fisherman, was out at sea;
The night is dark, the hour is late,
The wind is high—and where is he?

Oh! who would love, Oh! who would wed
A wandering fisherman, to he
A wretched, lonely wife, and dread
Each breath that blows, when he's at sea.

Not long was Anna wed. One pledge
Of tender love her bosom bore:
The storm comes down! the billows rage!
Its father is not yet on shore!

Oh! who would think her portion blest,
A wandering seaman's wife to be,
To hug the infant to her breast,
Whose father's on a stormy sea!

The thunders burst; the lightning falls;
The casement rattles with the rain;
And as the gusty tempest bawls,
The little cottage quakes again.

She doesn't speak; she doesn't sigh;
She gazes on her infant dear—
A smile lights up the cherub's eye,
Which dims its mother's with a tear!

Oh! who would be a seaman's wife!
Oh! who would bear a seaman's child;
To tremble for her husband's life!
To weep—because her infant smiled!

Ne'er hast thou borne a seaman's boy—
Ne'er had thy husband left the shore—
Thou ne'er hadst felt the frantic joy,
To see—thy Robin at the door!

To press his weather-beaten cheek,
To kiss it dry and warm again,
To weep the joy thou could'st not speak—
So pleasure's in the debt of pain!

Thy cheerful fire, thy plain repast,
Thy little couch of love I ween,
Were ten times sweeter than the last—
And not a cloud that night was seen.

O happy pair! the pains you know
Still hand in hand with pleasure come
For often does the tempest blow,
And Robin still is safe at home!

A TOUCH AT THE TIMES.

Happy the man in times like these,
Who trims his sails to every breeze,
To every gale still veering;
Who to promote his private ends,
Won't scruple to desert his friends,
Still by his interest steering.

O! could I trim with trimming men,
I'd turn and turn again,
With every change still trimming;
Like Bray's fam'd vicar, I would ride
Forever with the strongest side,
Still with the current swimming.

And should intrusive conscience still
In secret goadings thwart the will,
Like him, I'd bravely doff it;
Leave fame and honor far behind,
Though dear to every noble mind,
And barter all for profit.

What's honor's proud and crusty creed,
To him who stands of cash in need,
Or him in search of place?
What's independence to a mind
To wise servility inclin'd,
And fearless of disgrace:

What virtue dwells in empty fame?
And what's the value of a name,
To any but a novice?
What's reputation, friendship, pride,
Compar'd with fortune's flowing tide
With party, power and office?

The pliant Patriot, trimming tribe,
Who wisely take the official bribe
To better their condition:
Now sweeping for the pop'lar gale,

All former friends and creeds assail,
And curse the opposition.

DOMESTIC ECONOMY.

To CLEAN CHIMNEYS.—The top of each chimney should be furnished with a pot somewhat in the shape of a bell, underneath the centre of which should be fixed a pulley, with a chain of sufficient length for both ends to be fastened, when not in use, to nails or pins in the chimney, out of sight, but within reach from below. One or both of these ends should be adapted to the reception of a brush or any appropriate construction; and thus chimneys may be swept as often as desired, by servants, with very little additional trouble.

To preserve furs.—When laying up muffs and tipets for the summer, if a tallow candle be placed on or near them, all danger of caterpillars will be obviated.

To raise water in all situations.—The finest springs may be formed by boring, which is performed in the simplest manner, by the mere use of an iron rod, forced into the earth by a windlass. The workmen in a few days get to a genuine spring of pure water, fit for every purpose. After the water is found, they merely put tin pipes down the aperture, and it preserves a fine stream which sometimes rises from four to five feet high.

To boil potatoes mealy.—Select them of uniform size and pour over them cold water, in an uncovered pot just sufficient to cover them. When this first water nearly boils, pour it off, and replace it with a similar quantity of salted cold water. They will thus be mealy, and not cracked. The prongs of a fork will prove when they are done.

To preserve potatoes.—Large quantities may be cured at once, by putting them into a basket as large as the vessel containing the boiling water will admit, and then just dipping them a minute or two at the utmost. The germ, which is so near to the skin, is thus killed without injuring the potatoe; and in this way several tons might be cured in a few hours. They should then be dried in a warm oven, and laid up in sacks or casks, secure from the frost, in a dry place.

ADDRESS

Delivered in commemoration of the Anniversary of St. John the Baptist, on Wednesday, 24th June, A. L. 5840.

Before the Companions and Brethren of Washington Chapter, No. 13, and Memphis Lodge, No. 91.

By J. H. McMahon, Grand Scribe of the State of Tennessee.

Nineteen centuries ago, the eyes of every people in the East were turned with an intent and solemn earnestness towards Palestine, in expectation of events, which in their stupendous nature were to affect, as with the heavings of an earthquake, all the nations of the world. The whisper had spread, as if conveyed upon the subtle wings of the air, that about this time should appear that Mighty Deliverer of the Hebrews, whose coming had been foretold by their inspired Seers whilst yet the sin-blighted earth was in its infancy: the majesty and power of whose Universal Dominion had been the theme of their prophets and poets from the earliest dawn of their existence as a nation;—inspiring them, by the anticipation of His glory and magnificence, with an unearthly fortitude under their adversities—and infusing into their hearts, even amid captivity and bondage, the exultant and undoubting confidence that the day would come, when the sceptre of Judah should be exalted over all lands, and every tongue and kindred under the whole heavens be subject and tributary to the chosen people of God. The time was near at hand for the long-promised redemption; and the failing flame which grew pale with fear on the altars of paganism—and the notes of alarm which were muttered by the heathen oracles over the earth,* told that the generation of that day were upon the verge of the tremendous epoch, so fraught with influences upon the destinies of both Jew and Gentile. The Hebrew shepherd, as he tended his flocks upon the mountains of Zion,—now shrouded in the bondage of the Caesars,—mused over the promises handed down by the gray fathers of his nation to the seed of Abraham, and joyed in the belief that a greater than Moses, or Joshua, or Maccabeus, would arise in his day, under whose victorious banner his people should again wield the sword and the spear and the instruments of death, against the enslavers of his land;—while the imperial, and all-conquering Roman watched, in trembling and in fear, for the coming of that Saviour-Hero of a despised tributary, whose uprising was to be the knell of his glory and power.

While all minds were thus agitated, there appeared in the wilderness of Judea, JOHN THE BAPTIST—a man marked by the strange solemnity of his deportment, and the mysterious earnestness of his language, as a being set apart for the fulfillment of a higher destiny than had yet distinguished any of the dwellers upon earth, even in that land of wonders and of miracles. "His raiment was of camel's hair; a leathern girdle was about his loins; and his meat was locusts and wild honey. And he came into all the country about Jordan, preaching the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins"—heralding himself as that "Prophet of the Highest," whose voice crying in the wilderness, "prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight," should usher in the advent of that "Mightier One," the latchet of whose shoes he was not worthy to stoop down and unloose. And eloquently did the effects produced upon his auditors attest his claim to the sublime character of FORERUNNER to the long promised Messiah, whose coming he announced to be near at hand; for, as if moved by a common impulse of the Spirit from on high, "there went out to him all the land of Judea, and they of Jerusalem, and all the region round about Jordan, and were baptized of him in the river Jordan, confessing their sins." To the haughty and self-righteous Pharisee and Sadducee, this preacher of a new religion than had yet been promulgated to the world, spoke with the stern authority of one who perceived the hypocrisy and corruption of their hearts with the glance of inspiration, and was constrained by the character of his high and solemn mission, to rebuke and denounce their pride and vain glory. "Think not," said he to these sects, "to say within yourselves that we have Abraham to our father; for I say unto you that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham—bring forth, therefore, fruits meet for repentance!"

To the people he said—"He that hath two coats, let him impart to him that hath none; and he that hath meat, let him do likewise." To the publicans—"Exact no more than what is appointed you;" and to the soldiers—"Do violence to no man, neither accuse any one falsely, and be content with your wages."—Such were the efficacy and power of his doctrines—doctrines, novel alike for their unwonted purity when contrasted with the teachings of the synagogue, and for the lofty authority with which they were pronounced—that his hearers mused in their hearts whether he were not the Christ of whom their fathers and the prophets had spoken. But with an unpretending humility, and an honest frankness which rejected the self-deception of his countrymen, he answered them—"I am not the Christ: I indeed have baptized you with water unto repentance; but there cometh One mightier than I after me, who shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire." Among, but not of the men of his generation,—commanding with them but to instruct them in the mystery of the stupendous event which was about to transpire—he moved forward in the discharge of the high functions of his ministry, with a profound seriousness, which carried upon it the indisputable impress of his divine legation.

At length the fullness of the time was arrived.—"And there were in the same country, shepherds abiding in the field, keeping watch over their flocks by night. And lo! the Angel of the Lord came upon them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them, and they were sore afraid. And the Angel said unto them: 'Fear not: for behold I bring ye good tidings of great joy, which shall be unto all people.—For unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord. Ye shall find the babe lying in a manger.' And suddenly there was with the Angel a multitude of the heavenly hosts, praising God, saying—

'Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace! Good will towards men!'

And the shepherds came with haste even unto Bethlehem, and found Mary and Joseph, and the babe lying in the manger."

Let us follow this extraordinary man beyond this miraculous ratification of his claim to a divine mission. His whole life, from his first appearance in the wilderness of Judea to the hour of his death in a dungeon of Gallilee, is a bright and glorious illustration of the pure doctrines which he preached. Calm, and patient, and steadfast in the work of his master, he went about promulgating the sublime mysteries of the New Dispensation—breaking off with the "gavel" of his inspired eloquence the "rough corners" of the Jewish prejudices of his hearers, and fitting them as living materials in that spiritual blessing about to be erected, whose chief corner-stone was to be Christ the blessed Redeemer. With a persevering fixedness of purpose which nothing could shake, and a serene and firm intrepidity of soul which the fiercest persecutions could not intimidate, he held fast to his integrity amidst the gloom of the prison into which he had been cast for his religion's sake. True and faithful, and regardless of the worldly wealth, honors, or power of those he came to exhort unto repentance, he sacrificed his life by reproving iniquity in high places. Yet such was the power of his goodness, that the proud tetrarch by whom he was imprisoned, respected him, and feared the influence which the purity of his doctrines and the unblameableness of his life had given him over the people. The order for his death was procured by Herodias through artifice, and executed while the bosom of him who gave it—although his enemy and persecutor—was torn with anguish and remorse for the bloody sacrifice her malicious hate demanded.

Such, my respected audience, companions and brethren is an imperfect and hasty sketch of the life, ministry and death of ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST; whose anniversary as an eminent patron of our Order, we have met this day to celebrate. Nor we alone. In the far-off hands of the East, where the broken altars of primitive Christianity have been rebuilt in our day, by the pious hands of self-sacrificing Missionaries of our own country;—upon the very sites where erst stood the gorgeous temples reared to the worship of the pagan gods of Asia;—in the wide dominions of Europe, and upon the parched wastes of Africa;—beneath the shadow of the Cordilleras, and in the Isles which gem the seas: In a word, in every country under heaven, in which has been planted the standard of the Cross, there is this day assembled the "brotherhood of the faithful," to render a grateful tribute of respect to him who was the Morning Star to that Great Light "which lighteneth every man that cometh into the world."—On this day is kept, throughout all Christendom, the Anniversary of St. John the Baptist. On this day—perhaps at this very hour—the designs which he has left upon our moral "tresselboard," are being exhibited to the craft in more than ten thousand congregations of our Order. Need I my companions and brethren, exhort you to the contemplation and observance of these designs, or point your attention to each minute department of the work which he has left us to do? I cannot deem it necessary. There is, to the mind of every well-informed companion and brother,—in the symbols and implements with which he is invested,—an abiding and more eloquent exhortation than any words which I could utter. He has learned but little of the spirit and essence of our institution, who has not found every stage of his progress crowded with incitements to the performance of those great duties "to God, to our neighbors and ourselves," which were so well inculcated, both in precept and example, by our ancient patron. From the lambkin which constantly admonishes the novice of that purity of life and conduct which are so essentially necessary to his gaining admittance into the Celestial Lodge above, to the Key-Stone of the Royal Arch which spans the summit of Ancient Freemasonry, the road traveled by the intelligent mason is thickly set with mute preachers of the divine morality of St. John, whose eloquent teachings, I am persuaded, you cannot and will not disregard.

It has been customary, my respected audience, for those who occupy the place to which I have been called on the present occasion, by the kind partiality of my brethren, to say something in regard to the antiquity, nature objects of Freemasonry. I would that I were sufficiently skilled in the work of my profession to answer the expectation which, I doubt not, this usage has created in your minds, as satisfactorily as I could desire. The result of such research, however, as I have been able to give the subject, is submitted to you with much diffidence; in the hope that the imperfections of the effort will receive at your hands, that charitable indulgence which I know will be extended by my companions and brethren.

In attempting to evolve a History of Freemasonry, we are met at the threshold by difficulties, arising out of the very nature of things, which no other historian has to encounter. He who chronicles the rise and fall of kingdoms and empires, has a mine of materials at his command in the written and imperishable re-cards of the times he would pourtray. Theories, sects and religions, from the aggressive and proselyting spirit which ever animates their disciples, leave an impress upon the times in which they exist, which the lapse of centuries cannot obliterate. All along the highway of the Past, there are thickly strewn the footprints of the things which have been—stamped in the crimson records of desolating war—or chiseled on the storied monument—or traced on the tell-tale parchment—to which the historian may turn for materials, out of which to weave the web of the world's eventful story. It is not so in regard to Freemasonry. Essentially not an intermeddling institution;—receiving none into its communion but those who freely, voluntarily, and without solicitation, ask admission to its benefits and privileges; keeping, through a long succession of ages, no records of its achievements, but the "attentive ears, the silent tongues, and the faithful breasts" of its votaries; transmitting its tenets and its laws from one generation to another, solely through the medium of oral tradition—the archives of nations furnish few or no materials of its existence, save in the persecutions it has endured from the jealousy of tyrannic power, the intolerance of corrupt priestcraft, and the bigotry of bloated superstition. It is not wonderful, therefore, that its early history should be uninitiated as a sealed book; which even the "masters in our Israel" find too feebly illuminated by the dim twilight of Tradition, to read with accuracy and precision.

The earliest period at which we have the authentic evidence of the establishment of masonry in England, is in the 10th century, during the reign of King Athelstane. A record of the society, written in the reign of Edward IV., and preserved by Elias Ashmole, the founder of the Oxford Museum, (copies of which are still extant) after speaking of the encouragement given by King Athelstane to the Craft, goes on to say:—"The said King's brother, Prince Edwin, being taught masonry, and taking upon him the charges of a Master Mason, for the love he had to said craft, and the honorable principles whereon it is grounded, purchased a free charter from King Athelstane, for the masons having a correction among themselves (as it was anciently expressed,) or a freedom and power to regulate themselves, to amend what might happen amiss, and to hold a yearly communication and general assembly. Accordingly," we are told by this old manuscript, "Prince Edwin summoned all the masons in the realm to meet him in a congregation at York, who came and composed a general lodge, of which he was grand master; and having brought with them all the writings and records extant,—some in Greek, some in Latin, some in French, and other languages,—from the contents thereof that assembly did frame the constitution and charges of an English Lodge; made a law to preserve and observe the same in all time coming, and ordained good pay for working masons. And," continues the record from which I have quoted, "he made a book thereof, how the craft was founded; and he himself ordered and commanded that it should be read and told when any mason should be made, and for to give him his charges. And from that day until this time, manners of masons have been kept in that form, as well as men might govern."

However much masonic antiquarians may differ as to the time when masonry was introduced into England, all agree that this congregation at York, under the charter obtained by Prince Edwin from King Athelstane, composed the first Grand Lodge held in England; a jurisdiction to which may be traced back through nine centuries, the unbroken chain of authority from which all the lodges in America, and a large portion of those in Europe, have derived their charters. Hence the significant terms, "Ancient York Masons," employed by our Order to designate those who are the true Israelites, from the pretenders of modern origin who have, at various times and in different places, assumed the garb and title of "Free and Accepted Masons."

That masonry was known and established in Great Britain, at least as early as the period I have mentioned, is evident from the records of a few centuries later which have been preserved, and are still extant. A Latin register kept by the Prior of Canterbury, bearing date Anno Domini, 1429, informs us—"that in that year, during the minority of Henry VI., a respectable Lodge was held at Canterbury, under the patronage of Henry de Beke, the Archbishop; at which were present Thomas Stapleton, the master, John Morris warden, with fellow crafts and three entered apprentices," all of which are particularly named. Another record of that time states—"that the company of masons, being otherwise termed free masons, of ancient standing and good reckoning, by means of affable and kind meeting divers times, and as a loving brotherhood use to do, did frequent this mutual assembly in the time of King Henry VI. in the 12th year of his reign. Anno Domini 1434." The same record says that—"The charges and laws of the freemasons have been seen and approved by our late sovereign king, Henry VI, and by the lords of his most honorable council; who have allowed them, and declared that they be right good and reasonable to be holden, as they have been drawn out and collected from the records of ancient times." The terms "ancient standing," and "ancient times," employed in these records, evidently point to a period several centuries anterior to the time when they were written; and furnish a strong corroborative proof of the genuineness of the manuscript preserved by Mr. Ashmole. But the most curious and interesting evidence yet to be exhibited, is a manuscript found by the learned John Locke in the Bodleian Library, and sent by that distinguished scholar to the Earl of Pembroke, then, if I mistake not, Grand Master of England. It is an examination of some of the brotherhood before Edward VI, as to the nature and tendency of the institution, and is entitled—"Certain Questions, with answers to the same, concerning the Mysteries of Masonry, written by Henry VI," and purports to be faithfully copied by John Leylande, an antiquarian scholar appointed by Henry VIII at the dissolution of the monasteries, to search for such books and records as were most valuable. In this examination, stripped of its antique, and in some degree obsolete phraseology, masonry is defined by our brethren of King Henry's time to be—"The science of nature, the understanding of the mysteries thereof, and of her sundry operations; the art of numbers, geometry, regulating weights and measures, and the true manner of fashioning all things for man's use, chiefly dwellings and buildings of all kinds, and all other things that make good to man." It is stated to have "begun with the first men of the East, who were before the first men of the West;" and that it traveled westwardly, "bringing along with it, all comforts to the wild and comfortless."

At what precise period, or by what agency masonry was introduced into England, is a question involved in much obscurity. By some its introduction has been ascribed to the association of foreign architects, patronized by the ecclesiastical authorities of Rome during the dark ages; by others to St. Alban, who suffered martyrdom for the christian faith in the year of our Lord 303. Among those who support the last opinion, is the learned Elias Ashmole, already referred to, (a zealous member of our order, and a distinguished Antiquarian of the 17th century,) who collected many facts in regard to the history of Freemasonry; and who, while he admits that the association of foreign architects alluded to were members of the fraternity, denies that they were the first to bring the art into England. Others again, fix the introduction of masonry into Britain at as late a period as the 6th century; and attribute it to St. Austin, who founded the old Cathedral of Canterbury, and that of St. Paul in London. A fourth class of writers refer its introduction to those followers of Pythagoras who emigrated from Italy to France, and from thence to England. These last have in support of their theory, the legendary history which was current among the fraternity in the 15th century. In the examination already quoted from, before King Henry VI, it is stated by the brethren, in answer to his interrogatories, that it was brought to the west by the Phœnicians, "who being great merchants, came first into Phœnicia, for the convenience of their commercial pursuits, both east and west, by the Red and Mediterranean seas;" and that a Grecian named "Peter Gower"—evidently a corruption of the French "Pythagore," or Pythagoras,—"travelled for the purpose of gaining knowledge, through Egypt and Syria, and every other land in which the Phœnicians had established masonry; where he was initiated in the mysteries of the art, and was thereby greatly improved in knowledge;"—thathis "Peter Gower," or Pythagoras, afterwards went to a Greek colony in Italy and formed a Great Lodge at Crotona, in which he made many masons, some whom removed to France, and there established lodges; from whence, in process of time, the art passed into England." Such is the testimony given to their sovereign, by our brethren of the 15th century. It is evident that their account obtained credence at that period; for it is a matter of history, that Henry VI was so well satisfied of its authenticity, and of the praiseworthy character of the institution, that he united himself with the fraternity,* and from that time forward spared no pains to make himself master of the work. "He," we are told, "perused the ancient charges, revised the constitutions, and honored them with his sanction;"† and this, too, in the face of an un-repealed act of parliament, passed at the instigation of the clergy, during his minority, which suppressed, under heavy penalties, the meetings of the Lodges.—The royal example was followed by many of the nobility; since which time masonry has numbered, among its followers, many of the greatest princes of the earth.

HISTORICAL.

THE DISCOVERY OF HUDSON RIVER.

AND THE VOYAGE OF HENDRICK HUDSON THROUGH THE HIGHLANDS.

I know of nothing more entertaining than the simple narrative of Hendrick Hudson, describing his discovery of that proud river which bears his name, and is the boast of New Yorkers. It was in the month of Sept., in 1609. Much as he admired its spacious bay, and beautiful scenery, and the abundance of fine mullet which its waters supplied, he was not thrown off his guard by this new and enchanting picture, but had no sooner anchored off the then wood-covered shores of Manna-hata, than he adopted, as it were by the instinctive prudence of an Englishman, all the necessary precautions against the treachery of the savages who came in their canoes to visit him. He was indeed forewarned of the necessity of watching them with the utmost vigilance, by what happened to the boat crew which he sent the day after his arrival, September 5, to explore the passage which led to Hell-gate. Colman, who commanded the boat in that notable excursion, was shot in the throat by an arrow from an Indian canoe, somewhere in the neighborhood of that dangerous strait, and his body brought down and buried with proper ceremonies. They related to Hudson that they had gone as far as the open sea, (Long Island Sound) and that the shores of the (East River) were covered with grass and flowers, and goodly trees; and the air perfumed with the sweet smells which blew from them; that they were regaled with dried currants by the natives, and altogether delighted apparently with the appearance of the country, since so beautifully realized in its picturesque scenery of villages and lawns, and parks, and cultivated fields. The natives came on board the ship with maize or Indian wheat, beans, oysters, &c., and were clothed in mantles of fur of panthers. On the 12th, the ship being still anchored in the bay, twenty-eight canoes full of men, women and children, came alongside. Hendrick with the true spirit of enterprise, did not delay his time here, but soon got under weigh, to follow the course of the great river which he saw leading up by the mountain wall of the Palisadoes, far towards the north, and which he little thought then would bear his name, and be the seat of a great city, and the thoroughfare of the world. He remarked the extraordinary passage through the mountains, and those loftier summits which are seen farther from the river, at what is now known as Catskill. Near this latter place, he was visited by several of what he termed Governour [Sachems] of the different tribes that then occupied the banks of the river, all of whom, with their people, he found of friendly disposition, bringing platters of venison, beaver and other skins, and grapes in return, for knives and hatchets. Two young maidens, of about 17, also came on board, with their fathers, and behaved themselves very modestly. To one of the Sachems they poured out such various liberations of wine aquaviate, [brandy] that he became quite intoxicated, much to the astonishment of his brethren, and was thereby obliged to remain several days in the cabin. Hendrick, in witnessing this naval experiment, did not contemplate how much the god of wine would afterwards be worshipped in this part of the empire of Neptune, in the bar-rooms of steamboats, packets, and skippers. On their return through the Highlands, whose many points, narrow channel, and eddy winds he takes notice of, and where he encounters a stiff gale, an accident occurred of a romantic nature. A canoe with one man in it constantly hanging under the stern of the ship, until at length, by the aid of the ruder, he crept into the cabin window, and stole out several Hendrick's shirts and bandeleers; whereupon the mater's mate, says Henry, shot at him and killed him. The rest in the canoes, through fear, jumped into the water, and after Hendrick's men had recovered the stolen goods, one of the Indians, who swimming, caught hold of the boat, and tried to turn it over, "but our cook took a sword, and cut off one of his hands, and he was drowned." The first time that the waters of this limpid river had, by the hand of a white man, drank of the blood of a human victim. Hereafter to be the theatre of many a war exploit, and historical recollection. Its bosom whitened with the canvas of military expedition; its mountain passes echoing to the sound of the bugle, and the roar of artillery the scene of Andre's capture, the storming of Stony Point, &c.

The people of the mountain, says he, came on board wondering at our ships and weapons. But they did not seem to have acquired an adequate notion of the power and advantage which civilized modes of warfare possess over bows and arrows. In the pass of the Highlands, some followed after the ship in canoes, and shot their arrows at her stern, and some hundreds who had collected there, on a point of land, tried their skill at the same exercise, to see what impression they could make upon this strange visitor. "There (says Hendrick) with immitable sang froid I shot a falcon at them, and killed two of them."

Hendrick speaks of the steep precipices of the Highlands conjectured from their bare appearance, that the trees had been blasted, and that they contained metals. It would seem that he thought, in language of alchemy, the chemistry of that day, that the spirit of the metallic substance had "buried," as he expresses it, destroyed the vegetation.

A whitish green color on similar rocks near what is now called Spiten-devil, made him suspect they contained copper and silver. Far above the Highlands, they met with shoals, the overslaugh upon which they several times grounded. Frequently they had wind and rain, though the weather was generally fair and hot, and he observes also that the bottom where they anchored, was often oozy. In the Highlands, they found fine salmon, and somewhere by the town now called after him, they went ashore and gathered chestnuts.

The following account of an attempt, made during the Revolutionary War, to blow up the British vessels of war in New York harbor, may be of interest to most of our readers. It is copied from a New York paper of November, 1821, and is an obituary notice of the gallant soldier who made the daring attempt:

DIED.—At Lyme, (Conn.) on the 29th ult. Captain EZRA LEE, aged 72, a revolutionary officer. When the British fleet lay in the North River, opposite to the city of New-York, and while Gen. Washington had possession of the city, he was desirous to be rid of such neighbors. A Mr. Bushnell, of Saybrook, (Conn.) who had the genius of a Fulton, constructed such a marine machine, of a conical form, bound together with iron bands, within which one person might sit, and with cranks and skulls, could navigate to any depth under water. In the upper part was affixed a vertical screw for the purpose of penetrating ships bottoms, and to this was attached a magazine of powder, within which was a clock, which, on being set to run any given time, would, when run down, spring a gun lock, and an explosion would follow. This Marine Turtle, so called was examined by Gen. Washington, and approved; to preserve secrecy, it was experimented within an inclosed yard, over twenty to thirty feet water, and kept during day-light locked up in a vessel's hold. The brother of the inventor was to be the person to navigate the machine into action, but in sinking it the first time, he declined the service.

Gen. Washington, unwilling to relinquish the object, requested Major General Parsons to select a person in whom he could confide, voluntarily to engage in the enterprise; the latter being well acquainted with the heroic spirit, the patriotism, and the firm and steady courage of the deceased above mentioned, immediately communicated the plan and the offer, which he accepted, observing that this life was at General Washington's service. After practising the machine, until he understood its powers of balancing and moving under water, a night was fixed upon for the attempt. General Washington and his associates in the secret, took their stations upon the roof of a house in Broadway, anxiously awaiting the result. Morning came and no intelligence could be had of the intrepid submarine navigator, nor could the boat which attended him, give account of him after parting with him the first part of the night.

While these anxious spectators were about to give him up as lost, several barges were seen to start suddenly from Governor's Island, (then in possession of the British) and proceed towards some object near the Asia ship of the line—as suddenly they were seen to put about and steer for the Island with springing oars. In two or three minutes an explosion took place, from the surface of the water, resembling a water spout, which aroused the whole city and region; the enemies ship took the alarm—signals were rapidly given—the ships cut their cables and proceeded to the Hook with all possible despatch, sweeping their bottoms with chains, and with difficulty prevented their affrighted crews from leaping overboard.

During this scene of consternation, the deceased came to the surface, opened the brass head of his aquatic machine; rose and gave a signal for the boat to come to him, but they could not reach him, until he again descended under water, to avoid the enemy's shot from the Island, who had discovered him and commenced firing in his wake. Having forced himself against a strong current under water until without the reach of shot, he was taken in tow and landed at the Battery amidst a great crowd, and reported himself to General Washington, who expressed his entire satisfaction, that the object was effected, without the loss of lives. The deceased was under the Asia's bottom more than two hours, endeavoring to penetrate her copper but in vain. He frequently came up under her stern galleries searching for exposed plank, and could hear the sentinels cry. Once he was discovered by the watch on deck, and heard them speculate upon him, but concluded a drifted log had paid them a visit—he returned to her bottom and examined it fore and aft, and then proceeded to some other ships; but the impossibility of penetrating their copper, for want of resisting power, saved the lives of hundreds. The longest space of time he could remain under water was two hours. For a particular description of the submarine curiosity, see Sillman's Journal of Arts and Sciences.—Com. Adv.

CHARACTER.

FAMILY SCENES.

It is not difficult to trace out the true origin of fifty vices, which when full grown, are unceremoniously set down to the account of original sin.

Romping Sally runs against the corner of the table, raises a bump on her head, and of course begins to cry lustily. The mother comes to her assistance.

"Did it hurt its pretty head? What was it hurt my Sally!"

The sobbing child points to the table.

"Was it the table? Beat it well."

Slap! slap on the offending table.

"That will teach it to hurt my Sal another time. Beat the naughty table again. It sha'n't hurt my Sally."

In the meantime Sally's contusion has become less painful, the red eyes are dried, and the child is pacified—at the expense of a practical lesson in revenge.

When Miss Sally, fifteen years afterwards, throws the blame of every mischance or misfortune which her own clumsiness or folly has caused, upon her companions and dependants, simply because she must still have a table to beat, then her ill humor is most logically attributed to the depravity and innate wickedness of the human heart.

The mother's pet, Tommy, has been playing all the morning with his new toys; has broken up his drum to see what was inside of it, and tost his penny trumpet and his windmill into a corner; and now he comes crying to his parent, tired of his play and playthings, and expects her to spend her time in inventing new amusements for him.

"No, I'm busy. The clothes have just come from the washing, and I must put them away. I can't play with you to day, Tommy; indeed I can't."

But Tommy knows better. He has been told fifty times before, that his mother was busy and could not attend to him, and remembered well, that a little teasing gained him the victory. Like a good general, he tried the same manœuvre again.

"Come and play with me, Ma! I don't know what to do. I can't play alone, and Dick won't be home from school till two o'clock."

A fresh denial provokes a second fit of crying, and Tommy's perseverance triumphs. His mother plays at hare and hound with him, makes a cat's cradle for him, tells him ghost stories, and mends his drum, till the clock strikes two. The father comes home, sees no dinner ready, looks for his wife and finds her at the drapery press. "My dear, how is every thing so late to-day?"

"O that teasing Tommy would have me play with him this whole, live-long morning; and I have not been able to do a thing since breakfast."

Thus a petted child's whims are allowed to derange the economy of a whole family; and the good mother never dreams that she is bringing up her favourite to be a selfish, self-important being; a burden to himself, and a plague to society.

Even the odious vice of lying is most unconsciously but most effectually, inculcated by the weakness and inconsistency of parents.

"Frank, you shall not go outside the garden wall again, to play with these dirty boys in the street. I have told you fifty times I would not have it; and I won't. If you ever go again without my leave I'll never speak to you afterwards. I'll sell you to the gypsies, and they may do what they like with you."

They say man would leap over the wall of a paradise, even though it were surrounded by a desert. At any rate, Frank does not choose to be cooped up; so he leaps the garden wall next day, and is the merriest and the noisiest, amongst his rough companions.

His mother finds him. Does she cease all intercourse with her own child, as she promised? Does she sell him to the gypsies, as she said she would?

Yet she expects him, when he grows up, to consider his word, once given, sacred and inviolable. If she detects him in a lie, she wonders how on earth he learnt such wickedness; and were you to suggest that her own example, (at all times more powerful with children than precept) was the cause 'twould be considered an insult never to be forgiven.

No wonder that a man's word goes for so little in this world, and that we must have oaths and pledges upon all occasions. The best friends the lawyers have are ignorant mothers. They bring the more business than all other causes put together.

Domestic Economy.—Some courtiers were talking of their household affairs, and in particular of the wages they gave their servants. One of them observed he gave his maitre d'hotel a hundred pistoles—a second that he allowed his six hundred—"And I," said one, "I go far beyond either of you, for allow mine four thousand francs per annum." At first the whole party were astonished at this exorbitant allowance. At last one of them thought of putting the question do you pay him?" "Oh, no said he.

To separate wax from the impurities of the honey-comb, put the comb into a bag, place it in a kettle of cold water, tying a small stone or other weight to the bag to prevent its floating, and hanging the kettle over a fire. As the water becomes hot, it melts the wax and causes it to rise to the surface, by passing through the pores of the bag, while the impurities remain.

THE LEGENDARY.

THE CLAN MACGREGOR.

The clan Gregor or MacGregor is said to have sprung from Gregor or Gregorious, the third son of Alpin one of the Scottish kings of the eighth century. From this descent their founder, the sect derived their original name of MacAlpine, and they still occasionally receive the appellation of the clan Alpine. From a very ancient period, they appear to have possessed a wide tract of land on the boundary lines of Argyle and Perth shires, around Loch Katrine and the northern end of Loch Lomond. While the strong arm constituted the sole title to property in Scotland, the MacGregors managed matters as well as their neighbors, being sufficiently able and willing to make their hands keep their lands; but when territorial possessions were legally secured by written tenures, the clan imprudently continued to trust to the right of the sword, and thus paved the way for the long train of misfortunes which fell upon them. While they pursued their simple and retired mode of life, the great barons in their vicinity used their court influence to obtain charters over the old MacGregor possessions, and followed up the acquisition of such documentary rights by driving out the true proprietors. The MacGregors habitually and obstinately resisted such encroachments, and their bravery often gained them advantages over their adversaries. But the latter parties had always possession of the royal ear, and what was simply self-defence on the part of the devoted sect, was uniformly misrepresented at court as a headstrong defiance of all proper rule and authority. The natural result of the whole was, that MacGregors became a wild, a lawless, and a broken clan.

This state of things commenced at a very early period. In the reign of Queen Mary, two acts of the Privy Council, dated from Stirling in 1563, gave authority to Sir John Campbell of Glenorchy, and other powerful nobles and barons, to pursue the MacGregors with fire and sword; a commission which the parties concerned fulfilled, no doubt, to the utmost of their ability. But the MacGregors were not a people to be safely or easily suppressed. Oppression had made them all that their enemies had at first falsely called them. Robbed of the best portions of their property, they still retained fastnesses, that could yield them shelter, but not food, more especially as their hunted mode of life prevented them from drawing sustenance in a regular way from the earth. Hence they were compelled to depend in a great measure on predatory forays for the very means of living. Their temper, too, had become embittered, and their passions eager and vehement, so that they were too easily roused to the commission of acts of violence and cruelty, which furnished new and successive pleas for the entailment of further miseries on themselves. In the year 1589, a body of the MacGregors seized and murdered John Drummond of Drummond-ernoch, a forester of the royal forest of Glenartney. The circumstances attending this crime were peculiarly horrible.

Placing the head of the victim before them, the clan swore upon it that they would avow and defend the deed in common. Letters of fire and sword for the space of three years were issued anew against the MacGregors, and all men according to the usual tenor of such documents, were forbidden to entertain or assist any of the sect, or to give them, under any plea whatsoever, either a mouthful of food or a scrap of clothing. Under these terrible denunciations, the MacGregors were only saved by their impregnable fastnesses from utter extinction.

Some few years after these last letters of fire and sword had been issued and put in force, an event occurred, which shows that the persecution inflicted on them had merely the effect of exciting their fierceness to a wilder pitch. The Colquhouns of Luss, a sect holding a large possessions on the western shore of Loch Lomond, had long been at feud with the MacGregors, and, about the period under consideration, the breach was widened by an act committed by Sir Humphrey Colquhoun, laird of Luss, and chief of his clan. Two of the MacGregors being benighted on the Colquhoun territory, entered a house belonging to one of the dependents of the laird of Luss, and sought shelter. Their request was sternly refused, on which they went to a bouthouse, killed a sheep, and made a meal upon the carcass. According to the MacGregor tradition, from which this story derived, the two intruders offered payment for what they had taken. They were seized, however, and carried before Sir Humphrey Colquhoun, who, in the exercise of his power as a feudal baron, condemned them summarily, and executed them. The kindred of the unfortunate men were deeply exasperated by the intelligence of this act, and MacGregor of Glenstrae, the chief of the clan, resolved to revenge their death on the Colquhouns. He assembled a force of nearly four hundred men, and took the way with them to Luss. Before their arrival, the laird of Luss heard of their intention, and hastily collected all the strength at his command. Being joined by parties of the Buchanans, Graham's, and other Lennox men as well as by a band of Dumbarton citizens under the leadership of Tobias Smollett, a magistrate of the town, and ancestor of the famous novelist of the name, Sir Humphrey Colquhoun found himself at the head of a body double the number of the invaders. Glenfruin, or the Vale of Lamentation, situated at a short distance from Luss, was the spot where the two parties met. Had the Colquhouns taken their stand on more favorable ground, the victory would in all probability have fallen to their superior numbers; but the ground was boggy, and a large part of their force consisted of cavalry, which could not act in such a locality with advantage. Hence it was that the MacGregors obtained a decided superiority soon after the contest was begun. The Colquhouns are said to have fought manfully, but they were completely worsted, and a merciless slaughter exercised on them by their adversaries. Sir Humphrey Colquhoun escaped by the activity of his horse. Between two and three hundred of his followers fell on the field or in the flight, while of the MacGregor only a very few were slain.

Besides the ferocity which they are reported to have used to the adversaries who met them fairly hand to hand, a particular and uncalled for act of cruelty was perpetrated by some of the MacGregors at the battle of Glenfruin, if we are to believe the tradition of the country. Near the scene of the contest, a large stone is shown, which receives the appellation of the Lecha-Mhinisteir, the Ministers' Stone. It is said to have derived this name from the murder of a party of students at the spot by one of the MacGregors, a man of great size and strength, named Ciar Mhor, or the Mouse-Coloured. These students had imprudently come to witness the engagement, being most probably on an excursion from Glasgow at the moment. They fell into the hands of the chief of the MacGregors, and were by him committed to the charge of Dugald Ciar Mhor, who savagely butchered them in cold blood. Being afterwards asked by the chief where the youths were, the mouse-coloured barbarian is said to have drawn out his bloody skene-dhu, and exclaimed, "Ask that, and God save me!"—alluding, in the latter words, to the piteous appeals to heaven made by the ill-fated students. Dugald Ciar Mhor's grave is still shown at the church of Fortingal, covered with a large stone. It is but right to say, that another account of the matter frees Dugald Ciar Mhor from the imputation of this crime. He was the immediate and indubitable ancestor of the most celebrated personage who ever bore the name of MacGregor—namely, Rob Roy.

Only one man of note on the side of the Clan Alpine was slain in the Vale of Glenfruin. This was the brother of MacGregor of Glenstrae, whose death-scene is yet marked by a stone, called the Grey Stone of MacGregor. But although the battle was to them almost bloodless, it entailed dire misery otherwise upon the race. Eleven score women, widows of those slain in the engagement on the side of the Colquhouns, attired themselves in deep mourning, and, mounted on white palfreys, appeared before the king, James VI., at Stirling, and demanded vengeance on the heads of the MacGregors. To make the deeper impression on those to whom this supplication was made, each of the petitioners bore on a spear her husband's bloody shirt. Such a spectacle was well calculated to affect the reigning king, who had always shown a heart specially accessible to sights of fear and sorrow. The consequence was, that measures of extreme severity were restored to for the punishment of the MacGregors, in whose favor, no man was found to lift up his voice. By a Privy Council act of date 1603 (the year following the battle) the very name of MacGregor was abolished, a proceeding which has no parallel in the annals of the country. All those who bore the name were commanded, on pain of death, to adopt other surnames, and all who had been concerned in the battle of Glenfruin and other marauding excursions detailed in the act, were forbidden, under the same penalty, to carry any weapon but a pointless knife to eat their victuals. Death was also denounced against any of the race who should meet in greater numbers than four at a time. From time to time, acts of this kind were issued, keeping up the ban against the unfortunate race of Alpine.

The execution of these statutes was assigned to the Earls of Argyle and Athol and their followers, whose territories almost surrounded those of the doomed sept. The Marquis of Huntly also assisted in the fulfilment of the acts against the MacGregors. Stubbornly did the clan resist for a time the enemies by whom they were hemmed in, but at length their chief, Allaster MacGregor of Glenstrae, saw the necessity of bending before the storm. He surrendered, with some of his principal followers, to Argyle, upon the previously stipulated condition of being allowed to leave the country. The chieftain of Clan Alpine was wretchedly betrayed. The promise made to him was kept to the ear, but broken to the sense. He was sent "out of the country"—that is to say, he was sent under a guard across the English border, but he was immediately brought back again to Edinburgh, and thrown into confinement. On the 20th of January, 1604, he was tried, and condemned to death. The sentence, was soon after carried into execution at the Cross of Edinburgh, where several of his chief followers suffered with him. To mark his rank, the chief of Glenstrae was suspended from a higher gallows than that allotted to his friends. Before his death, the chieftain made a confession, which is still extant and which presents a terrible picture of the life "of sturt and strife" led by the race of MacGregor, from the number of feuds in which the chieftain owns to having borne a part.

Though the MacGregors, out of necessity, submitted ostensibly to the edict commanding them to take other names, they nevertheless held firm hold of the fastnesses which they had formerly occupied, and with exertions could expel them from. Though known as their situation might render convenient, by the names of Campbell, Drummond, Graham, or Stewart, they still retained their individuality as a clan in all but the name. They torayed in unison as formerly, and menaced with the general vengeance all who might injure one of their nameless race. They therefore remained much in the same odour as previously, and Charles I. thought proper to renew all the statutes enacted against them by his father.

"Yet," says Sir Walter Scott "notwithstanding the extreme severities of James VI. and Charles I. against this unfortunate people, who were rendered furious by prescription, and then punished for yielding to the passions which had been wilfully irritated, the MacGregors to a man attached themselves during the civil war to the cause of the latter monarch." This kept the sore-vexed clan still in a mesh of troubles for a long period, but they in some measure got their reward at the Restoration. Charles II., in the first Scottish parliament after his ascension of the throne annulled the various statutes against them, gave them once more a name, and reinstalled them in all the ordinary privileges of leige subjects, expressly on account of the distinguished loyalty they had shown.

Strange to say, without any known cause, or any plea of renewed violence and lawlessness, William III. recalled into force all the original statutes, making the clan once more "nameless and lawless" in the eye of the law. But things were more peaceful generally throughout the country, and excepting when the clan was raised into an unfortunate notoriety by the acts of Rob Roy, who was born about the times of the Revolution, the clan of MacGregor seems to have been but little disturbed in consequence of their unhappy prominence in the Statute-book. The history of the race from this time forth, excepting as far as regards the renowned freebooter just alluded to, presents no particular events worthy of notice. Up to the very close of the eighteenth century, the MacGregors were legally a nameless clan, in as far as the penal acts, against them still held a place in the Statute-book, though, practically, the law recognised the name, and none of the penal statutes were ever enforced. The British parliament finally abolished all these traces of ancient barbarity. As soon as this boon was conferred on them, the MacGregors showed remaining tokens of a strong feeling of claniship, by acknowledging a head and chief. Eight hundred and twenty-six persons of the name of MacGregor subscribed a deed, admitting John Murry of Lanark, Esq., afterwards Sir John MacGregor, Bart, as lawfully descended of the house of Glenstrae, and the proper and true chieftain of Clan Alpine.

Since this period, the race of MacGregor have bravely served their country by field and flood, and have enjoyed all civil privileges. The present chieftain is Sir Evan John Murry MacGregor of MacGregor, Bart.

THE NATURALIST.

SOCIAL ECONOMY OF A BEE HIVE.

A hive consists of the queen, or mother bee, the workers, varying in number from 10,000 to 20,000, or 30,000 and the males or drones from 700 to double that number.

The queen is the parent of the hive; and her sole province and occupation consists in laying the eggs, from which originate those prodigious multitudes that people a hive, and emigrate from it in the course of one summer. In the height of the season her fertility is truly astonishing, as she lays not fewer than 200 eggs per day, and even more when the season is particularly warm and genial, and flowers are abundant; and this laying continues, though at a gradually diminishing rate, till the approach of cold weather in October.

An opinion has been entertained that the queen is followed in her progress through the hive by a number of her subjects formed in a circle round her, and these, of course, have been regarded as the queen's body guards. The truth is, however, that her bee majesty has no attendants, strictly speaking; but wherever she moves, the workers whom she encounters in her progress instantly and hurriedly clear the way all before, and all turning their heads toward their approaching sovereign, lavish their caresses upon her with much apparent affection, and touch her softly with their antennae; and these circumstances which may be observed every hour in the day, have given rise to the idea of guards. On one occasion we gave her subjects an opportunity of testifying their courage in her defence, as well as their affection and zeal. Observing her laying eggs in the comb next to the glass of the hive, we gently but quickly opened the pane, and endeavored to seize her. But as soon as the removal of the glass afforded room—(while shut it was almost in contact with her back)—and, before we could accomplish our purpose, they threw their bodies upon her to the number of at least a hundred, and formed a cone over her of such magnitude, that she could not be less than two inches distant from any part of the surface. We dispersed the mass with our finger, and got hold of her precious person, and kept looking at her for some minutes before we restored the captive to her alarmed defenders. It is remarkable that this violence was not resented by them; tho' they coursed over our hands in scores, while we kept hold of their mistress, not one individual used its sting. The all engrossing object was the queen.

The mutual aversion of queens is a striking feature in the natural history of this insect. Their mutual enmity may be said to be an inborn disposition with them; for no sooner has the first of the race on a hive about to throw off a second swarm escaped from her own cradle, than she hurries away in search of her rivals, and exerts herself with the utmost eagerness to destroy them.

The workers, to the number of 10,000, 20,000, and even 30,000, constitute the great mass of the population, and on them devolve the whole labor for the establishment. Theirs is the office of searching for and collecting the precious fluid which not only furnishes their daily food, as well as that of their young, and the surplus of which is laid up for winter stores, but also the materials from which they rear their beautiful combs. In the little basket shaped cavity of their hind legs they bring home the pollen or farinaceous dust of flowers, kneaded by the help of the morning dew into tiny balls, which forms an important ingredient in the nourishment of the brood; and also the propolis or adhesive gum extracted from willows, &c. with which they attach their combs to the upper part and sides of the hive, and stop every crevice that might admit the winter's cold.

The natural term of the worker's existence does not extend, we think, beyond six or eight months.

It is the opinion of Dr. Bevan that all the bees brought into existence at the queen's great laying in spring die before winter. But many never reach that period. Showers of rain, violent blasts of wind, sudden changes of atmosphere, destroy them in hundreds. In the clear, cold mornings and evenings of autumn, their eagerness for foraging, entices them abroad early and late; when lighting on the ground, many are chilled and quickly perish. And should they escape the blighting atmosphere at the close of autumn, a bright sunshine in a winter day, when the ground perhaps is covered with snow, brings them abroad in multitudes, and the half of them never return.

The sole office of the male, or at least the primary one is to pair with the queen. He is father of the hive. Indolent and luxurious, he takes no part in the internal operations of the domicile, and never leaves it with a view of sharing in the labors of the field. When he does venture abroad it is only in the finest weather, and during the warmest part of the day. He is easily distinguished from the workers by his larger size, by his heavy motion in flight, and by his loud humming sound. His life is extremely short.

MISCELLANY.

FECUNDATION OF VEGETABLES.

From the "Object Pleasures, and Advantages of Science."

The lightness of inflammable gas is well known.—When bladders, of any size, are filled with it, they rise upwards, and float in the air. Now, it is a most curious fact ascertained by Mr. Knight, that the fine dust, by means of which plants are impregnated one from another, is composed of very small globules, filled with this gas—in a word, of small air balloons.—These globules thus float from the male plant through the air, and striking against the females, are detained by a glue prepared on purpose to stop them, which no sooner moistens the globules than they explode, and their substance remains, the gas flying off, which enabled them to float. A provision of a very simple kind is also, in some cases, made to prevent the male and female blossoms of the same plant from breeding together, this being found to injure the breed of vegetables, just as breeding in and in does the breed of animals. It is contrived that the dust shall be shed by the male blossoms before the female is ready to be affected by it, so that the impregnation must be performed by the dust of some other plant, and in this way the breed be crossed. The light gas with which the globules are filled is most essential to the operation, as it conveys them to great distances. A plantation of yew trees has been known, in this way, to impregnate another several hundred yards off.

A CASE OF CONSCIENCE.

"Friend Broadbrim," said Zephaniah Straitlance to his master, a rich Quaker of the city of Brotherly Love, "thou canst not eat of that leg of mutton at thy noon-tide meal to day."

"Wherefore not?" asked the good Quaker.

"Because the dog that appertaineth to that son of Belial, whom the world calls Lawyer Foxcraft hath come into thy pantry and stolen it—yea, and hath eaten it."

"Beware, friend Zephaniah, of bearing false witness against thy neighbor. Art thou sure it was friend Foxcraft's domestic animal?"

Yea, verily I saw it with my eyes, and it was lawyer Foxcraft's dog; even Pinch'em."

Upon what evil times have we fallen!"—sighed the harmless secretary as he wended his way to his neighbors office. "Friend Gripus," said he, "I want to ask thy opinion."

"I am all attention," replied the scribe, laying down his pen.

"Supposing, friend Foxcraft, that my dog had gone into my neighbors pantry, and stolen therefrom a leg of mutton, and I saw him, and could call him by name, what ought I to do?"

"Pay for the mutton—nothing can be clearer."

"Know thou, friend Foxcraft, thy dog, even the beast men denominate Pinch'em, hath stolen from my pantry a leg of mutton, of the just value of four shillings and six-pence, which I paid for it in the market this morning."

"O well; then it is my opinion that I must pay for it;" and having done so, the worthy friend turned to depart.

"Tarry yet a little, friend Broadbrim," cried the lawyer. "Of a verity, I have yet farther to say unto thee. Thou owest me nine shillings for advice."

"Then, verily I must pay thee, and it is my opinion that I have touched pitch, and been defiled."

SAM JONSON'S DEFINITION OF POLITICAL PRINCIPLE.—Sam Jonson and Pete Gombo met "promiscuously," as Mrs. Malaprop would say, last evening. After each had touched his beaver in the manner prescribed by etiquette, and gone through a few salutary phrases, Pete Gombo entered at once upon weighty matters.

"Sam," said Pete, "you is de only one in de wide circulation ob my acquaintances what seems to comprehend knowledges and de sciences."

Sam—You pays me a complement dare, Pete, I does'nt desarb, no how; you is now gibin me wat white folks calls de yaller soap. Yaw! yaw! yaw!

Pete—No, Sam, it's right dawn, no mistake; but tell me, dis is de portant question I wants to come at wor's de natur ob dis politereal principler wot white folks be always talkin' bout?

Sam—Well, look hea, Pete, guess you has got dis child at last; de truf is I has gibed dat question a great deal ob consideration, but neber could get de hang of it. I hab come to de conclusion, however, dat politercal principler is kinder ob a sorter ob shin-plaster currency wot dont draw much interest, no how.

Pete—Zackly my 'pinion; your defernition gibs me quite a satisfaction—Pic.

LARGE TREES.

The largest tree in the world is said to be the Adansonia digitata, which is found in Senegal, Egypt and Abyssinia. The trunk is from 20 to 30 feet in diameter, and divides into branches of great size, which spread out drooping at the extremities and form a mass of verdure 150 feet in diameter, and 70 feet in height. The wood is light and soft. And the negroes sometimes hollow out chambers in the trunk and deposit their dead within them, where they become mummies, perfectly dried and well preserved.

A rich banker of Paris happened to be present at the representation of Hamlet, in which Talma, as usual, by the fidelity and force of his delineation drew tears from the whole of his numerous audience. Being questioned by a person sitting near him, who was astonished to perceive that he alone remained unaffected during the most pathetic scene, the banker coolly replied, "I do not cry, because, in the first place, none of this is true; and secondly, supposing it to be true, what business is it of mine?"—La Farel.

CHARITY SERMON.

Dean Swift, of eccentric memory, once preached a sermon at St. Patrick's church, Dublin, the length of which disgusted many of his hearers, which coming to his knowledge, and it falling to his lot soon after to preach another sermon of the like kind in the same place, he took special care to avoid falling into the same error. His text was, "He that hath pity on the poor lendeth to the Lord; that which he hath given will he pay him again." The dean, after repeating his text in a more than commonly emphatic tone, added, "Now my beloved brethren, you hear the terms of this loan; if you like the security, down with your dust." It is worthy of remark that the quietness and brevity of this sermon produced a very large contribution.

TENDENCY OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.
TO PRODUCE LUNACY.

From the London Lunatic Asylum Report.

Of all the causes which, by promoting actions and movements in the living body, disorder the functions of the intellect, the frequent use of intoxicating liquors is the most prolific. It would be well if the law defined the circumstances under which it may be justified to prevent men from effecting their own destruction, and involving their families in misery and ruin. All good legislators have endeavored to oppose the progress of drunkenness. It was proscribed by Solon and Lycurgus at Athens and Lacedæmon. The ancient Saracens, Carthaginians, the Nervii, used no vinous liquor, because it made them effeminate. Amongst the Romans the vice was odious; and the Koran of Mahomet expressly denies wine to the Mussulman. "Wine biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder," says Solomon; and our own unequalled bard declares, that "every inordinate cup is unblessed, and the ingredient is a devil." The immediate effect of wine or spirits on the human frame is to increase the circulation, excite the brain, and, by producing an unusual determination to it, irritate and force it into a series of irregularities. When violent and preternatural accumulation of blood in the vessels of the head keep up this irritation permanently, the intellectual operations become suspended or depraved, and insanity is the final consequence. In constitutions where there is a disposition to insanity or idiotism, the paroxysm will often be brought on by intoxication, and continue for months; remote but certain consequences of the abuse of fermented liquors are the disorder of the stomach and digestive organs, and subsequent disorganization of the liver, and alteration of its secretion. The sympathies of the viscera with affections of the head, and with anxiety of mind, were known to the writers of sacred history, and the remarkable dependence of mental disturbance on a disordered state of the abdominal viscera is now established. A man, about the middle age, who had held respectable situations as a non-commissioned officer, was admitted into the asylum the 13th day of April, 1826; his disorder was of short date, and said to have been produced by frequent intoxication. He was quiet and inoffensive, but thoughtful and dejected; and he asserted that his wife (who had lately died) was always about him, urging him to self-destruction, and requiring him to perform extraordinary acts of expiation for his neglect of her. His case was marked with evident disorder of the digestive organs and hepatic depravity; means were taken to alter and restore these to their healthy action; mercurial purgative and tonic aperients were used with effect, and the recovery of his reason was progressive with the improvement in his abdominal disease. He was discharged from the hospital the 13th of May, perfectly recovered in health and intellect.—When a man is depressed by worldly misfortunes, he will often seek a dissipation of his gloom in the cheering stimulus of wine or spirits, "which carries in its draught the last confusion of thought." To this momentary relief from mental sufferings, a disordered state of the circulation and digestive organs will invariably succeed; which, reacting on the brain, increases the mental agony, and gives it a more severe and acrimonious character. If the practice is persevered in, the weakened digestive faculties cause the permanent disorder of the viscera, and render the determination of blood to the head habitual. The brain becomes more liable to be affected by the stimulus of the mind, and re-acts on it to the aggravation of the original disturbance. Thus common grief, which in health would soon subside, is converted into a compound of cerebral and visceral derangement, aggravated in its progress, frequently uncontrollable by medicine, and which will be likely to terminate in madness.

OTHELLO SAVED FROM SUICIDE.—I was behind Covent Garden stage one evening in my boyhood, when a gentleman made his debut in Othello, Mr. Hull played Gratiano. In the last scene, the new actor, naturally bewildered on such an occasion, had neglected to provide himself with a dagger with which to kill himself; and before he recollected this oversight, had got as far, in his concluding speech, as—"I took by the throat the circumcised dog," when almost at his wits end for something to "smite him" with, he looked round, saw a drawn sword in Mr. Hull's hand, and snatched it by way of substitute for the weapon he ought to have had. It happened to be a true Toledo, and indeed a very sharp one; and Othello's abruptly seizing it, Mr. Hull, in most benevolent terror and agitation, losing sight of his assumed character, and anxious only for the personal safety of the debutant, rushed forward, seized the rapier, and exclaimed, in his richly energetic, though somewhat tremulous style of voice—"For God Almighty's sake, dont, sir!—it is a real sword!" and the curtain dropped amidst the convulsed laughter of the whole house.—T. Dibdin.

Surprising Property of Oil.—The action of oil, in stopping the violent ebullition of various substances, is truly surprising. It is well known that if a mixture of sugar, honey, or the like, be boiling upon the fire, and in danger of rising over the sides of the vessel, the pouring in of a little oil makes it immediately subside. In many cases the marking a circle round the inside of a vessel, in which a liquor of this kind is to be boiled, with a piece of hard soap, shall, like a magic ring, confine the ebullition to that height, and not to suffer it to stir any further. This is wholly owing to the oil or fat contained in the soap; but there is, besides these, another very important use of oil on a like occasion, which is the pouring a little of it on any metallic solution, while making; this restrains the ascent of the noxious vapors; preserves the operator from danger and at the same time, by keeping down the evaporating matter, gives redoubled strength to the menstruum. Pliny has mentioned an extraordinary effect of oil, in stilling the surface of water when it is agitated with waves and the use made of it, by the divers for this purpose.

A Curious Fact.—The statement of Mr. Wise, the aeronaut, if it be a fact, is a curious one. It is well known that almost every one looking down from a great height, feels affected by vertigo—giddiness of the head—and a sensation of sickening insecurity. But he avers, from repeated experience, that this only occurs when the individual is sitting or standing upon something connected with the ground, even if it be only by a rope, or any other slight communication with the earth. But that entirely isolated from the earth, no such feeling or sensation can be experienced.

Mode of Making Sheet Lead in China.—The Chinese, in manufacturing the thin sheet lead in which their teas are imported into this country, conduct the operation in an exceeding simple manner. The laminae are not rolled, as, from their extreme thinness, might be supposed; not even hammered, as the appearance of the surface might indicate, but actually cast at once in the state in which we see them. Two men are employed; one of them is seated on the floor, with a large flat stone before him, and with a moveable flat stone standing at his side. His fellow workman stands beside him, with a crucible containing the melted lead; and having poured a sufficient quantity on the slab, the other lifts the moveable stone, and placing it suddenly on the fluid lead, presses it out into a flat and thin plate, which he instantly removes from the stone. A second quantity of lead is poured on in a similar manner, and a similar plate formed—the process being carried on with singular rapidity.—The rough edges of the plate are then cut off, and they are afterwards soldered together for use. Mr. Waddell, a Scotchman, who witnessed the operation in China, applied a similar method with great success in the formation of thin plates of zinc, for galvanic purposes.—Cabinet Cyclopaedia.

Swiss Honesty.—A traveller relates that in a town in Switzerland, it is customary for those who have found any thing lost, even money, to affix it to a large crucifix in the church yard; and that there is not an example on record of an article being taken away except by the rightful owner.

A PRESIDENT.—"Pat, do you know what is that they call a President?" "Indade, and dont I sure? It's a fellow that they set up to blackguard and call names, and if he can stand being called a rascal, a fool and tyrant, why then they just put him in President—that's all."

A Spaniard's Idea of the Americans.—A Spaniard was once asked how he liked the Americans. He hesitated a while, but at length declared that he hated them. Upon being urged for his reasons, he answered, "Because they eat vinegar with their veal!"

IMPORTANT FOREIGN NEWS.—The steam ship Acadia, Capt. Miller, arrived at Boston, on Sunday last, from Liverpool, bringing important intelligence. Our limits only enable us to give a bird's-eye view of that which appears to be the most interesting:—The question of peace or war, in Europe, is still in doubt.—Military preparations, are progressing on as large a scale as ever, and the public journals, are any thing but pacific. Mehemet Ali had consented to accede to the treaty of July, but his offer was not listened to; and there was no doubt but that the four powers would compel him to accede to their dictation. Beyroot has been reduced to ashes, after a bombardment of nine days, and the Egyptians had evacuated the town, which was in possession of the allies. A firman deposing Mehemet Ali, had been communicated to his Highness, by the Consuls General, of the four powers, who instantly struck their flags, and retired aboard their shipping. Ten thousand additional troops, have been ordered to embark at Constantinople for Cyprus. The Jena, manned with 750, and the Scipio, with 670 men, have sailed for the Levant. These two ships are destined to reinforce the French Mediterranean fleet.—Several other vessels with troops have been despatched on similar errands. From China, the news is important. Intelligence had been received by the way of Calcutta, of the total destruction of the forts of the Boca Tigris, by the English vessels. The expedition was making preparation to raze Canton to the ground. The Princess Augusta, of England, died on the 25th of September, aged 78. There has been a dreadful fire at Davenport, Eng. which resulted in the partial destruction of the Royal Naval Arsenal, and property to the amount of nearly half a million. Many naval relics, of much national pride were destroyed. The flag under which Nelson, fought at Trafalgar, was burnt together with the flag of lord Exmouth, at Algiers.—The trial of Louis Napoleon had been nearly concluded, and the Attorney General had demanded the application of the "Penal Code, which enjoin the punishment of death for such an offence." The young Prince was ably defended, and his fate could not be predicted with any certainty. Madame Laffarge, had been convicted and sentenced to the pillory and hard labor for life. The King of Holland has abdicated his throne in favor of his son. It is said that the cause for laying aside his crown, arises from a wish to retire to private life, and unite himself with one of the ladies of his court in which he has heretofore been strongly opposed. [Very sensible indeed.]

The St. Louis Bulletin says it was reported at Bellevue that a fight had taken place between a band of some 500 Sioux and one or 200 Pottawatamies. One Sioux and two Pottawatamies were killed. The latter performed the scalp dance over the body of the dead Sioux.

SINGULAR OCCURRENCE.—The Boston Transcript, relates an extraordinary accident, which has lately happened in Pittsfield. Dr. Davis while lecturing on chemistry, at that place, by some means inhaled some concentrated sulphuric acid. Soon afterwards he was unable to breathe through his mouth or nose, and an incision had to be made into his windpipe; by which means he has been enabled to breathe, although faint hopes are entertained of his recovery. The Dr. is president of the medical school, and professor of chemistry, in the Berkshire school.

The Article on our first page, from our esteemed brother of Memphis, is commended to the attention of the brethren at large, as embracing much historical research, connected with the early origin of the Institution, as well as its practical adaptation to our various wants. We shall conclude it next week.

BRAHAM.—This celebrated vocalist, perhaps the greatest the world ever produced, arrived in the President on Sunday with his family. He was engaged by Placide, in London, to perform at the Park Theatre, to commence early in December.

The cargo of the Spanish bark Rosini, which was picked up by the wreckers under such mysterious circumstances, and taken into Nassau, N. P., is valued at $190,000. Nothing has as yet transpired to unravel the mystery which surrounds her.

We are much obliged to our "cousin" of the Microscope, for extracting our article in relation to the reconciliation of the order of the I.O.O.F. but we are not obliged to him for the abominable blunder in making us say that we "rejoiced in the almost entire ruin of the disaffected." Such a sentiment would not be very brotherly. "RETURN" would have read better.

LIBERALITY.—The Treasurer of the Bunker Hill Association, acknowledges $10,000 as a donation, from Amos Lawrence, Esq.

Intelligence.

Daring Robbery.—The store of Mr. E. P. Lescente jeweller, at the southeast corner of Market and Third st., was entered sometime yesterday between the hours of 11 A. M. and 6 P. M. and goods to the amount of $13,000 stolen therefrom. A boy who sleeps there at night had his suspicions excited when on attempting to get into the store on Sunday afternoon, he found the key-hole obstructed on the inside. He immediately went in search of his employer who, after various attempts at different places, obtained admission by cutting through the floor, when the full extent of the robbery was made evident.—U. S. Gazette.

Fatal Accident.—A young woman, aged 19 years, wife of Mr. James Raymond, of Ponds, in this town came to her death, last Sunday morning under most agonizing circumstances. An acquaintance was in the house at the time, who was requested by Mr. Raymond to examine the lock of a gun which was out of order. He took the gun, being informed that it was not loaded, pointed it to the fire place and snapped it, without its going off; but as he was snapping it a second time, the unfortunate female unknowingly placed herself before the gun to attend to some culinary duty, when the whole contents were discharged into her leg. A surgeon was immediately called, but before he could return to procure his instruments, she bled to death.—Plymouth Rock, Oct. 10.

ASTHMA.—A friend informs us, says the Floridian, that a gentleman of South Carolina has been cured of the Asthma of many years standing, by the use of the root of the cottonplant, green or black seed. A strong decoction of the root; a tumbler full to be drank three times a day.

Frozen Potatoes.—When potatoes are frozen, soak them for three hours in cold water before cooking them. If they are frozen very hard, dissolve a quarter of an ounce of salt pretre to every peck, add it to the water. Frozen potatoes will yield more flour for starch than fresh ones. That flour, with as much wheat flour, some butter; sugar, yeast, and currants, will make excellent "tea bread," which will keep a month.

Melancholy Accident.—Mr. Simeon Nutting aged 38 years, of Groton, Mass., was suddenly killed under the following circumstances. While looking at the operation of the machinery in Mr. Howe's mills, he lost his balance, was precipitated into the wheel pit, and was immediately killed. He was respected by a numerous circle of relations and friends who mourn his untimely death.—[Lowell Adv.]

POETRY.

MASONIC ODE.

TUNE—Indian philosopher.—Quick Time.

Hail! Masonry, thou craft divine,
Where nature's besutious arts combine—
With sciences to unfold:
The glories and the bliss of heaven,
Th' man whose image God has given—
A form of finest mould.

Atheists may seek the wond'rous cause,
Why craftsmen urg'd by craftsmen's laws—
Oppose all arts in vain;
An architect has form'd a plan,
That reason governs godlike man,
On nature's glorious scene.

Our lodge shall ride on reason's laws,
And reason tell the wond'rous cause—
Why man by God forgiven:
Here various sects as one combine,
Lead captive love in chains divine—
On earth a mason's heaven.

Thus spake the trumpet of the Lord,
And angels with attention heard—
Through heaven's ethereal spheres;
The architect wand for earth
First gave to masonry a birth—
To dry the orphan's tears.

The widow shall not sigh unheard,
But as by oil on Aaron's beard—
Choice blessings were bestow'd;
A mason's love shall soothe her grief,
A mason's hand bestow relief—
The holiest gift of God.

There Eden's blooming garden bow'd,
While in the East the master stood.
Euphrates cease'd to flow:
Havilah's precious bdellium shone,
Her sons brought forth the onyx stone—
As gift of riches glow.

Gihon the land where Moses stood,
Proclaim'd the power of Israel's God—
A mason's rod behold:
Hiddekel spread her eastern charms,
Chose the embrace of masons arms—
And three in one revealed.

Join masons, join in sign and word,
The East is guarded by the sword—
Of flames and cherubims:
Science, her joyous lights reveal,
The cordial every wound shall heal—
We praise the King of kings.

NIGHT.

BY NEALE.

'Tis dark abroad. The majesty of night
Bows down superbly from her utmost height.
Stretches her starless plumes across the world,
And all the banners of the wind are furled.
How heavily we breathe amid such gloom!
As if we slumber'd in creation's tomb.
It is the noon of that tremendous hour,
When life is helpless, and the dead have power.
When solitudes are peopled—when the sky
Is swept by shady wings, that, sailing by,
Proclaim their watch is set; when hidden rills
Are chirping on their course; and all the hills
Are bright with armor; when the starry vests
And glittering plumes, and fiery twinkling crests
Of moon-light sentinels, are sparkling round;
And all the air is one rich, floating sound.
When countless voices in the day unheard,
Are piping from their haunts; and every bird
That loves the leafy wood, and blooming bower,
And echoing cave, is singing to her flower.
When watery tunes are richest—and the call
Of wandering streamlets, as they part and fall

Is foaming melody, is all around—
Like fairy harps beneath enchanted ground.
Sweet, downy, distant music! like the breath
Of airy flutes that blew before an infant's death.
It is that hour of quiet ecstasy,
When every ruffling wind that passes by
The sleeping leaf, makes busiest minstrelsy;
When, all at once! amid the quivering shade,
Millions of diamond sparklers are betrayed!
When dry leaves rustle, and the whistling song
Of keen tuned grass, comes piercing along;
When windy pipes are heard—and many a lute
Is touched amid the skies, and then is mute;
When even the foliage on the glittering steep,
Of feathery bloom—is whispering in its sleep.
It is that hour when whispering ones will weep,
And know not why—when we would gladly sleep
Our last,—last sleep; and feel no touch of fear
Unconscious where we are, or what is near;
Till we are startled by a falling tear,
That unexpected gathered in our eye,
While we were ranting for you blessed sky;
That hour of gratitude—of whispering prayer,
When we can hear a worship in the air;
When we are lifted from the earth, and feel
Light, fanning wings around us faintly wheel,
And o'er our lids and brow a blessing steal;
And then—as if our sins were all forgiven—
And all our tears were wiped and we in heaven!

THE THINGS THAT CHANGE.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

Know'st thou that seas are sweeping
Where domes and towers have been?
When the clear wave is sleeping,
Those piles may yet be seen;
Far down below the glossy tide,
Man's dwellings where his voice hath died!

Know'st thou that flocks are feeding
Above the tombs of old,
Which kings, their armies leading,
Have lingered to behold?
A short smooth greenward o'er them spread,
Is all that marks where heroes bled.

Know'st thou, that now the token
Of cities once renowned,
Is but some pillar broken,
With grass and wall-flowers crowned;
While the lone serpent rears her young,
Where the triumphant lyre hath rung!

Well, well I know the story
Of ages passed away,
And the mournful wrecks that glory
Hath left to dull decay;
But thou hast yet a tale to learn,
More full of warnings, sad and stern.

Thy pensive eye but ranges
Through ruined fane and hall—
Oh! the deep soul hath changes
More sorrowful than all!
Talk not, while these before thee throng,
Of silence in the place of song.

See Scorn, where Love hath perished,
Distrust where Friendship grew;
Pride, where once Nature cherished
All tender thoughts and true;
And shadows of oblivion thrown
O'er every trace of idols gone.

Grieve not for tombs far scattered,
For temples prostrate laid;
In thine own heart lie shattered
The altars it had made!
Go, sound its depths in doubt and fear—
Heap up no more its treasures here!

FAREWELL.

By the late Dr. Heber, bishop of Calcutta.
When eyes are beaming
What never tongue might tell,

When tears are streaming
From their crystal cell;
When hands are linked that dread to part,
And heart is met by throbbing heart,
Oh! bitter, bitter is the smart
Of them that bid farewell!

When hope is chidden
That fain of bliss would tell,
And love forbidden
In the breast to dwell;
When fettered by a viewless chain,
We turn and gaze, and turn again,
Oh! death were merey to the pain
Of them that bid farewell!

THE WIDOW.

"But now will canker sorrow eat my bud,
And chase the native beauty from his cheek,
And he will look as hollow as a ghost:
As dim and meagre as an ague's fit:
And so he'll die."

She said she was alone within the world:—
How could she but be sad!
She whispered something of a lad,
With eyes of blue and light hair sweetly curled—
But the grave had the child!
And yet a voice she heard
When at the lattice, calm and mild,
The mother in the twilight saw the vine-leaves stirred.
"Mother," it seemed to say,
"I love thee;
When thou dost by the side of thy lone willow pray,
My spirit writes the words above thee:—
Mother, I watch o'er thee—I love thee."

Where was the husband of that widowed thing,—
That seraph's earthly sire?
A soldier dares a soldier's fire;
The murderous ball brought death upon its wing,
Beneath a foreign sky.
He fell in sunny Spain;
The wife, in silence, saw him die,
But the blue eyes of the fond boy gave drops like rain.
"Mother," the poor lad cried,
"He's dying!
We are close by thee, father,—at thy bleeding side—
Dost thou not hear thy Arthur crying?
Mother, his lids are closed—he's dying!"

It was a stormy time when the man fell;
And the youth shrunk and pined;
Consumption's worm his pulse entwined—
"Prepare his shroud," rang out the convent bell.
Yet, through his pain he smiled,
To soothe a parent's grief:—
Sad soul! she could not be beguiled:
She saw the bud must quit its guardian leaf!
"Mother," he faintly said,
"Come near me—
Kiss me—and let me in my father's grave be laid—
I've prayed for thee, and God will hear me—
Mother, I'll come again and cheer thee!"

ADDRESS

Delivered in commemoration of the Anniversary of St. John the Baptist, on Wednesday, 24th June, A. L. 5840,

Before the Companions and Brethren of Washington Chapter, No. 13, and Memphis Lodge, No. 91.

The theory just presented to your view in regard to the introduction of masonry into England, although not supported by testimony as full and unequivocal as could be desired, appears, nevertheless, to be the most probable. It furnishes, more than any other with which I am acquainted, a chain of masonic history, which reaches back to that prophetic age, and to that angel visited land, from which there is—in the unwritten traditions of our Order, and in the very nature of its frame-work—the strongest internal evidence that it has descended. It is matter of serious regret, that many valuable records were lost during the English Revolution, and that others were destroyed by over-scrupulous brethren, which might have materially elucidated the point under consideration. Assuming, however, the hypothesis that our art was brought to the west of Europe by the disciples of Pythagoras, the task is not difficult to trace a relationship so intimate as to amount to an identity, between them and the builders of the Temple under Solomon; for it is well known by those familiar with the sacred history, that Tyre from whose king Solomon received material assistance in the erection of that magnificent edifice, was the principal city of Phœnicians, among whom Pythagoras is said to have received his masonic knowledge. That it was from them he obtained much of his instruction in the "true manner of fashioning all things for man's use," is most probable; for it was chiefly on account of their superior skill over the servants of Solomon in hewing timber, and other branches of architectural knowledge, that they were employed in the work. There were, besides, as we are told by the sacred record, "strangers in the land," who were also employed in the work of the temple, in bearing burthens, in hewing in the mountains, and in overseeing the work. Now, if it required the "hewers of wood" sent by Hiram of Tyre, to be more skillful than the servants of Solomon as a necessary qualification to their being employed in preparing materials for the Temple, the inference is plain that these "strangers in the land," who were entrusted not only with "hewing in the mountains," but appointed to "oversee the work," must also have been endowed with extraordinary skill and proficiency in that branch of the arts which is embraced in operative masonry.

In a word, that they were a separate and distinct association or class of men, having a superior knowledge of building over the Jews, equal to that of the Phœnicians,—if, indeed, they were not of that race of people,—and composing a branch of that common brotherhood of architects, known to exist at that period in different parts of Asia, the works of whose hands have been the wonder of all after ages. Granting, then, that up to the period of their employment in erecting the Temple, the speculative or religious principle of freemasonry was unknown among them, until infused into their fraternity by Solomon, I would ask—if the account given in the Bible, of the building of this great edifice be true—and I presume there are none in this assembly who will question it—what is more probable than that the men who were engaged to it, and who were eye-witnesses of its awful dedication to the Most High; who saw its altar lighted by the "fire which came down from Heaven," and who stood beneath the shadow of the "cloud" which veiled the dread Presence of the INVISIBLE I AM;—what I say, is more probable than that these men should have been indoctrinated by their Grand Master, Solomon, in the solemn mysteries of a religion which he had received direct from Heaven, by being constituted a peculiar society of men, whose symbolic rites and ceremonies were to typify and shadow forth, through all time the worship of that true and living God, of whose majesty and power they had had such signal and sublime manifestations? It is most reasonable and probable; so much so, indeed, that the expectation of the establishment of some such permanent memorial, springs up as it were instinctively in the mind, while dwelling upon the supernatural occurrences recorded by the inspired writer. The traditions of our Order give to this reasonable conjecture the character of a well attested fact, preserved and faithfully handed down from generation to generation, until the present time.

When the Temple was completed, and the craftsmen were disbanded, perfected by their seven years apprenticeship under the wisest monarch that has ever lived, it is reasonable to suppose that many of them would search in the adjacent countries for the employment of their skill in architecture—carrying with them of course, and cherishing with peculiar care and affection, the new feature which had been superadded to their profession by the monarch of Israel. Nothing is more natural than that, drawn together by a common remembrance of the pleasant scenes in the Holy City, they should meet together in Lodges in the strange countries in which they were sojourning, to enjoy the delights of fraternal intercourse, and to improve each other in masonic knowledge. Thus masonry was diffused throughout the eastern world;—making it not only probable, but almost certain, that Pythagoras, who at a later period, travelled in search of knowledge "through Egypt and Syria, and the countries where the Phœnicians had established colonies," and made himself acquainted with the occult learning of the East, was also instructed in the arts and precepts practised and inculcated by the builders of the Holy Temple at Jerusalem, and their successors.

In support of this view, let us compare the Pythagorean Fraternity established at Crotona—the members of which were instructed in the arts and sciences of the East—with the institution of Ancient Freemasonry. Before any one was received into the order, established by Pythagoras at Crotona, a minute and diligent inquiry was instituted as to his character and temper. If the issue of this inquiry was favorable to the candidate, he bound himself by a solemn engagement, to conceal from the uninitiated the mysteries in which he might be instructed. The doctrine of charity, of universal benevolence, and especially of affection to the order, were warmly recommended to the young disciples; and such, we are told, was the influence they had upon their minds, that discord seemed to have been banished from Italy, and the golden age to have returned. Strangers, of every country, of every religion, and of every rank in life, if properly qualified, were received into the association. They had particular words and signs by which they might distinguish each other and correspond at a distance.—They wore white garments as an emblem of innocence. They had a particular regard for the East. They advanced from one step of knowledge to another. They were forbidden to commit to writing their mysteries, which were preserved solely by oral tradition. The Pythagorean secrets consisted chiefly of the arts and sciences, united with theology and ethics, and were communicated to the initiated in cyphers and symbols. To those who were destitute of acute discernment, these hieroglyphic representations seemed pregnant with absurdity; while others, of more penetration, discerned in them hidden treasures, calculated to improve the understanding, and purify the heart.* These points of resemblance in every essential feature are so striking, as almost to force the conviction upon the mind, that the Pythagorean Fraternity established in Italy several centuries before the birth of Christ, and the institution of Freemasonry as it appeared in England in the 15th century, were one and the same in spirit and in substance.

It would extend this address far beyond the limits I have assigned to it, and require an unwarrantable draft upon your time and patience, to notice, in extenso the several sects and associations which have existed in different countries since the building of Solomon's Temple;—all practising similar rites—inculcating the same precepts—having like objects:—in fine, possessing all the characteristics of Freemasonry. To the curious, the subject is an interesting one; and is eminently worthy of the investigation of every mason, who appreciates as he should, the institution of which he is a member. Enough, I trust, has been exhibited in the imperfect history I have sketched before you, to show, that the assumption that masonry has existed since the building of the Temple, so far from deserving the stigma of absurd credulity which is often cast upon it, is susceptible of almost positive demonstration.

I come now, my respected audience, to speak of the nature, and the objects had in view, by the institution of Freemasonry. In few words, its nature is that of a Social Brotherhood, connected together by certain fixed and unchangeable laws, of universal application; and its object the happiness of the whole human race, without respect to country, rank, or creed. Universal Benevolence is the essential spirit of its being—Charity and Truth the bond and surety of its preservation. Teaching no creed in religion but that of dependence upon, and accountability to, the ONE ETERNAL and ALMIGHTY GOD, it embraces in its communion the "good and true" of all sects and opinions. The Christian, whose humble yet unwavering faith is in the Sacrifice upon the Cross; and the Mahometan, whose hope of paradise is gathered from the shrine of the Prophet at Mecca;—the unbelieving Jew, who still dreams of a Messiah yet to come; and the untutored Indian, who "Sees God in the clouds, and hears him in the wind,"—all here find an altar at which, unmolested by the logmas of others, they can offer up their devotions to the Grand Architect of the Universe. Men of all creeds in politics here meet together, and find a refuge from the dissensions which too often mar the harmony of social intercourse; and here all ranks, from the monarch who sways the sceptre of empires, to the humblest laborer who toils for his daily bread, meet upon the level of true worth and merit.

But this is not all. If masonry stopped here, admirable in its constitution as it would unquestionably be, it might well be asked what were its claims to the regard of that portion of mankind who do not participate in its rites and mysteries. But the sphere of its benevolence is not confined to the circle of the brotherhood, wide and extended as it has become. In the language of our ancient precepts and charges:—"The mother country of a mason is The World; within the circle of his compass is contained every thing that concerns mankind, and every suffering human being has a sacred claim upon his regard. He is not to wait until his ears ring with the lamentations of the miserable; but is affectionately to anticipate the wants of the unfortunate, and inspire them with courage—looking for his reward, not in the vain and loud applause of the multitude, but in the silent and secret testimony of his own heart, and in the sacred pleasure with which he is contemplated by the Deity." His charity is not the mite extorted by a cold sense of duty to the necessities of a suffering brother in indigence; nor even the liberal donation to importunate want.—

Far different is the Charity which FREEMASONRY teaches:

"She pauses not, when at her door
A shivering mortal stands,
To ask the cause that made him poor,
Or why he help demands:

Her seraph-voice is ever kind;
She thinketh nothing wrong:
To every fault she seemeth blind,
Nor vaunteth with her tongue.

In penitence she placeth trust,—
Hope smileth at her door:
Relieveth first, then softly saith—
'Go brother—SIN NO MORE!'

This principle of charity, alone, did our Order possess no other quality of good report, ought to recommend it to the toleration and favorable regard of mankind. But in addition to the other virtues which it especially inculcates—Temperance, Fortitude, Prudence and Justice—it hath trophies of its usefulness, which no other institution, not of divine origin can exhibit.

From the period when the pure Word of the Law was preserved by the devout priests of the Temple, amidst the abominable idolatries of the apostate Israelites, to the revival of learning and the spread of letters—throughout that long night of superstition and ignorance which enveloped the world—masonry hath been the safe repository of a pure system of religion, and the faithful nurse of the useful arts and sciences. To prove this, we need but to refer again to the testimony of our brethren of the 15th century, and the evidence of our ancient charges; from which it will be seen that masons in the "olden time" taught the arts both theoretically and practically, and strenuously enforced the doctrine of accountability to God. The first words in these charges are: "Ye shall be true men to God, and use no error or heresy by your understandings, or by wise men's teachings." And in the examination before Henry VI, in answer to the question—"What arts have the masons taught mankind," they reply:—"They have taught the arts of agriculture, architecture, astronomy, geometry, numbers, music, poetry, chemistry, government and religion." That they taught the art of building practically as well as theoretically, is evident from the second of the old charges, which is as follows: "Secondly, also, That no master take work, but that he take reasonable pay for it; so that the Lord, [or employer] may be truly served, and the master to live honestly, and to pay his fellows truly. And that no master or fellow supplant others of their work; that is to say, that if he hath taken a work, or else staid master of any work, that he shall not put him out, unless he be unable of cunning to make an end of his work. And no master or fellow shall take an apprentice for less than seven years." That they were scrupulous in their morality, to live under a "tongue of good report," is also proven by one more extract which I shall give from these old "landmarks of our Order," for the especial edification of my younger brethren, the entered apprentices and fellow crafts of this Lodge:—"Ninthly, That no fellow go into the town by night, except he have a fellow with him, who may bear him record that he was in an honest place!"—a rule requiring a degree of circumspection in the outward deportment of our ancient brethren, eminently worthy of our emulation in the present day.

I have not, my respected audience, followed in the beaten track of those who have endeavored to remove the thousand and one objections which are urged against our institution. Nor have I endeavored to excuse or defend the inconsistency of those who wear its badges, while they are far from conforming to its precepts. There is nothing on earth so good, but there will be found some one to cavil at it, and no association of men so righteous that a Judas hath not crept into its bosom. Even our Holy Religion is rejected of men in this the 19th century, as an absurd fable; and the bitter and ashy fruits borne by many a tree sheltered in the garden of the Church, afford a mournful evidence that it is not among masons alone, that the frailties and corruptions of our natures have to be sorrowed for. While this is the case, I cannot but regard a labored defence of Freemasonry, as a work of useless supererogation. Upon us, my brethren, in our daily walk and conversation among our fellow men, devolves all the defence which the genius of masonry requires at the hands of her followers and advocates. If we but walk uprightly in the paths in which she would lead us and reverence and obey the laws which she has given us, we may smile at the slanders of the reviler and the jeers of the scorner. But if, on the other hand, we profess that which is good with our lips, and do only evil continually in our lives,—if we who are her children, by our conduct condemn and dishonor her in her own household,—in vain will be the arguments of sophism and the pleadings of eloquence to shield us from the execration with which the single-hearted and the good ever regard the hypocrite or her from the contempt which the world visits upon the false divinities set up by hypocrites for its worship. Actions, not words, constitute the arguments which masonry requires in answer to the objections of her enemies.

Nevertheless, there is one objection, often urged by our female friends, which I feel bound to endeavor to remove, much as I fear I have already taxed your good nature and patience; I mean the exclusion of WOMAN from our Lodge rooms. To the allegation that by the denial to her of a participation in the rites and ceremonies of masonry, disrespect is shown to the sex, we plead, and vehemently too, "Not guilty!" Without going into the graver reasons which might be drawn from the nature and origin of our institution, it is enough to state that masonry is designed to smooth and polish the rough asperities of man's fierce and rugged nature; not to "gild the rainbow" by increasing the gentle loveliness of her character. She needs no such aid, to make her "good and true," and humane, and charitable. Spontaneously the soft tear of pity bedews her cheek at the tale of woe; and her gentle bosom, from the impulse of nature, heaves with tender emotions at the sight of human wretchedness. The adventitious aid of mystical institutions, and the use of symbols, is not necessary to lead her to the practice of the virtues. Her own heart is the Lodge in which these preside; and the dictates of their will is with her a sufficient incentive to action.* But there are other reasons equally or more cogent. Should we admit woman to our Lodge rooms, who would answer for the continuance of that brotherly affection which is the very bond and cement of our institution? Love—that knows no brotherhood, and brooks no fellowship—would enter there; and rivalries would spring up, bringing in their train the monster Jealousy, on whose approach meek-eyed Charity would depart forever, to mourn over the ruined altars and desecrated temples from which she had been driven. Nay more: The presence of woman would undermine the very foundations of the time-honored edifice. Who would perceive the "light against light," which now shines upon our labors, when his soul was illumined by the light of her eyes? Who would give heed to the voice of Wisdom in the East, when his ears were filled with the melody of her voice? Or who would appreciate the Beauty which adorns our Temple, when his heart was swelling with the busy tumult of sweet emotions, conjured up by the spell of her beauty? No, my hearers, the Wisdom which founded masonry, has wisely ordained WOMAN a higher sphere than the "ground floor" of our Temple. To us are assigned the outer courts and workshops of the "checkered pavement;" that we may by patient labor with the implements of our profession, "knock off the rough corners" of our rude nature, so as to be fitted for admittance into that upper chamber—into that hallowed sanctuary, where she presides, and be "received and acknowledged," as worthy brothers, companions, and friends.

But while woman, for wise reasons, is excluded from the Lodge,—not as is often flippantly alledged, because we deem her untrustworthy—masonry by no means withholds from her its benefits. Its hand is ever stretched out to the widow and her orphans, and its sleepless vigilance is her constant defence against the insidious attacks of the vile and unprincipled. Far from its holding derogatory to her sex, I boldly affirm that there is not, in the whole range of mere human institutions, any society of men, which assigns to woman so high a rank in the social scale, or which provides so fully and effectually for her protection and welfare under every contingency in human life. Her dignity, happiness and honor, are the peculiar objects of masonic guardianship; and of him who swerves from his duty in this respect, it may be truly said, that it "were better a mill stone had been hanged around his neck," than to have so offended.

BRETHREN—Entered Apprentices! You have put on the lambskin or white leathern apron, in token of your innocence and the purity of your intentions. It is more ancient than the Golden Fleece or Roman Eagle—more honorable than the Star and Garter, or any other order that could be conferred upon you by king, prince or potentate, unless he be a mason. Let its unspotted whiteness constantly remind you of that purity of life and conduct which is so essentially necessary, not only to the good report of the Lodge of which you are members, but to your admittance into the Celestial Lodge above, where the Great Architect of the Universe presides.

Fellow Crafts! The symbolic implements which have been committed to you, are full of meaning, and deserve your diligent use and study. By them you are admonished to walk uprightly in your several stations before Heaven and man, squaring your actions by the square of virtue, ever keeping in remembrance that you are hastening upon the level of time, to that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveller returns.

Master Masons! You have been invested with a degree which imposes on you high and solemn duties not only towards your brethren of the Order, but towards mankind in general. Universal Benevolence you are always to inculcate, and by the regularity of your own deportment afford the best example for the conduct of others less informed.

Mark Masters! In the enlarged field of masonic knowledge which has been laid open before you, you have abundant food for the contemplative and inquiring mind. Study so to regulate your conduct, that it will stand the test of the Grand Overseer's square, when you shall be offered as materials in the construction of that spiritual building—that house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

Past Masters! On you is devolved, not only the all-important duty of self-government, but also the supervision and government of your brethren. Upon your performance of these duties, I need not admonish you, depends much of the dignity and respectability of the Craft.

Most Excellent Masters! To dispense light and truth to your uninformed brethren, is one of your great duties. To qualify yourselves for its discharge, should be one of your highest pleasures, and the constant occupation of your leisure moments.

Companions of the Royal Arch! You stand upon an elevation to which none should attain but those who have passed the ordeal of the most strict and rigid scrutiny. I need not remind you of the admonition which you have in the color of the badges you wear to be "ferrent in the exercise of your devotions to heaven, and faithful in your endeavors to promote the happiness of man."

COMPANIONS AND BRETHREN! On this day, consecrated to the memory of one whom Christians love, and Masons venerate, it is meet that we should all ponder well the character we bear before the world. Constituting a portion of that great family of a society, more ancient than hoary Tradition herself; and claiming kindred with the long line of worthies which reaches back from the illustrious dead of our own day, thro' the dim mists of ages, to the priests who ministered at the altar when the fire came down from Heaven, and the glory of the Lord filled the house of the first Temple, it is very meet that we should examine well whether we be worthy of our profession, and of a lineage so truly honorable. Forming a part in the tie of Universal Benevolence with which our Order encircles the world, it is especially appropriate on this day to renew and strengthen our determination to make bright the link which we compose in the great chain of "Brotherly Love, Relief and Truth"—by keeping it free, alike from the rust of slothful indulgence, and the canker of a spirit of uncharitableness. Let us my companions and brethren, flourish as the tree beside the fountain of waters, and it shall be said of it, by the common voice of mankind, as it was prayed for the Holy City, by the Psalmist of old:

"PEACE BE WITHIN THY WALLS; AND PROSPERITY WITHIN THY PALACES!"

VARIETY.

THE HERMIT ROBBER OF SCALA GRECA.

SOME time since, a hermit of reputed sanctity took up his abode in a cavern on the ascent of the Scala Greca near Syracuse, supporting himself, as was supposed by the charity of casual passengers: he inhabited this cave for many years, during which time travellers between Syracuse and Catania were often missing. As Sicily has always had the reputation of abounding in robbers, it was supposed that these persons had fallen in such hands, and had been murdered; some of them were seen, for the last time, in the neighborhood of the Scala Greca, but no one suspected the pious hermit. It happened that a Gentleman riding alone to Syracuse, was in the middle of the pass accosted by the holy father, who asked, as usual, for charity; as these demands from such subjects are never or rarely refused, the horseman stopped to make a donation: he observed that the hermit extended his left hand for the gift, keeping his right crossed upon his breast; this would, perhaps in itself excited suspicion, but an accidental motion, or perhaps a premature attempt, discovered to the astonished traveller that the pious man grasped a formidable stiletto, whilst he kept his eye fixed on him with peculiar earnestness. There was no time to be lost; he dropped his purse as if by accident, and, as the other stooped to pick it up, knocked him down with the butt end of his whip, and putting his horse to full speed, soon arrived in Syracuse, where he told his tale, procured assistance from the magistrates, and returned in search of the hermit, who in the meantime, had effected his escape; but in the cave were found various hiding-places, containing money and goods to a great amount; many of the articles were afterwards recognized as belonging to people who were missing. The robber, who been severely hurt by the blow, was found and brought into Syracuse the same evening by some peasants. He confessed having murdered at different times not less than twenty-five travellers, the remains of several of whom were afterwards dug up in the neighborhood of the cave.

BURSTING OF STOVES.—The Philadelphia Gazette relates an instance of the bursting of a stove from covering up the fires. It was a large common stove in the laboratory of a chemist, and had been partly filled with wet or damp anthracite coal placed on ignited coal, and the whole covered with ashes. In an hour or so afterwards a tremendous explosion occurred, and on entering the laboratory the stove was found blown into pieces, and the pipe split asunder to the ceiling. The phenomenon is attributed to the accumulation of gas in the stove before the fire burst into flame, and when the flame touched it, the explosion followed. The case is mentioned as a warning to housekeepers.

A PICTURE.—A fair young girl is leaning pensively on the casement, gazing with thoughtful brow upon the scene below. The bloom of fifteen summers tints her soft cheeks, the sweets of a thousand flowers are gathered upon her round full lips, the curls cling to a spotless brow, and fall upon a neck of perfect grace, the soft swimming eyes seem lighted by the tenderest fire of poetry, and beauty hovers over her as her own most favored child. What are her thoughts? Love cannot stir a bosom so young, sorrow cannot yet have touched a spirit so pure. Innocence itself seems to have chosen her for its own. Alas! has disappointment touched that youthful heart? Yes, it must be so; but hush! she starts—her bosom heaves—her eye brightens, her lips part—she speaks—listen—"Jim you nasty fool you! quit scratching that pig's back, or I'll tell Mar!"

The 29th anniversary of the New Jersey Baptist Association was held at Pemberton, Burlington county, on the 8th and 9th ult. Letters were received from 56 churches, having 33 ordained ministers and 4 licensed preachers, 3800 members; and during the past year 601, and received by 17. The church at Cohansey, founded in 1640, is the oldest of all in the association, being 160 years since its establishment. The association passed resolutions, as we learn by the Bridgeton Chronicle, in recommendation of the Ame-ican Baptist publication and Sunday school society, Sabbath schools, American and Foreign Bible Society Hamilton literary and theological institution, total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors as a beverage, &c. Several of the churches have adopted the principle and pledge of total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks as a term of communion, and speak of the benefit derived the pledge being made a test of membership among them. M. J. Rhees was appointed to preach the next annual sermon.—Newark Daily Advertiser.

SHOT.—It will be recollected that a daring runaway slave killed one man and dangerously wounded another who attempted to arrest him, in the Third Municipality, some five or six weeks since, and made his escape into the swamp. Capt. Harper got information of his haunt, and accompanied by Commissary Barry and two others, all armed, proceeded on Wednesday night to arrest him. It was far down, in the rear of Dr. Luzenburg's Hospital; when they reached there he was lying under a musquito bar. Hearing their approach, he jumped up and fired at Capt. Harper and those with him, and missed them. The Capt. then fired off one shot from a double barrel gun loaded with buck shot; he fired the contents of the second barrel, which the negro received in his right breast and fell. They then arrested him and brought him to the Second Municipality police prison. He is seriously wounded, and will not, it is thought recover.

He says his name is Nelson Brown, and that he belongs to Charles Archipel or Richenel. He is a mulatto of much muscular strength.—N. O. Picayune, Oct. 16.

The Opium Trade of China.—A letter from Macao says—"To prove to you the fact that the Chinese have not themselves the power to put down the opium trade, I must only state that I have ascertained that the quantity of opium (including the quantity that was not delivered to the Chinese in April last, and that sent to Manila by the Portuguese) since the first of June last up till now, has been 19,000 chests. This includes many cargoes that have gone to Manila; but as it is all destined for the Chinese market, I think it but fair to include all as imported to China."

REVERSES OF FORTUNE.—The U. S. Marshall who has just completed the census of Cincinnati, mentions these incidents:

I met a man who had ruined himself by intemperance, and was subsisting on charity, that I knew in Pittsburg in the year 1815, owner of a fine property and store worth $50,000 at that time. The property alone, I have no doubt, would since have brought $150,000.

I found in the person of a day laborer in one of our foundries a man who had once owned a large iron establishment in Scotland, on the Carron side. He had become involved with others, and rendered insolvent. My sympathies were the more strongly excited here from the simple dignity which forebore repining or complaint the family manifested in the case.

I found also the widow of a distinguished professor in an Eastern college, who was at the time eating her humble supper with her daughter, under such circumstances of penury, that their very table was formed of a board laid across an old barrel!

I have found in the city two cases of disparity of age between the oldest and youngest brother, worthy of notice. In one instance the oldest brother was 69, the youngest 25. In the other when the father was living, and aged 73 years, one brother was 46 and the other 2.

LOOK OUT.—Counterfeit Fives on the Bank of Warsaw at Genesee, an institution established under the Free Banking Law, are in circulation. They may be easily detected by the vignette which has a representation of cattle, and a man on horseback, and is entirely different from the original. On the right hand side of the bill there is a likeness of Franklin, and on the left, near the bottom, one of Washington.

BEGGARS ON HORSEBACK.—In Buenos Ayres horses are so plentiful that beggars make their rounds asking alms on horseback, and do not consider that position as diminishing in any degree their claims to sympathy.

A DOG.—The Baltimore Sun states that Mr. Kinght of the Holiday street theatre, while passing along the street the other day accidentally dropped his pocket book, containing $50. When he had proceeded some distance he discovered his loss, and was about retracing his steps to search for the book when he met his dog running up to him with the pocket book in his mouth. The only reward the sagacious animal demanded was a caress from his master.

New Idea in Economy.—We gather from the Cincinnati Spirit of the Times, that some of the inhabitants of that city have discovered a way to make rag carpets still cheaper than ever. Some of these folks attend political meetings armed with scissors, with which they cut pieces from the coat tails of both whigs and democrats, while they are crowded together to listen to their stump orators. These pieces, excised in the manner aforesaid, are afterwards converted into carpeting, so that from increase in the manufacture the price of the article has fallen. They work together; but we presume they must make a neutral carpet.

Choose Good Company.—Young men are in general but little aware how much their reputation is affected in the view of the public by the company they keep. The character of their associates is soon regarded as their own. If they seek the society of the worthy, it elevates them in the public estimation, as it is an evidence that they respect others. On the contrary, intimacy with persons of bad character always sinks a young man in the eye of the public.

On Saturday last a woman while walking over the canal bridge on the Worcester railroad, where the track is double, unexpectedly met the train, and probably being confused, and not knowing which track the train was on, she fell, and throwing her arm across the rail, it was cut entirely off by the engine. The engineer used every effort to stop the train, and had nearly succeeded. The woman immediately received every attention which her situation required.

LIBERIA.—Accounts have been received from Liberia, up to the 5th of September. Things were generally prosperous, but great mortality prevailed amongst the new emigrants. Forty-two of the passengers by the Saluda have died. They were located temporarily at Bassa Cove, until Bexley could be gotten ready for them.

FLOUR IN OHIO.—In the month of September, about one hundred and fifty thousand barrels of flour, or its equivalent in wheat, were exported from Cleveland, Ohio. The whole state, according to the Cincinnati Chronicle, will export during the present season, something like one million of barrels of flour, or its equivalent in wheat. Low as the price of flour is, this will bring seasonable aid to the finance of the State.

FROM FLORIDA.—The express rider going west with the mails, was fired upon on the seventh inst. near Fort Holmes. His horse was shot under him, but he seized the mails and fled, but was obliged to drop them in the pursuit. Lieut. McKinstry, of the 5th infantry, started after the Indians. He found the quarter part of the mail. The only letters broken open were those addressed to the commanding general and it is believed that they are in possession of important information relative to the campaign in Florida. Another correspondent writes that Capt. Beal caught an Indian near Fort Fanning—he states he was at the battle of Hanson had, and that eighteen Indians were killed dead on the field and many wounded, and have died since.—N. Y. Sun.

Extensive Conflagrations.—The Extensive flouring establishment and plaster mill of Messrs Vail & Hayner, on the Poestenkill, in the eighth ward of this city, took place this morning about 6 o'clock, and about 9 were entirely destroyed. A large quantity of wheat and flour was destroyed. The bridge over the stream and several adjoining buildings took fire, but were saved with little injury. The loss estimated at $50,000.—Insured by the Troy Mutual Insurance Company, we understand, to one half of that amount.—Troy Budget of Wednesday.

POPULAR TALES.

From the Edinburgh Journal.

A TALE OF REAL LIFE.

A little more than twenty years ago, at the time when Britain and the United States of North America had engaged in war, a respectable merchant in Glasgow sustained such pecuniary inconvenience from that event, that he was under the necessity of calling a meeting of his creditors, and declaring his incapacity to meet his engagements. Having always borne a fair character, he met with very lenient treatment from those to whom he stood indebted; and the more so, as the cause of his commercial embarrassments was well known to be one over which had no control. Besides, there was some hope or chance of ultimate indemnification to all parties. In the mean time, however, Mr. Hamilton was subjected to all the ordinary consequences of insolvency. He gave up all he possessed to his creditors, reduced his domestic establishment, and attempted to recommence business on a small scale, with a sum which his creditors were liberal enough to allow him to retain. But being far advanced in years, the evil was in a great measure an irretrievable one to the poor merchant.

Happily, the family dependent on Mr. Hamilton was a small one. He had been twice married, and his second partner was still living; but she had brought him no children, and his only offspring was a girl whom his first wife had presented him with. Elizabeth Hamilton, or Betsy, as she was almost uniformly called, was about sixteen years of age when her father's misfortunes occurred. An eye, uncommonly clear, and of the deepest blue, hair almost of the "lilt white" of the poet, and curling naturally round her well-shaped and finely set head, and a figure light and graceful, made her an object of general admiration. Betsy Hamilton, as has been said, had lost her mother, but she had found a recompense for the loss in the individual who had become her mother's successor. Mrs. Hamilton was a prudent sensible woman, and set the common bye-word at nought, by loving her step-daughter dearly, watching over her happiness unceasingly.

Mrs. Hamilton did her best to comfort her husband under his distresses. She submitted cheerfully to the dismissal of her servants, and to all the other retrenchments which his altered circumstances demanded. She was even the first to suggest many alterations of this nature in their household economy; and among other plans, she suggested that they should endeavor to eke out their income by letting their best room to a lodger. In execution of this proposal, a ticket was hung out at the window, and it had not been there long until it produced the desired effect. A gentleman called, attended by a servant boy, and inquired the price of the lodgings. Mrs. Hamilton thought the lodger was not precisely of the proper description; she would have preferred a quiet elderly gentleman, likely to keep no company, or give much trouble, whereas her present visitor was young, not more, to appearance, than twenty-seven or twenty-eight. She therefore asked a high price, thinking the inquirer might thus be deterred from taking the lodgings. But although he remarked that the price was high, the gentleman said, "As the room is neat, and the situation suits me, we shan't part about the money. To-morrow at ten I will be here. My servant will be about me during the day, but he sleeps elsewhere." Mrs. Hamilton could now make no further objections, and accordingly the gentleman came at the appointed time, and was duly installed in his new apartments.

Mr. Salkeld, for so was the lodger named, proved to be a person of uncommonly quiet habits, and of frank open manners and disposition. He was only a visitor to Glasgow, or at least but a temporary resident in it. This much the Hamiltons soon learnt, but their lodger did not communicate any further particulars about himself, although he nightly spent an hour or two in chatting with Mr. Hamilton, and in listening patiently to the honest man's irrepressible grumbings at the Americans, whose hot-headed obstinacy he arraigned as the cause of all his personal troubles. By and by seeing the inconvenience to which Mrs. Hamilton was often put, in consequence of her having no other assistance in the house than that of an old woman who came now and then, Mr. Salkeld proposed to take his meals along with the family, and this was agreed to. The lodger thus became in a measure one of the family; and his manly open bearing, and prepossessing appearance, soon led Mrs. Hamilton to forget that he was not the elderly gentleman whom she had desired as an inmate of her house. Mr. Salkeld's boy was also of great use to her, though he was sometimes sent away by his master, and remained absent for a day or two. At these times, Betsy, who assisted her stepmother in the house as much as the latter would permit, had frequently to attend to Mr. Salkeld's wants and requests. But then he was so plain and unassuming, that it was "more like waiting on a brother than on a stranger," as Mrs. Hamilton used to remark.

After Mr. Salkeld had passed between two or three months in Mrs. Hamilton's lodgings, it chanced that Betsy's grandmother, by the mother's side, paid the debt of nature. She resided at a place in the country, about five miles from the city, and at her death a considerable legacy fell to Betsy Hamilton, consisting partly of personal property or moveables of various kinds, which it was necessary for her to look after in person. It was arranged that she should do this some days after the funeral. When the morning for the visit came, she dressed herself, intending, as the distance was short, to proceed on foot to her late grandmother's residence. "Betsy, my dear said her stepmother, when the young girl came down from her room, "Betsy, surely you are not going thus to your grandmother's relations? Where is your black gown? Why have you not put it on?" "You know, mother, it is not really necessary that I should put on mourning," said Betsy; "a white dress, arranged as mine is, is more used now; and I know you think white always becomes me best. Besides, my black gown does not fit me, mother, you know; and so I"— "Yes, Betsy, my dear, I knew all this; but I really wonder to hear you attending to such things on such an occasion. You cannot feel much for the loss of a relative of whom you have seen so little, but I would have expected you to think less about how your gown looks when going where you are." Betsy coloured at the reproof, and hung down her head. "Well, my love," continued Mrs. Hamilton kindly, "I believe it is no great matter after all, and you have not time to change your dress again. It is now half twelve; you must away to be home in good time."

At the close of the same day, when night had begun to set in, Mrs. Hamilton sat in her parlor wondering what could be detaining Betsy so long. Time ran on; eight, nine, ten o'clock came, and she made not her appearance. Mrs. Hamilton fretted much about the circumstance, although her husband, whose temper was more phlegmatic, assured her again and again that Betsy would be staying all night at her aunt's house, and that nothing could be wrong. Mr. Salkeld, too, when he came home for the night, endeavored to back Mr. Hamilton's assurance; but the good lady spent on the whole a very miserable evening, followed by an almost sleepless night. She had a presentiment of evil upon her mind, and, as is very common in such cases, could not tell what it was that alarmed her, or from what quarter she feared evil. Unfortunately, her forebodings proved correct. Betsy Hamilton did not return in the morning, and her father immediately walked off to inquire for her. In about three hours he returned, pale and anxious, and sank into a chair before his wife. "Mr. Hamilton," said she, "for God's sake tell me where is Betsy! Is she ill—is she dead?" The poor woman had to repeat her questions before her husband spoke. "No, my dear," said he, "no, I hope she is not dead; but where she is, God knows. She has not been seen at her aunt's."

Mrs. Hamilton was in greater distress than ever at this information. But she had more activity of mind than her husband, and she soon roused herself to a sense of the propriety and necessity of taking steps for discovering whether any accident had happened to Betsy on her walk to the country, or if she had stopped at the house of any friend. All this was done. Inquiries were made along the whole road, but nobody had seen or heard of such a person as Betsy Hamilton. Mrs. Hamilton herself called at the houses of all the acquaintances of the family, but learnt nothing from any but one party, who had seen Betsy on the day of her disappearance. Strange to say, she had then been going in a direction quite opposite to that of her aunt's residence. The person who told this could not be in a mistake, as Betsy had spoken a few words to her in passing. Mrs. Hamilton was astonished and alarmed more and more by this communication. On getting home, she urged her husband to insert an advertisement in the newspapers, entreating any person who had seen a young girl of Betsy's appearance within the time in question, to communicate what they knew. Mr. Hamilton did as his wife advised, only omitting the name of the parties concerned. This appeared in the newspapers on the second morning after the poor girl's disappearance, but no information resulted from the step.

Mr. Salkeld participated strongly in the distress of Mr. and Mrs. Hamilton, and often endeavored to speak words of consolation to them, though it was difficult to find any reasonable grounds whereon to build hope. He offered to do any thing that Mrs. Hamilton could think likely to be of use. But after two days passed away, the stepmother, remembering the circumstance of the white dress, became convinced that Betsy had gone away of her own free will, and that whenever they heard of her again, it must be through herself. So she merely thanked Mr. Salkeld, but did not put his offered services in requisition. Besides he was called away from home, and was absent for two days. It was on the fourth day of Betsy's absence that he again returned to his lodgings, and still nothing had been heard of her. Mrs. Hamilton was found by him in a state bordering on distraction. She could do nothing but move restlessly about the house, wringing her hands, and exclaiming, "My poor Betsy! my poor motherless bairn! Villainous hands must they be that can keep you away from your home. My poor misguided lassie!" These and such-like exclamations showed that a suspicion had sprung up in her mind, of Betsy having been induced to leave home by some one, who, notwithstanding her quiet, and indeed remarkably secluded life, had found means to address her, and gain her affections—whether for foul or fair purposes, none could say.

A simple accident gave a totally new turn to Mrs. Hamilton's thoughts on this affair. Passing by the door of Mr. Salkeld's room, about two hours after that gentleman's return home, Mrs. Hamilton heard her lodger speaking in a low voice to his servant lad. But three or four words of the conversation reached her ear. These words were, "Say to her I will be with her in two hours—pointedly." At first Mrs. Hamilton took little notice of what she had thus heard. It was only when, in spite of her distress, a natural feeling of womanly curiosity led her to reflect on these words and to conjecture who the her could refer to, that a suspicion for the first time flashed across her mind that Mr. Salkeld might be the actor in Betsy's abduction. "Oh, no," thought she again, "he is so good, so sedate, so honorable; and there never seemed anything between him and Betsy—never. They took little notice of each other, and were never for any length of time together, except going to church. No, no, he cannot, he would not harm her." But again, the fact of his two day's absence came forcibly on the mind of Mrs. Hamilton, and she remembered his having frequently said that he knew no one in the city, not a single family but their own. Reflections of this order gained the way finally, and the stepmother of the lost girl resolved, at least, to set a close watch on Mr. Salkeld's motions. But the poor lady's impatience to be at the truth overpowered her more temperate resolve, and before her lodger left his room, after she had the words just mentioned, Mrs. Hamilton stood in his presence. As soon as she came into the apartment, he exclaimed, "Oh Mrs. Hamilton, I am glad I have seen you just now. I will be obliged to leave home again for a short time—indeed only till some time to-morrow." These words determined the wavering mind of the lady. "Never!" she answered, turning the same time, and locking the door behind her; "never, Mr. Salkeld, shall you quit this house—this room—till I have satisfied me where you have taken Betsy Hamilton! I am convinced you know where she is; I am convinced it is you who have taken her away! Your looks admit it: you cannot—you dare not deny it!" Mr. Salkeld did indeed evince confusion and discomposure, but he said—"You wrong me, Mrs. Hamilton; you do indeed—and must not think to stop me on such a charge as this!" "Stop you!" cried Mrs. Hamilton, whose feelings were strongly roused. "stop you! If I had my poor deluded motherless child again, whatever you may have made her, I would drive you from my doors! But till I know what has become of her, you shall not go. If you go by force, I will follow you—everywhere—to the world's end, but I will have her from you!" "My dear Mrs. Hamilton, for the love of goodness be quiet," said the gentleman; but his hearer was not in a mood to be thus checked. "Quiet!" she reiterated. "you will tell me to be quiet, and almost confess to what you have done! Oh, man, man! can you hope for mercy at the last day with such sin upon your head as that of destroying a creature so young and so innocent?"

An overpowering flood of tears here came to the relief of the poor woman, and she sank into a chair, and gave way to her grief. Mr. Salkeld thus got an opportunity to speak. He said, "You wrong me, Mrs. Hamilton, cruelly wrong me! I am not the man to do what you accuse me of, and least of all to one whom I would give up my own life to save from ruin. Yes, I confess that Betsy has gone with me; that it is I who have induced her to go from home; but it was to become my wife." These words aroused Mrs. Hamilton, but her suspicions were not allayed. "And why has she not become your wife, if this be true?" said she. "Unforeseen difficulties came in the way, but she is my wife now," said Mr. Salkeld, "and in a few hours she may be here herself to prove it." "Where is she?" returned Mrs. Hamilton, whom the frank and truthful tone of her lodger began to inspire with a joyful hope. "where is she! Oh, if this be true, why such mystery, Mr. Salkeld! You see the misery it has caused." "I have seen it with the utmost distress," was the reply, "but you will find that it was not intended. All will be explained, and Mr. Hamilton, I hope, will forgive all. Shall I go for Betsy now?" "Yes, but I must go with you," said the lady hurriedly. "Well, I will get a carriage, and you too shall go if you will," replied Mr. Salkeld, with a smile. Mrs. Hamilton felt ashamed of her lingering suspicion, and said, "No, I am wronging you. I will stay, and prepare Mr. Hamilton for again seeing his daughter."

Within two hours afterwards, a carriage drove up to the door, and Betsy Hamilton was handed out of it, handsomely or rather richly dressed, and as became a bride. She had another lady with her, a person with whose daughter she had been formerly at boarding-school. When Betsy came into the house of her father again, she besought his pardon on her knees. "I am too happy to see you to be angry, Betsy," said he; "I am more pleased than if I had my fortune again from these Americans." These words made Betsy look a little blank, and she exchanged a glance with her husband. Mr. Salkeld knelt besides his young wife, and said "You will forgive me too, sir—even if I should be an American myself!" "An American!" said Mr. Hamilton. "Yes, my dear father," said Betsy, "that has been the cause of all our distress. Mr. Salkeld was afraid you would not consent on that account." "Yes sir," said Mr. Salkeld, "I am captain and owner of a merchantman now detained in the Clyde. I saw your strong prejudices against us, and persuaded your daughter to become my wife in private. But when told that I was an American, no clergyman here would marry us, and we were ultimately obliged to go to Gretna-Green, and so were absent four days instead of one. Betsy was much fatigued with the journey, besides being so much harassed, during the days of her absence, on your account, that she was unable to come directly back to you along with me, and remained with this lady, who was kind enough to give her a refuge during all our unexpected delays."

The lady alluded to corroborated Mr. Salkeld's words, and described so forcibly the sufferings experienced by Betsy on account of her parents, that the latter were more willing to pardon her, and imprudence had already cost her much. As for the marriage, it was a happy one for all parties. Mr. Hamilton ultimately recovered all his property through his son-in-law's influence. Betsy is now one of the most respected matrons of the Union. Such is a story of real life, told as it occurred. By telling it, we do not regret any approval of some features in it, particularly the conduct of the heroine, which was not only indecorous, but might have had the most fatal consequences to those interested in her welfare; with this remark, we leave the tale in other respects to the judgment of the reader.

THE LEGENDARY.

NANCY'S HILL.

A few miles below the Notch of the White Mountains, in New Hampshire, now celebrated by the painter and the poet, in the bosom of the valley through which the Saco winds, rises a little eminence which was pointed out to me as Nancy's Hill. Nash was a celebrated hunter; the storms of winter, terrible as they were amid the desert of mountains which was his home, and the tempests of the sultry summer, equally terrible and more appalling, were alike indifferent to him. In one of his numerous excursions, he led more for the benefit of the country than all the philosophers before or since his time—for he first explored the wonderful passage, which opened an easy intercourse between the inhabitants east and west of the Gap. Yet he wrote no book on the subject, and never claimed the honor of the discovery. Many people thought he loved hunting merely for the hardships he encountered; for he never grew rich, and often gave away what he had gained by weeks of toil; but he had only himself to provide for, and without a wife or children, and with no object of peculiar interest to engage his attention, he cared little whether he spent the night on the highest peak of Mount Washington, or in one of the valleys, seven or eight thousand feet below it. There was nobody to be anxious about him, or to count the live long hours while he was away, and he often boasted that his home was everywhere.

But this could not last always—for Nash was yet but a stripling, and it was not surprising that among his wanderings he should find a girl pretty enough to think it were well for a hunter to have a home. He told strange stories to Nancy, (for that was her name) of what dreadful precipices he had scaled, what chasms he had leaped, what fierce and blood-thirsty animals he had encountered, and she listened, like Desdemona, she lost her heart.

She was the gentlest of human beings, and though only a domestic, had a heart as tender, and a complexion as fair as any-born gentlewoman. It almost overwhelmed her to think of the hardships poor Nash endured, while she enjoyed the comforts of an old-fashioned kitchen corner, with a forest of logs blazing in the chimney, and the privilege of sitting at the table with the conscientious Puritan family, who would have thought it a sin to make a difference on earth, when the Supreme Being made none in heaven. It is not wonderful that when Nash proposed marrying Nancy, and promised to run no more "hair breadth scapes," she should listen to him and consent to become his lawful wife. But it was necessary that he should make another hunting excursion before they were married—he said he must go once more through his favorite gap of mountains, and bring back subsistence for the winter. It was in vain that Nancy assured him she would want nothing—Nash knew better, and after many a kind embrace set off, promising to be back in a very short time. Nancy's idea of time and his did not agree—weeks passed away, and the winter came on with its usual threatening aspect—at length she heard accidentally, that the hunter was about forty miles distant. The strange idea entered her head to go to him—it was wonderful that such a timid gentle being should have thought of such a thing—but she knew that next to herself, Nash loved the chase, and she feared that perhaps he might content himself with hunting bears and wolves all winter. The family tried hard to dissuade her from the wild scheme, but she determined to go—and as poor Nancy belonged to nobody, nobody had a right to control her. She wrapped herself in her cloak, and set off to follow her lover through the gap.

The snow was already deep, and there was not a house for many a long mile. Storm after storm came on—the family with which she had lived became anxious about her; they said, "it was distraction in her to go; it was tempting of Providence, and she must take the consequences." In the mean time, Nash was unusually successful, and began his course homeward laden with riches. It was just one week after Nancy's departure that he reached the little hill before mentioned. It was late at night; the whole earth was covered with crusted snow—you might walk on the hill top without making any impression. The trees were hung with icicles, and glittered in the moonlight like diamonds. Nash ascended the little hill, when he came into the valley through which the State runs—he loved such scenes and such evenings; he thought of Nancy, and wished she was there—he knew he could wrap her in his moose-skin and keep her warm. He was not apt to be imaginative, and yet all at once he thought he perceived his mistress standing opposite to him and leaning her head against a tree. He strained his eye-balls to look at the object. "Moonlight," said he, "makes strange works of things—my head is always full of her," and he looked another way—but when he turned she still stood there. He approached nearer; the moon never shone brighter, and not an object intercepted its beams—they fell upon the pale unearthly countenance of the maiden—her eyes were closed as if asleep—he took her hand; it was cold and hard like marble. Weary and benumbed, she had reclined against the tree—it was sweet to rest there and dream of her lover! She slept, and woke no more! Her form was slightly inclined forward, and the glittering branches bent over her, and her winding sheet was a robe of ice! Such is the tradition of Nancy's Hill.

THE GATHERER.

COURTSHIP IN "OLD VIRGINNY."

The ladies of Old Virginia have devised a new mode of winning hearts. Archery, that favorite sport of the olden time, has been revived, and Cupid's bow and arrows is no longer a fable tale, but an actual matter of the fact. The Petersburg Va. Intelligencer contains quite a lively account of this novel amusement as recently introduced and practised at Fauquier Springs, Va.

It consisted of "feats of Archery" by sundry gentlemen, arranged in two parties under the titles of the Reds and Blues. The unmarried ladies were divided into two parties of fifteen each; and each young lady selected her champion from among the aspirants for Hymeneal honors. The judges were matrons, aided by Benedicts chosen expressly to discharge the important duty of deciding which party won the prize. Lists were regularly laid out, rules drawn up, and all things done in true formal style. When the battle was once begun, with all the Company looking on, the scene became deeply interesting. The mark, very appropriately was a heart, and, men even being poor bunglers at this business, we may suppose some strange "shot" was exhibited. A champion of the "red" won the prize, and his "ladye faire" crowned him in good old fashioned style, while in the evening she figured as the "Queen of love and Beauty" at a ball.

P. S. We since learn that fatal and unexpected results have ensued from this dangerous sport. Some 15 or 20 matches have been made up—and as many bachelors of course, perfectly annihilated. We drop a tear of sympathy for our unfortunate brethren.—Hogun's Review.

BENEFIT OF CLERGY.

This was a privilege formerly possessed in England by all clergymen, and consisted in their exemption from trial for felony before the civil tribunals: when they were charged with a felonious crime, they were handed over to their own ecclesiastical courts. This privilege was afterwards modified in various ways, and was extended to all persons who could read, and also to women; and, practically, those who were entitled to the benefit of clergy were not punished for any crime, further than suffering a short imprisonment, and, at the discretion of the judge, being branded on the thumb or other words, none were hanged but unlettered persons. The privilege was, however, frequently broken through, and was reduced to little else than a name, by a statute of Queen Anne; it was formally abolished in the reign of George IV., since which event all persons are equal in the eye of the law. The term "benefit of clergy" is now used only in a jocose sense.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, OCT 31, 1840.

TERMS OF THIS PAPER.—To subscribers residing out of the city, $2 in advance—$2.50 if within six months, and $3, if not paid until the expiration of the year. BACK NUMBERS at all times furnished.

MASONIC PROSPECTS, &c.—We are indebted to an esteemed correspondent for the particulars of the recent installation of Mixville Lodge, No. — in the co. of Allegany, during the present month. The exercises are described as particularly expressive, and calculated to leave a favorable impression on the minds of the auditory. The installation was well attended, and so solemn and impressive were the proceedings, that many who came avowedly for the purpose of derision, left the house with mellowed feelings, acknowledging that they never had had a correct estimate of the true features of the Institution.

Br. Blanchard Powers as Grand Master, a veteran in the cause, performed his arduous duties to admiration, although now in his seventy-second year.

Br. Ebenezer Mix, delivered the Address, which is written in his clear and perspicuous style, and which does credit both to his head and heart. We shall insert it entire in our next paper.

Our correspondent in noticing the prospects in the "infected district," says, "Olive Branch Lodge, Bethany, is doing a fine business. Most of the applicants are men of years, whose characters are formed, and well known, and who would have joined long since, had it not been for the torpid state in which the institution has so long slumbered. They are all good men and true, possessing unblemished characters. The Batavia, [here is the place where the Morgan difficulties commenced] and Le Roy Chapters, which have long been in a slumbering state, have at length awoke, and will soon resume their labors as usual. Genesee Encampment, at Lockport, continues to do well.—In fact, every thing relative to the institution looks prosperous in this quarter of the vineyard. Brethren, who have lain dormant for years, deeming it impolitic, and even dangerous to buffet the waves of anti-masonry, are now rousing themselves, brushing up and putting on the armour of Faith, Hope and Charity, and there is now more healthy animation, and heartfelt devotion to the institution, manifested by a large number of masons in Western New York, than I ever saw before. Without wishing to flatter, I will say, that the Register has had a happy influence in this region, during the past year; it has awakened the right spirit among us, and I trust it may ever continue to do so, for the interest of the craft, and I hope all your reasonable expectations may be realized. Our Sun which has so long been in the West will ere long again burst forth from the East, with renewed splendor."

EXCHANGE IN BOSTON.—An attempt is being made to erect an exchange in Boston, on the site of the old State Bank, in Chesnut st. The cost is estimated at $310,000. All of which, except $65,000, has been subscribed.

Mr. Editor,

Allow me to ask Gov. Seward, when we are to have Thanksgiving. The other Governors are ahead of him, and our folks are fearful that there will be a scarcity of pumpkins and other good things.

UNCLE ZEB.

"TREAT THE DRIVER."—A case has been lately tried in N. Jersey, in which a Mr. Chapman claimed damages from the owners of certain stages for injuries sustained by him, in the upsetting of a stage. It was proved that the plaintiff, had repeatedly "treated the driver," although there was no evidence to show that the injury sustained was from that cause. The judge, however, charged, that "if the plaintiff gave the driver intoxicating drink, so that he became excited, and the driving became careless from that cause, he must take the consequences resulting from it." The jury gave the plaintiff $50. Passengers, hereafter, must look out, and "treat the driver," very moderately.

We copy in our paper to-day, the protest of the Jurors empanelled in the case of Mrs. Bradstreet.—Had any Juror made use of the same indecorous language, either in or out of court, he would undoubtedly have been committed for a contempt. We did suppose that in this government, there were no privileged order of persons, but we are mistaken. Many of the Jurors in this cause, we believe to be as fully competent to judge of the "mere right" of a question of common sense, as the learned judge himself, and for him to tell an American Jury, unless for cause, that they have "no respect for the court, or for their oath," smacks too strong of a certain Mr. Jeffrey's, of old fashioned memory to sit well on the palates of us plain republicans.

The Presbytery of New Brunswick, N. J. at their late meeting, recommended to their brethren the adoption of the gown in the public services.

CANAL TOLLS.—The amount received for tolls on the New York State Canals during the third week in October, is ninety thousand six hundred and forty-one dollars and fifty-two cents.

A number of hogsheads of the new crop of sugar, were received at New Orleans on the 14th inst.

We are requested to state, that Mr. W. Whale's Saturday evening parties, will commence on Saturday, Nov. 7, at Stanwix Hall.

The number of foreigners naturalized in the city of New York, in the months of September and October, are as follows:—Common Pleas 661, Superior 260, Marine 440, U. S. District Court 45. Total, 1406.

DEATH OF A U. S. SENATOR.—The Hon. John S. Spence, U. S. Senator from Maryland, died at his residence in Worcester county, on Thursday, October 22.

DUEL.—The New Orleans papers of the 17th inst., state that on the preceding day a duel was fought with rifles by two citizens of that place, on the Bayou road, in which one of the parties a creole named Spohn, was shot dead on the spot.

A new novel by Cooper has been published in London, and it is very well received. It is entitled Christopher Columbus, on Mercedes of Castile.

The city of Annapolis, Md., has a population of 2795. Richmond, Va. 30,552, The Northern Liberties, of Philadelphia, contains 34,487 inhabitants.

Mr. Michael Lampman, of Canandaigua, was killed a few days since in South Bristol, Ontario county, by the accidental discharge of a musket in the hands of Levi Tillison, while on a hunting excursion.

FIRE.—A fire broke out a little after 3 o'clock on Tuesday morning, in the extensive range of green and hot houses at Astoria, L. I., belonging to Mr. Geo. C. Thoburn. A strong S. W. wind was blowing at the time, which threatened the total destruction of that fine establishment. The loss is serious, having destroyed the Camellia Japonica Conservatory, in which were eight hundred of these valuable plants many of which were invaluable: also the hot house with its rare collection of Cacti and Aloes, and a Papiflora Alata—the largest plant in the country. The fire proceeded from some unknown cause near the furnace. The whole house had recently been put in complete repair. It would be difficult to replace some of the plants destroyed, on account of their size and rarity.—Loss, $7000. Insurance, $4000.—N. York Journal of Commerce.

THE BOUNDARY QUESTION.

BANGOR, Oct. 21, 1840.

Two of the young men who accompanied the boundary commissioners, have arrived in this city. I am informed that the whole ground has been carefully examined, and that the commissioners are on their return. Their report will probably come to us by the way of Washington; and until we get it, we must put up with such information as may casually fall from those connected with the expedition.

I am informed that there is not a doubt upon the minds of the commissioners, that the line claimed by the Americans is the true line; and that no person who makes the examination with the intention of ascertaining the truth, can arrive at any other conclusion.

HORRIBLE CASUALTY FROM SPIRIT GAS.—Mr. Paul Baker an industrious mechanic, was working on his bench at the tailoring business, at his residence, No. 171 Houston street, on the evening of Thursday last when, about 11 o'clock, his lamp, containing spirit gas, was upset, and the gas immediately caught fire. He and his wife, in trying to extinguish the flames, were burnt in horrible manner. Mrs. Baker, after some eight hours of excruciating agony expired. One of their children, was also badly burnt, as were also Mr. Baker's hands, face and legs—but there are hopes he will recover.—N. Y. Sun.

Western Pumpkins.—David Hawes, Esq., at Rock Island, (Ill.) raised three pumpkins this season upon one vine, of the respective weights of 120, 125 and 195 lbs.

It is said that the war in Florida is hereafter to be carried on with vigor. A portion of the W. I Squadron has been ordered to hover round the Keys, and will undoubtedly have the effect to drive the Indians elsewhere to perpetrate their depredations.

HIGHWAY ROBBERY.—A German Pedlar, named Wolf Neiberger, was robbed of $1900, at Forestburg, Sullivan county, N. Y., a few days since, by two footpads. The money had been drawn a day or two before from the bank, and was the savings of a number of years.

Dreadful Accident.—The barque Daniel Wheeler, while loading at Limas, was recently the scene of a truly awful occurrence. It appears that the stevedore by name Joseph Lerome, having descended into the hold of that vessel, to superintend the lowering of an enormous size log of mahogany, was in the act of stooping for some trivial purpose, when the wynch gave way, and the mass, weighing several tons was precipitated on the unfortunate man, literally crushed him to atoms.—Belilo Adv.

EXECUTION IN BOMBAY.—Six Hindoos were hanged in Bombay, in July last, for the murder of Captain Whiffin, of the barque Virginia, on the Malabar coast, in the month of December.

At Staten Island, Richmond co. state of N. York, on the 23d day of October inst. Margaret P. March, daughter of Lewis R. and Ann Marsh aged 19 years.

On the 1st September, at Menin, Mary Sheelluck. She was a native of Ghent, and in March, 1792, entered the 2d Belgian battalion, as a male volunteer.

On November 6th, in that year, she distinguished herself at the battle of Jemappes, and received six wounds. She afterwards entered the 30th demi brigade, (Bavaria,) and made the campaigns of Germany. She was next removed to the 8th Light Infantry, and displayed great bravery at the battle of Austerlitz, in which she received a severe wound in the thigh which led to the discovery of her sex. She, however, continued to follow the regiment, and, at last, she presented a petition with her own hand to Napoleon. The Emperor received her with marked distinction, placed her tenth on the list of lieutenants, and invested her with his own hands, with a cross of the Legion of Honor, which he himself had worn. In 1807, she was granted a pension of 673 fr. Her funeral, which was celebrated in the church of Menin, was attended by every member of the Legion of Honor belonging to the garrison, and an immense concourse of people.

TO THE PUBLIC.

The undersigned, recognitors of the grand assize in the case of Martha Bradstreet, demandant against Anson Thomas, tenant,—feeling themselves aggrieved by the unwarrantable charge made against them by Alfred Conkling, Esq. one of the judges of that court, that they had disregarded their oath,—think it due to the cause of public justice, as well as to their own characters, to publish the following statement of the transactions on the said trial so far as they relate to their conduct.

The said trial commenced on Tuesday the 20th inst. at the City Hall in this city, Judge Conkling, presiding, in the absence of the Hon. Smith Thompson, and was concluded on Friday evening, the 23rd inst.—After the evidence on both sides was closed, Judge Conkling stated to the counsel for the defendant, that he would not permit him to make any argument to the court, on any point of law which had been raised on any of the former trials of suits, brought by the said demandant against other tenants under the same claim, and which had been already decided by the said Judge Conkling (and which decision it was said comprehended all the points which could arise in this case, and had been published in a pamphlet some years since;) and the said judge also declared, that, if the grand assize should find a verdict for the demandant, he should feel it to be his duty to set it aside.

The counsel on both sides requested the court to instruct the grand assize in relation to the law applicable to the questions upon which they understood the grand assize would have to deliberate in making up their verdict. The counsel for the tenant first read from a written paper the points upon which he requested the Judge to instruct the grand assize, and the particular instructions which he wished the said judge to give; the counsel for the demandant then, in like manner, read the instructions which he desired to be given to the grand assize upon the several points which he specified. But the judge declined to give any particular instructions to the grand assize and declared his unwillingness to permit the counsel for the demandant to address the grand assize in support of the points upon which he had asked the instructions of the court.

The said judge then charged the grand assize briefly stating that there was no question of fact for them to pass upon, and saying in substance that the whole case resolved itself into a mere question of law, and that all the evidence produced by the demandant, altogether failed to make out any right in her; and that it was the duty of the grand assize to find a verdict for the tenant. After a few moments' delay, and perceiving that the grand assize did not seem inclined to render an instantaneous verdict, Judge Conkling said, "You can retire gentlemen, if you wish it;" and a constable being thereupon sworn to attend them, the grand assize retired about half past four in the afternoon, to deliberate upon the verdict.

After the grand assize had been out about four hours and before they had concluded upon a verdict, two of their number still holding out in their opinion against the rest, Judge Conkling ordered the grand assize to be brought into court about half past eight o'clock in the evening, without any request by them, or any of them, to that effect. Upon their coming into court, Judge Conkling addressed them in substance and to the effect following:

"I understand, gentlemen, that you cannot agree." No answer being immediately returned, he said "Have you agreed upon a verdict?" One of the grand assize answered that they had not. Judge Conkling then asked, "Is there any probability that you will agree?" One of the recognitors answered, "There appears to be no probability." Judge Conkling then said, "You may go home, you are discharged. And I take the occasion to make this remark, with regret, that those of you who have held out this length of time upon a mere question of law, have shown NO RESPECT FOR THE COURT OR FOR YOUR OATH." And the grand assize were thereupon discharged.

The oath which was administered to the grand assize was in the following words:—

"You swear that you will say the truth whether Anson Thomas hath more mere right to hold the tenements which Martha Bradstreet demands against him than her writ of right, or the said Martha Bradstreet to have them as she demands the same: so help you God."

The undersigned leave it to an impartial public to determine whether their taking four hours to deliberate upon the verdict which they should render in a cause, the trial of which occupied four days, and involved a large amount of property, is any proof that they "paid no respect to their oath;" and whether the true meaning of that oath is as Judge Conkling professes to interpret it, namely: You swear that you will say whatever the Judge directs you to.

POETRY.

From the London Despatch.

"GOOD BYE."

Farewell! farewell! is often heard
From the lips of those who part;
'Tis a whispered tone—'tis a gentle word,
But it springs not from the heart—
It may serve for the lover's closing lay,
To be sung 'neath the summer's sky;
But give me the sincere lips that say
The honest words—"Good bye!"

Adieu! Adieu! may greet the ear
In the guise of courtly speech;
But when we leave the kind and dear,
'Tis not what the soul would teach.
When'er we grasp the hands of those
We would forever nigh,
The flame of Friendship bursts and glows
In the warm frank words—"Good bye!"

The mother, sending forth her child
To meet with cares and strife,
Breathes thro' her tears, her doubts and fears
For the loved one's future life,
No cold "adieu," no "farewell" lives
Within her choking sigh;
But the deepest sob of anguish gives—
"God bless thee, boy! Good bye!"

Go, watch the pale and dying one,
When the glance has lost its beam—
When the brow is cold as the marble stone
And the world a passing dream;
And the last pressure of the hand,
The look of the closing eye,
Yield what the heart must understand,
A long—a last—"Good bye!"

CHANGE.

BY MISS L. E. LONDON.

The wind is sweeping o'er the hill;
It hath a mournful sound,
As if it felt the difference
Its weary wing hath found.
A little while that wandering wind
Swept over life and flower;
For there was green on every tree,
And bloom for every hour.

It wandered through the pleasant wood,
And caught the dove's lone song;
And by the garden bed, and bore
The rose's breath along.
But hoarse and sullenly it sweeps;
No rose is opening now—
No music, for the wood dove's nest
Is vacant on the bough.

Oh, human heart and wandering wind,
Go look upon the past;
The likeness is the same with each—
Their summer did not last.
Each mourns above the things it loved—
One o'er a flower and leaf;
The other over hopes and joys,
Whose beauty was as brief.

STANZAS.

By Henry Neele.

Suns will set, and moons will wane,
Yet they rise and wax again;
Trees, that Winter's storm's subdued,
Their leafy livery renew;
Ebb and flow is Ocean's lot:
But Man lies down and rises not:
Heaven and Earth shall pass away,
Ere shall wake his slumbering clay!

Vessels but to havens steer;
Paths denote a resting near;
Rivers flow into the main;
Lee-falls rest upon the plain;

The final end of all is known;
Man to darkness goes alone:
Cloud, and doubt, and mystery,
Hide his future destiny.

Nile, whose waves their boundaries burst
Slakes the torrid desert's thirst;
Dew, descending on the hills,
Life in nature's veins instils;
Showers, that on the parched meads fall,
Their faded loveliness recall;
Man alone sheds tears of pain,
Weeps, but ever weeps in vain!

THE BUTTERFLY.

The Butterfly was a gentleman,
O, no very good repute;
And he roved in the sunshine all day long.
In his scarlet and purple suit;
And he left his lady-wife at home
In her own secluded bower;
Whilst he, like a bachelor flirted about
With a kiss for every flower.

His lady-wife was a poor glow-worm,
And seldom from home she'd stir;
She loved him better than all the world,
Though little he cared for her.
Unheeded she passed the day—she knew
Her lord was a rover then;
But, when night came on, she lighted her lamp
To guide him over the glen.

One night the wanderer homeward came,
But he saw not the glow-worm's ray;
Some wild-bird saw the neglected one,
And flew with her far away.
—Then beware, ye Butterflies all beware
If to you such a time should come:
Forsaken by wandering lights, you'll wish
You had cherished the lamp at home.

OLD BACHELORS.

BY A LADY.

Old bachelors are hateful things,
Which ought to be despised,
With hearts like broken fiddle-strings,
And just as little prized.

Unguided to love's soft thrilling touch,
No pleasure do they know;
They feel not, and they taste not much
Of happiness below.

The joys of wedlock, which they spurn,
With all its num'rous cares—
E'en for a year should lov's lamp burn,
Are worth an age of theirs.

Was't but for them, the human race
Would soon be swept away;
And even earth, to their disgrace,
Would tumble to decay:

The social bond—that bond so sweet,
Where heart and soul unite;
Where friendship, love, and union meet
Would sink in endless night.

But 'tis in vain for me to prate,
I cannot make them clever,
Old bachelors I always hate,
And must and shall for ever.

THE POETRY OF LIFE.

'Tis night;—and, save the wind that shrieks
Through the dark willow, with a sound
Of hollow calmness, silence wrecks
Her gloomy strength on all around;
And in that gloom the bosom feels
A power that spurns the noisy strife
Of truant reason,—that reveals
The speechless Poetry of Life.
And lie hath poetry, unpened—
Untuned—unmeasured—and unsung,—
A minstrelsy too pure to lend
To harps which vulgar hands have strung,
And there are breasts which havenot known

The magic of this minstrelsy,
To whom love is like wine when thrown
Into the bosom of the sea.
Would it were thus with me, for now,
With the calm hour that evening brings,
There comes a strength, that seems to bow
The soul below even earthly things.
Not so in youth,—I felt it shoot
Thrilling from nerve to nerve along,
And some strange impulse checked my foot,
That might disturb the wondering song,
And left me looking on the sky,
While Fancy bore the soul above
Heaven, earth, and seas,—which to the eye
Yet seemed one Paradise of Love.
Oh youth! where is that musing air—
That heavenward look—that speechless tongue—
That ear intense which seemed to share
The themes which angel minstrels sung?
That was the music that could weep
Over the mingled tear and sigh,
Or smile like heaven upon the sleep
That shuts the wearied infant's eye;
But to the aching heart that turns
Away from earth's bewildered press,
It comes down with a strain that burns,—
The dirge of by-gone happiness!

MASONIC.

For the American Masonic Register.

ADDRESS

Delivered Oct. 7, 1840, at the public Installation of Mixville Lodge, No. — in the village of Mixville, town of Hume, Allegany county, N. Y. by EBENEZER MIX, and published by the request of the Lodge.

Brethren and Fellow Citizens.

From time immemorial it has been the custom among masons, on all occasions similar to the one, on which we have this day assembled, for some brother to address the audience, announcing the history, portraying the benefits, or defending the character of the order. At this time, the partiality of my brethren, or perhaps the exigencies of the occasion, has imposed that duty on me, and I only lament my inability to do better justice to the cause.

The antiquity of Freemasonry I shall not now attempt to prove, neither is it my present object to trace its history thro' the successive ages it has passed; it is sufficient for my present purpose, to assert that its origin is anterior to the records of man—that its principles, objects and designs—its rites, forms and ceremonies, have been the same in all ages—in all countries, and under all governments—always submitting with due deference to the usages, and even to the follies of the age—to the language and customs of the country, and the edicts and laws of the government, in which it existed—on whose air and soil it subsisted, and by the strength of whose arm it was protected.

Masonry has had its opponents from the first recorded testimony of its existence to the present time, and so has every other institution whether human or divine. This institution is viewed by the uninitiated in various lights; each has given it a character to suit his own jealous disposition—capricious fancy, or rational conviction. One class asserts that it is a powerful, altho' a corrupt, irreligious and dangerous institution. Another that it is altogether an imposition, consisting merely of pageantry and outward show, and too weak and simple to effect either good or harm.—And another class, altho' small, whose minds are a compound of credulity and superstition, who believe that the members possess literally mystical and supernatural powers, but from whence those powers are derived, whether from a good or an evil source they do not attempt to decide. And yet another class who are more candid and enlightened, (would they were more numerous,) who view it in a light far nearer the truth to wit, that it is a social, moral, charitable and religious institution, which can make men no worse, but is well calculated to make them better—that all its powers are exerted over the mind for beneficial purposes and all its mysteries, such only as are calculated to correct the morals—enlighten the understanding and refine the sentiments of man, without any supernatural agency.

I will proceed to specify some of the most prominent accusations brought against the institution by its opponents, which I shall endeavor to reply to, and refute, confining my present remarks to these subjects only.

- 1st That the masonic institution is a secret society.
- 2nd That the institution is dangerous as a political combination.
- 3rd That the institution is aristocratic.
- 4th That the order exercises undue exclusiveness in the admission of members.
- 5th That it is partial in bestowing charity and other benefits.
- 6th and last. That its rites, forms and ceremonies were instituted in the dark ages, and are behind the intelligence of the present age; likewise that they are puerile, insipid and frivolous.

Firstly, That the masonic institution is a secret society, within that meaning of the term to which any odium can be attached I deny. A secret society, properly speaking is a combination of persons, the existence of which is unknown, except to its members.—The masonic institution has been known, acknowledged and declared to exist in all civilized countries for many ages past; and the times and places of its meetings have been published to the world at all times—its principles and designs have been proclaimed by its members from the forum and the pulpit and have been published in gazettes, pamphlets and histories, wherever the art of printing, has been known.

That this institution has its secrets, I will not deny—every government, institution and society have their secrets,—every family has, or ought to have its secrets and it is no evidence of good sense or argument for us to have all that is known, said or done in governments, societies, and families, published or performed in the streets or on the house-tops; and their joys and their sorrows exposed to the envy, hatred and malice of a censorious world. To every reflecting mind it must be apparent that certain kinds of secrets, are the chief ligaments which bind society together, and renders civilized man above the brute creation.

I cannot dismiss this branch of my remarks without referring to the attempt of our opponents to render the institution odious by the falsehood and forgery which has been proclaimed and published for years past, from Louisiana to Maine and from the shores of the Atlantic to the Rocky Mountains, to wit, That Washington in his farewell address, warned his countrymen, to "BEWARE OF SECRET SOCIETIES."

There is scarce a reader in the United States, but what has often seen these four words printed in staring capitals, included within quotation points, and alleged to be an extract from the farewell address of Washington. If this were true and Washington had reference to the masonic society, it would have tarnished if not entirely eclipsed the lustre of his fair fame, now so bright and held so sacred in every American bosom. What! Washington the adhering member of a dangerous secret society, of which he warns his countrymen to beware, but to which he tenaciously adheres to the day of his death? No, brethren, and fellow-citizens—the whole is a forgery, manufactured and published for the basest of purposes. Neither of the words "Beware" "secret" or "societies" are to be found in the whole address, nor are there any words to be found therein, which can be distorted so as to appear to allude to the masonic society. Those who wish to palliate this foul forgery, point to the following sentence in the farewell address as the one to which the pretended extract refers—hear it—read it—weigh well its import, and I will venture to abide your decision whether it refers to the masonic society or not. It is in these words:

"All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations, under whatever plausible character with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe, the regular deliberation and action of the constitutional authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency: they serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force—to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation, the will of a party often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community, and according to the alternate triumphs of different parties to make the public administration, the mirror of the ill-concerted and incongruous projects of a faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans digested by common counsels and modified by mutual interests."

This, brethren and fellow citizens, is the whole amount of the long sounded alarm, said to be given by Washington against masonry. If this has any reference to the masonic society, it equally refers to every moral and religious society in community—but it refers to no such societies. It explicitly alludes to combinations and associations which are avowedly formed and maintained for political purposes, and even such associations it does not denounce or reprove, unless their real design is to direct, control, counteract or awe the constituted authorities; and in short unless their designs are treasonable and their aim at the subversion of the government of the nation.

Secondly, That the institution is dangerous as a political combination cannot be entertained for a moment. It is contradicted not only by the fact that all its constitutions, rules and regulations, bye-laws and charges, forbid the members meddling with politics in any manner as a masonic body or as masons. And that the discussion of, or the descanting or lecturing on any political question or subject, in any lodge, or other congregation of masons, as such, is likewise strictly prohibited. But the experience of ages has proved that these rules and regulations have been strictly adhered to, not only according to the letter but according to their spirit. How many individuals of all the different political parties, do we find in the masonic fraternity, and meeting in the same lodge, which in many cases is the only place where they do meet, divested of that political zeal and party rancor, which adds so much alloy to the enjoyment of social intercourse between man and man; at all other times and places, they are strenuously opposed to each other, and meet in collision in pursuit of every political object; but it is with pride I can say, that among all true masons, their zeal and rancor is much softened and controlled on such occasions by the fraternal relation in which they stand to each other. Yet was I a candidate for an elective office, and wished favoritism shewn me on account of belonging to any particular society, I would sooner join some popular religious society and depend on its members for favoritism, than I would ask it, or expect to receive it from the masonic fraternity.

This institution has existed under all civilized governments, and has never interfered with the concerns of any, altho' the most despotic have looked upon it with a jealous eye, on account of its republican or democratic principles. The pope of Rome who in ages past has held the control of, and been the acknowledged umpire between all the crowned heads of Europe, and arbiter of the fate of nations, has issued his bulls, and sent forth his anathemas against the order, and has caused the appalling horrors of the inquisition to be brought in requisition to suppress it.—The despots of several of the nations of that country, have at times used all their arbitrary powers to exterminate it in their respective dominions, and altho' many brethren have fallen martyrs to their faith, under the hands of these ruthless tyrants, the institution has escaped unscathed, and even uncondemned by its most inveterate enemies. Thro' all these persecutions, it has never been made to appear, that the masons, as such, interfered or attempted to interfere with the concerns of the governments under which they resided.—This amounts to almost proof positive, that they have in this matter, strictly adhered to the requirements of the order and to the course they were under obligations to pursue.

Thirdly, It is asserted that the institution is aristocratic.

How or where this idea could have originated, I know not, for a more democratic form of government never was instituted, than that by which all masonic bodies are conducted. Indeed the constitution of the United States appears to have been copied from its general outlines. In the masonic institution, the members of each subordinate lodge, elect their officers by ballot, for stated and short terms; and no brother thinks it derogatory to accept the lowest and most servile office, altho' he had previously filled the highest and most honorable with credit to himself and profit to the institution.

The three highest offices of all the subordinate lodges within a certain territory form the members of a

Grand Lodge, which elects its officers in the same manner and for similar periods as the subordinate lodges. The Grand Lodge grants charters for the establishment of all new lodges within its jurisdiction, and forms rules and regulations for its own government, as well as for the general government of all subordinate lodges of whose principal officers it is composed.—Chapters of Royal Arch Masons and Encampments of Knight Templars, have no connection with each other or, control one over the other or over lodges of master masons, altho' it is requisite that a person should be a master mason before he can become a Royal Arch Mason, and that he should receive the royal arch degree before he can be permitted to receive the orders of knight-hood.

In this institution every brother is literally on a level, and man is equal to his brother man at all times, except that inequality which must be submitted to, while in actual convocations, by the ephemeral elevation of some brethren to the necessary offices, and that inequality, caused by nature or habit of which no body of men can divest themselves, that which is ever marked by the performance of virtuous actions and proficiency in knowledge.

There has been but one proof of the aristocratic spirit and therefore dangerous tendency of the order attempted to be adduced, and of that I have taken no notice, it being too ridiculous to merit a serious refutation, which however is, the high sounding names and exalted titles, appended to some of the officers of the institution. If those names and appellations are really dangerous, a mandate should be immediately issued by the proper authority, that no person should give a child, black or white, the cognomen of Cæsar or Nero, for fear that he will one day or other, usurp the reins of government and become a despot and a tyrant.

Fourthly, Of the unjust exclusiveness of the Order.

To exempt the institution from this charge let me state one fundamental rule which governs all lodges; that is, every man of a sound discerning mind, possessing a good moral character, and believing in a Divine Overruling Power, a God—who shall regularly make application for admission, whether he is rich or poor, high or low, patrician, or plebeian is admitted into the order, all the brethren present, being fully convinced that the applicant possesses the qualifications aforesaid. But I have no doubt many well disposed persons are deceived as to the exclusiveness of the order, because they have not been invited, coaxed, nay dragged into it, as they may have been into other associations. To such I have to state that it is against the rules of the order to induce any particular individual to apply for admission, and no well instructed mason will even insinuate to an uninitiated person altho' it might be his son or brother, that it would be a benefit to him to join. We rely on this general invitation to the worthy—"Ask and ye shall receive,"—"Knock and it shall be opened unto you."

Under this head, would properly fall the reason for the exclusion of females from our labors and our enjoyments. To explain this peculiar trait in the character of the order, will take me farther back into its history, than I had design'd to extend my researches, but, as an explanation is due to that fairest portion of creation, I will over-step the bounds I had prescribed for my remarks.

From history and from tradition, it is evident that, freemasonry was first instituted by operative mechanics and intended to counter-balance the weight of character of the nobles, and those professing to belong to the higher classes of society, and, bring the mechanic on an equality with them, as to enjoyments, as well as to produce union in asserting their rights. In which case it could not be expected that females would be included. It may be asked why masons among all other mechanics first and exclusively formed a separate society? I answer, that, in the first ages of civilization, a local habitation was the first want that suggested itself to the necessities of mankind. Such tools as are now common for the working of wood, were then unknown and stone was the first object, which presented itself to their conceptions, whereof to construct durable edifices, and in countries where stones were scarce, and rain almost unknown, as in Egypt, clay moulded and dried or baked was used as a substitute; therefore, masonry became the first and paramount of the mechanic arts, and took the lead of all others.

After the lapse of ages, when the benefits of the society, had become apparent to all, and it was viewed with a jealous eye, by the higher ranks of society, who were not artisans—it became what is now styled speculative freemasonry, and kings, princes and nobles joined the order. Altho' the institution had now in a great measure come into the hands of another class of men, so great deference did they pay to its ancient forms and ceremonies that they punctiliously adhered to, and adopted them for the foundation of other degrees and orders, which they created thereon. These latter, formed degrees and orders, either grew out of, or were made to conform to the chivalry of the times, the members were now obligated to defend and protect, the innocent, destitute and helpless, especially of the female sex, and to wield their swords in defence of religion. Of this association, the females could not with propriety be members, for they were the defended, not the defenders, the protected, not the protectors.

Fifthly, Of the partiality of masons, in bestowing charity, &c.

On this subject I have little to say, for the whole is told in a few words. Every mason when he joins a lodge, contributes to a fund, for the assistance and support of the necessitous and worthy brethren, their families, widows and orphan children. This is a trust fund, to which the contributors, their families &c. have a right in preference to all others who are similarly situated, and when this fund is distributed to those who have not such claim, it may well be doubted, whether it is not a dereliction of duty in the trustees; but that such a distribution has often been made under peculiar circumstances, many brethren present, will bear me witness. Few persons unconnected with masonic bodies, know or suspect the extent to which the institution has proceeded in charitable offices, according to a charge of the order where it gives alms, it letteth not its left hand, know what its right hand doeth. And of charity it vaunteth not, neither is it puffed up.

Thus much for the disposition of the funds of the institution by the way of charity. But of the charity of the individual members, the constant charge to them is, "Let your charity extend unto all men, but more especially to the brotherhood," and I will venture to assert without the fear of contradiction, that the masonic brethren, as individuals, (in proportion to their numbers and ability) perform more charitable services and expend more time and means, for charitable purposes, to benefit those not belonging to the order, than any other class of society; and of their charity in the broad sense of the term, which extends to thoughts and words as well as deeds, as manifested by them to mankind generally. I defy the world to produce so good an example in any other sect, society or association, religious or irreligious, as they have ever shewn and at present practice. They make war with no other sect, society or institution, but extend the hand of charity, in its broadest sense to mankind generally, professing whatever creed or belonging to whatever persuasion; and even to their most inveterate but misguided enemies.

Sixthly and Lastly, Of the rites, forms and ceremonies of the institution.

It is asserted that our rites, forms and ceremonies were established in the dark ages of the world and are behind the intelligence of the present. On this subject, our opponents know nothing, but suppose their assertions to be correct, what does it prove? It proves conclusively, that we are determined to adhere to the old land-marks rendered venerable by time and having been passed thro' by the saints and sages—the great and the good of former ages—by our Washington, our Warren, our Franklin, our Jefferson, our Tompkins and our Clinton, together with a host of other worthies of the last. It proves that we are resolved to preserve the purity of the stream, as it first flowed from the fountain, unadulterated by the filthy poisonous and bitter waters, which might contaminate it, if innovations were allowed to be made in the present age.

Again, our opponents assert that our rites, forms and ceremonies are puerile, insipid and frivolous, their ignorance of the whole matter is again boldly asserted but suppose their fancied description of those rites forms and ceremonies is substantially correct, how can they judge of their worth, who have never participated in their application. I ask, what rites, forms, or ceremonies have been adopted or performed by mankind, either of a moral or religious nature, from the description of which a ridiculous farce could not be made by persons bent on ridicule, to operate on those who had never soberly and feelingly passed through them and participated in their solemnities. I ask you brethren and fellow citizens as a religious and christian congregation, what an absurd and foolish representation, might not be made by an infidel, of the administration of the holy sacrament of the Lord's Supper, as practised in most christian churches—for the more sublime, solemn and impressive the original, the more absurd and ridiculous the caricature can be made to appear—But I will not proceed to explain—the theme is too sacred to dwell upon. I will leave it to your own imaginations, to fill out the sacrilegious picture.

Brethren and Fellow Citizens.

How well I have succeeded in replying to, and refuting these charges, you must decide. But I can assure you, that every statement and assertion I have made, has been done in truth and soberness, in plain and simple language, void of sophistry and technical mystification, not wishing to deny or extenuate, any of the frailties of the institution or its members, for I am well aware that all human institutions are more or less subject to the frailties of man, and are liable to include vicious members. Neither have I intended to exaggerate its benefits, I certainly have not portrayed a very seductive picture of it, for the grasp of political ambition, avaricious cupidity or hypocritical sanctity. Far be it from me, to wish to see the masonic institution again, what the world calls a popular society. No moral association or religious sect, however pure in its first organization, can withstand the blighting effects of becoming a popular society and retain its pristine purity: for it will soon be sought after and embraced by the base hypocrite, designing knave, and aspiring demagogue, as a cloak for their unhallowed purposes, and as a stepping-stone, on which to mount to unpermitted preferment—and those leprous branches will more or less affect the whole body.—Such was the state of the masonic institution in this region of country, some fifteen years ago, whereby it received a paralyzing shock, from which however, it is rapidly reviving, and may it never again be required to pass thro' such an ordeal. And my brethren, it is for us to prevent the recurrence of such a catastrophe in our day—by guarding well the approaches from without, and correcting abuses within—by following strictly, the ancient landmarks, rules and regulations of the order. And finally by causing our light so to shine before man, that they seeing our good works, may glorify our Father which is in Heaven.

CHARACTER.

No man was ever destined to be great whose disposition and manners change with circumstances. We like to see the grand features of a man's character distinctly marked, and capable of being traced through every period of his life, from boyhood to old age. We do not like to see the plain-hearted, blunt, and sincere boy become a fashionable equivocator when he begins to turn into man. We do not like to see his honest bluntness give way to a sort of amiable, please every body temper, when he mixes with the world and finds it good policy to keep on the right side of all kinds of men and women. That temper and that description of manners which can abide the sun and the storm, great gives character to the man. We like to see the boy who has ways, and manners, and feelings of his own—who cannot be moulded into any shape that silly and hypocritical parents choose to give him for a model. We like to see the young man who will sooner be banished from under the roof of a weak minded father than be moulded in a dull, common place man of business, and be made a traitor to truth and God, for the sake of a reputation among worldlings and Pharisees—Eglantine.

MISCELLANY.

[From the Tatler.]

UP AND DOWN—A SKETCH.

In the absence of any matter of interest at the Watch House this morning, we shall trouble the reader with a hasty sketch of a part of the eventful history of a man with whom we had at one time a personal acquaintance. Doubtless hundreds of our readers in this city, will be able to bear testimony to the facts we relate; while in the city of Dublin, where the individual spoken of resides, every person, above the age of childhood, is familiar with them.

George Home, a Scotchman, and our hero, arrived in Dublin some twenty five years ago, and engaged himself as journeyman confit maker to a person named Miller, who kept a very extensive confectionary establishment at No. 3 Grafton street. Home also acted in the capacity of a shopman, and waiter; and for his combined services, received a salary (independent of his board) of about eight shillings sterling, a week. His character was that of an honest, steady, stupid man, and no one suspected him of possessing any talents, or even a fair share of common sense; as, on the contrary, he was to all appearance a very great mope, though a tolerable good confit maker.

The reader may have heard something in his time about the Queen Anne farthings, without perhaps knowing what their celebrity consisted in. The mystery is this; in the reign of Queen Anne, for some reason or other, which has never been thoroughly explained, there were only three farthings coined; and hence, after her death they were regarded as great curiosities, and sought for by the British museum. However, they were not to be had; for one of them was known to be lost at sea—another, had been purchased for the collection of a private curiosity monger and the third was lost sight of. The museum then offered eight hundred pounds sterling for the missing coin; but without any immediate effect; and so matters rested for upwards of an hundred years.

Well, one day George Home observed some coppers lying on Mr. Miller's parlor mantel piece, and among the rest a farthing: this he examined, and put in his pocket taking the precaution, however, to insist upon paying Mrs. Miller a penny for it, which afterwards led to the discovery. This farthing, as the reader will have supposed, was the missing Queen Anne, and before a week had elapsed, Home had presented it to the Directors of the British Museum, and received the eight hundred pounds, as well as the honor of having his picture hung up in the great hall of the establishment as one of its principal patrons.

When Home returned to Dublin, Miller preferred a charge of felony against him for stealing the farthing and he was put in jail; then a baker, named Johnson, who had given the farthing in change to Miller's servant girl, claimed a right to the treasure; and then several others; but when an examination took place they were all non-suited, and Home was discharged from custody with the money in his pocket.

At this time the Dublin post office had been removed from College Green, to Sackville street, and the old building, occupying a large tract of ground in the very heart, and valuable part of the city, was to be let or sold. Home saw it, and the idea immediately struck him of purchasing it, and converting it into an Arcade. Knowing, however, that in the carrying out of such a sublime project, his eight hundred pounds would be only a drop in the bucket, he merely secured the refusal of the ground and buildings for a fortnight, and in the meantime waited on several capitalists with his plan, which seemed so feasible, that a company was at once formed, and the necessary money advanced.

Home then set to work with such diligence that in less than a year from the laying of the first stone the city of Dublin boasted of the most beautiful Arcade in the world. We have neither space or time to describe it particularly, but the reader may form some idea of its magnificence when we inform him, that, up stairs and down, it contained at least an hundred stores besides a splendid hotel, shooting gallery, et hilibian rooms et cetera, et cetera, to the end of the chapter.

The Arcade naturally became all the rage; indeed, for a long time, no fashionable person thought of purchasing any thing out of it; and until its destruction by fire, about three years ago, it continued to be a great place of business, and the popular resort of the city.

In the formation of the company, Mr. Home had secured to himself the right of purchasing all the shares from the other members on the payment of a certain bonus; and the profits of the concern were so enormous that in less than five years he had it altogether in his own hands, and had now the reputation—and justly so—of making more money than any man in the city.

It need scarcely be said he was no longer the mope he had been, while making confits for Mr. Miller. On the contrary, there was no man in Dublin that could hold a candle to him in activity and business manœuvres. He opened offices here—and stores there. He had elegant confectionary establishments clotted all over the city. He purchased up houses innumerable, loaned money on mortgage to every one—became partner with several merchants. And among his other speculations, began to look up an extinct earldom, which he said pertained to his family in the "Land of Cakes," and which, we understand, was really the fact. In short, there was no end to the iron he had in the fire; and it would seem as if each of them was employed to a good purpose; for the time speedily arrived when public opinion gave him credit for being worth about two millions sterling, or nearly ten millions of dollars.

But withal, Mr. Home didn't think he was making money fast enough; not that by any means a miser, but that it was his ambition to astonish the country by the brilliancy of his speculations. Day and night he thought he would go for a master stroke—a chef d'œuvre when the idea came into his mind to erect a hotel, and a public market, in which he might concentrate the business of the whole city.

To this end he bought up several blocks of houses in a beautiful part of the city, bordering on the river Liffey, and called Ushers Island; and here the objects of his desire sprang into existence with almost the rapidity of a couple of Aladin's palaces. They were the largest buildings of the sort in Dublin—perhaps in the world, and in a short time after their completion, promised to realize the anticipations of the proprietor; for the hotel combined elegance and comfort with economy; and the influx of guests to it was so great, that their custom alone, independent of its other resources in an extensive city, would have made the market a tolerable place of business.

Mr. Home now went to all the proprietors of the mail and stage coaches, and proposed to them that all their coaches entering the city, no matter from which side, should drive direct to his hotel, so that the passengers might have the first chance of stopping there. His request some granted, but the major part refused when Mr. Home, in revenge, started opposition coaches on the routes of all those who declined to come into his measures. This, of course, had the effect of filling his hotel to overflowing, all the time—and of bruiting his name throughout the country as the greatest man in it, and every one was of opinion that he was clearing money at the rate of a fortune a day, for besides Arcade stores, sleeping partnerships, market, hotel, &c., he had upwards of a hundred coaches running here and there throughout the country, all doing a large business; for as these were only the auxiliaries to his great city establishment, he was enabled to run for prices that would have been ruin to the opposition.

George Home was now at the pinnacle of his glory—it seemed as if he could convert whatever he touched into gold; he could have almost purchased the city of Dublin on his I O U; and in short, there never was one man besides himself who had become so wealthy and famous, in the way of trade, and by his own exertions, in so short a time, or, in indeed, in any time.

While things were in his state with our hero, we left the city of Dublin; but alas, when we heard from it, about five years afterwards, (about four years ago) how the world had sadly changed with him! Vaulting ambition had o'erleaped itself with a vengeance. Arcades, stores, coaches, every thing had passed away like trappings of a dream, and George Home had actually become a waiter in his famous hotel. Under the circumstances, any man but a Scotchman would have committed suicide.

A TURKISH ANECDOTE.

Some years ago, a French frigate being at Boodyroom, the commander expressed a great desire to see the marbles of the fortress; but the then governor absolutely refused to admit him, without direct orders from the Porte. The commander had interest; the ambassador was set to work; and in a short time the frigate returned, bearing the necessary firman. The governor put it to his forehead, in acknowledgement of its authority, and declared his readiness to proceed. Arrived at the outer gate, "Effendi," said the governor, "the orders of my Imperial master must be implicitly obeyed." "Let me in, then," exclaimed the impatient captain. "Undoubtedly," replied the Turk, "for so I am enjoined to do by the firman: but as it contains no directions about your coming out again, you will perhaps forgive this momentary pause, before we shall pass the drawbridge." The French commandant, not choosing to put such hazardous irony to the test, departed.

FIGURES OF SPEECH.—Exemplified by various extracts from political papers, which if people don't understand, it is their own fault.

HYPERBOLE.—The country has come at length to its everlasting ruin. Better that our throats had been cut six months ago, than live to see the way that our enemies have obtained a majority in this country. Fellow citizens, you that love your children, tie stones around their necks and drown them in the first mill-dam. Their prospects of earthly happiness have vanished, and it is now mercy and parental tenderness to massacre them as soon as possible.—Hopewell Honey-suckle.

PERSONIFICATION.—Ye paving stones that lie in piles where the workmen have been repairing that common sewer, why do ye not rise spontaneously and fly indignantly at the head of that rabid monster whose sole study is to attack the liberties of his country?—Ye hoop-poles standing in bundles at the door of that cooper,—why do you not become the furies of retribution and bang the back of that villain who had sold his birthright for a mess of clam soup.—Thackeray Speaking Trumpet.

Advantage of Ignorance.—The following circumstance took place in a neighboring town a short time since. A fellow hearing there was a letter for him in the Post-Office, accordingly went for it. On the Post Master's handing it to him, he frankly confessed he could not read, and requested the Post Master to open it, and let him know the contents, which he very readily did. After getting all the information he wanted, he knowingly shrugged up his shoulders, thanked him for his politeness, and drily observed, "When I have some change I will call for it."

A DEATH BED.

Death is a wonderful reasoner many a proud infidel hath it humbled and refuted without a word, who but a short time before would have defied all the ability of man to shake the foundation of his system.—All is well so long as the curtain is up and the puppet show of life goes on; but when the rapid representation draws to a close, and every hope of longer respite is precluded, things will appear in a very different light. Would to God, I could say, that that great and awful moment was as often distinguished by the dew of repentance, as the groan of despair.

THE FIRE AT SALEM, N. Y.—There appears but little doubt that the fire in this village, of which we published an account last week, was the work of an incendiary. The trustees of the village of Salem have offered a reward of $250, the highest sum allowed by the charter, for the arrest of the incendiary. The citizens of the town have added $750 to this sum making the whole amount of the offered reward $1000. At a meeting of the citizens of the village, a committee of nine was appointed to solicit donations and subscriptions on behalf of the sufferers by the conflagration.

POPULAR TALES.

STORIES OF THE IRISH PEASANTRY.

BY MRS. S. C. HALL.

"Mind not high things: but condescend to men of low estate."
ST. PAUL.

"DO YOU THINK I'D INFORM?"

JAMES HARRIGAN was as fine a specimen of an Irishman as could be met with in our own dear country, where the "human form divine," if not famous for very delicate, is at least celebrated for very strong proportions: he was, moreover, a well-educated, intelligent person: that is to say, he could read and write, keep correct accounts of his buying and selling, and managed his farm, consisting of ten good acres of the best land in a part of Ireland where all is good (the Barony of Forth) so as to secure the approbation of an excellent landlord, and his own prosperity. It was a pleasant sight to see the honest farmer bring out the well-fed horse and the neatly appointed car, every Saturday morning, whereon his pretty daughter Sydney journeyed into Wexford, to dispose of the eggs, butter, and poultry, the sale of which aided her father's exertions.

Sydney was rather an unusual name for a young Irish girl; but her mother had been housekeeper to a noble lady, who selected it for her, though it assimilated strangely with Harrigan. The maiden herself was blithe cheerful, industrious, and of a gentle loving nature; her brown affectionate eyes betokened, as brown eyes always do, more of feeling than of intellect, and her red lips, white teeth, and rich dark hair, entitled her to the claim of rustic beauty. Her mother had been dead about two years, and Sydney, who during her lifetime was somewhat inclined to be vain and thoughtless, had as her father expressed it, "taken altogether a turn for good," and discharged her duties admirably as mistress of James Harrigan's household. She had five brothers, all younger than herself; the two elder were able and willing to assist in the farm, the juniors went regularly to school.

Sorrow for the loss of his wife had both softened and humbled James Harrigan's spirit; and when Sydney, disdaining any assistance, sprang lightly into the car, and seated herself in the midst of her rural treasures, her father's customary prayer, "Good luck to you, Sydney, my darling," was increased by the prayer of "May the Lord bless you, and keep you to me, now, and till the day of my death!"

The car went on, Sydney laughing and nodding to her father while he smiled and returned her salutation, though, when she was fairly out of sight, he passed the back of his rough hand across his eyes, and muttered, "I almost wish she was not so like her mother! When James entered his cottage, he sat by the fire, and, taking down a slate that hung above the settle, began to make thereupon sundry calculations, which I do not profess to understand; how long he might have continued so occupied, I cannot determine, for his cogitations were interrupted by the entrance of a gentleman, who was by his side ere he noticed his approach. The usual salutation were exchanged; the best chair dusted, and presented to the stranger; every thing in the house was tendered for his acceptance. "His honor had a long walk, would he have an egg or a rasher for a snack; Sydney was out but Bessy her cousin was above in the lott, and would get it or any thing else in a minute; or maybe he'd have a glass of ale—good it was—Cherry's ale—no better in the kingdom." All Irishmen—and particularly so fine and manly a fellow as James—to be seen to advantage, should be seen in their own houses—Cabins I cannot call such as are tenanted by the warm farmers of this well-cultivated district.

Mr. Herrick, however, could not be tempted; he would not suffer the rasher to be cut, nor the ale to be drawn, and James looked sad because his visitor declined accepting his humble but cheerful hospitality.

"James," said Mr. Herrick, "I am glad I found you at home and alone, for I wanted to speak with you. I have long considered you superior to your neighbors. I do not mean as a farmer—though you have twice received the highest prizes which the Agricultural Society bestow—but as a man."

James looked gratified, and said he was so.

I have found you, James, the first to see improvement, and to adopt it, however much popular prejudice might be against it. You have been ever ready to listen to and act upon the advice of those who your reason told you were qualified to give it; and you have not been irritated or annoyed when faults, national or individual, have been pointed out to you which can be and ought to be remedied."

"I believe what your honor says is true; but sure it's proud and happy we ought to be to have the truth told of us—it is what does not always happen; if it did, poor Ireland would have had more justice done her long ago than ever came to her share yet."

"And that, James, is also true," said Mr. Herrick: "the Irish character has not only its individual differences, which always must be the case, but it has its provincial, its baronial distinctions."

"Indeed, sir," replied Harrigan, "there can be no doubt about that; we should be sorry, civilised as we are here, to be compared to the wild rangers of Connaught, or to the staid, quiet, tradesman-like people of the north."

"The northerners are a fine prudent people," said Mr. Herrick, "notwithstanding your prejudice; but what you have said is only another proof that persons may write very correctly about the north of Ireland, and yet, unless they see the south, form a very limited, or it may be, erroneous idea of the character of the southerners. The Irish are more difficult to understand than people imagine. You are a very unmanageable people, James," added the gentleman, good humouredly.

"Bedad, sir, I suppose you're right; some of us are, I dare say. And now, sir, I suppose there is a reason for that."

"There is," answered his friend. "You are an unmanageable people, because of your prejudices."

"That's your old story against us, Mr. Herrick," said James: "and yet you can't deny but I've been often led by your honor, and for my good, I'll own to that."

"James," continued his friend, "will you answer me one question? Were you, or were you not, at Gerald Casey's on Monday week?"

"James's countenance fell, it positively elongated, at the question. So great was the change, that those who did not know the man might have imagined he had committed a crime, and anticipated immediate punishment. "At Gerald Casey's?" he repeated.

Mr. Herrick drew a letter—a soiled, dirty-looking letter—from his pocket, and slowly repeated the question.

"I was, sir," he answered resting his back against the dresser, and pressing his open palms upon the board, as if the action gave him strength.

"Who was there, James?"

"Is it who was in it, sir? Why there was—Bedad, sir there was—Oh, then, it's the bad head I have at remembering—I forget who was there." And the countenance of James assumed, despite his exertions, a lying expression that was totally unworthy his honest nature.

"James," observed Mr. Herrick, "you used not to have a bad memory. I have heard you speak of many trifling acts of kindness my father showed you when you were a boy twelve years old."

The farmer's face was in a moment diffused with crimson, and he interrupted him with the grateful warmth of an affectionate Irish heart. "Oh, sir, sure you don't think I'm worse than the poor dog that follows night and day at my foot? You don't think I've no heart in my body?"

"I was talking of your memory," said Mr. Herrick, quietly; "and I ask you again to tell me who were at Gerald Casey's on Monday week?"

"I left Gerald Casey's before dusk, sir; and it's what took me in it was—"

"I don't ask you when you left it, or what took you there. I only ask you were present?"

James saw there was no use in equivocating, for that Mr. Herrick would be answered. He was, as I have said an excellent fellow; yet he had in common with his countrymen, a very provoking way of evading a question; but, anxious as he was to evade this, he could not manage it. Mr. Herrick looked him steadfastly in the face, that heslowly answered, "I'd rather not say one way or other who was there or who was not there. I've an idea, from something I heard this morning, before the little girl went into Wexford, that I know now what your honor's driving at. And sure," and his face deepened in color as he continued—"and sure, Mr. Herrick, do you think I'd inform?"

Mr. Herrick was not astonished at the answer he received. On the contrary, he was quite prepared for it and prepared also to combat a principle that militates so strongly against the comfort and security of those who reside in Ireland.

"Will you," he inquired, "tell me what you mean by the word 'inform'?"

"It's a mean dirty practice, sir," replied Harrigan, "to be repeating every word one hears in a neighbor's house."

"So it is," answered the gentleman; "an evil, mean practice to repeat what is said merely from a love of gossip. But suppose a person, being accidentally one of a party, heard a plot formed against your character, perhaps your life, and not only concealed the circumstance, but absolutely refused to give any clue by which such a conspiracy could be detected—"

"Oh, sir," interrupted Harrigan, "that's nothing here nor there. I couldn't tell in the grey of the evening who went in or out of the place; I had no call to any one, and I don't want any one to have any call to me."

"You must know perfectly well who was there," said Mr. Herrick. "The case is simply this: a gentleman in this neighborhood has received two anonymous letters, attacking the character of a person who has been confidentially employed by him for some years. James Harrigan, you know who wrote those letters; and I ask you, how, as an honest man, you can lay your head upon your pillow and sleep, knowing that an equally honest man may be deprived of the means to support his young family, and be turned adrift upon the world through the positive malice of those who are envious of his prosperity and good name."

James looked very uncomfortable, but did not trust himself to speak.

"I repeat, you know by whom these letters are written."

"As I hope to be saved!" exclaimed James, "I saw no writing—not the scratch of a pen!"

"Harrigan," continued Mr. Herrick, "it would be well for our country if many of its inhabitants were not so quick at invention."

"I have not told a lie, sir."

"No, but you have done worse—you have equivocated. Though you did not see the letter written, you knew it was written; and an equivocation is so cowardly, that I wonder an Irishman would resort to it, a lie is in itself cowardly, but an equivocation is more cowardly still."

Harrigan for a moment looked shilalas and crab-thorns at his friend, for such he had frequently proved himself to be, but made no further observation, simply confining himself to the change and reception of the sentences—"Do you think I'd inform?" "Not one belonging to me ever turned informer."

"Am I then," said Mr. Herrick, rising, "to go away with the conviction that you know an injury has been done to an innocent person, and yet will not do any thing to convict a man guilty of a most assassination?"

"A what, sir?"

"A moral murder."

"Look here, sir; one can't fly in the face of the country. If I was to tell, my life would not be safe either in or out of my own house; you ought to know this. Besides, there is something very mean in an informer."

"It is very sad," replied Mr. Herrick, "that a spirit of combination for evil more than for good destroys the confidence which otherwise the gentry and strangers would be disposed to place in the peasantry of Ireland. As long as a man fears to speak and act like a man, so long as he dare not hear the proud & happy sound of his own voice in condemnation of the wicked, and in praise of the upright—so long, in fact, as an Irishman dare not speak what he knows—so long and no longer, will Ireland be insecure, and its people scorned as cowards!"

"As cowards!" repeated James indignantly.

"Ay," said Mr. Herrick; "there is a moral as well as a physical courage. The man, who in the heat of battle, faces a cannon ball, or who, in the hurry and excitement of a fair or pattern, exposes his bare head to the rattle of shell and clan-alpines without shrinking from punishment or death, is much inferior to the man who has the superior moral bravery to act in accordance with the dictates of his own conscience, and does right while those around him do wrong."

I dare say that's all very true, sir, said James, scratching his head; adding, while most anxious to change the subject, "It's a pity yer honor wasn't a councillor or a magistrate, a priest, minister, or squire itself, then you'd have great sway entirely with your words and your learning."

"Not more than I have at present. Do you think it is a wicked thing to take away the character of an honest man?"

"To be sure I do, sir."

"And yet you become a party to the act."

"How so sir?"

"By refusing to bring, or assist in bringing, to justice those who have endeavored to ruin the father of a large family. Do you believe so many murders and burnings would take place if the truth was spoken?"

"No, sir."

"That's a direct answer from an Irishman for once. If the evil-disposed, the disturbers of the country, knew that truth would be spoken, disturbances would soon cease; you believe this, and yet, by your silence, you shield those whom you know to be bad, and despise with all your heart and soul."

"I don't want to have any call to them one way or other, good, bad, or indifferent," answered James.

"Very well," said Mr. Herrick, thoroughly provoked at the man's obstinacy, and rising to leave the cottage; "you say you wish to have no call to them. But mark me, James Harragan: when the spirit of anonymous letter-writing gets into a neighborhood—when wicked-minded persons can destroy either a man's reputation or his life with equal security, there is no knowing where the evil may stop, or who shall escape its influence. The knowledge of the extent to which these secret conspiracies are carried, deters capitalists from settling amongst us; they may have security for their money, but they have none for their lives; if they offend by taking land, or offering opposition to received opinions, their doom may be fixed; those whom they have trusted will know of that doom, and yet no one will come forward to save them from destruction!"

"Sir," said Harragan, "secret information is sometimes given."

"I would accept no man's secret information," answered Mr. Herrick, for he was an upright man, perhaps too uncompromising for the persons with whom he had to deal; "justice should not only be even-handed, but open-handed; it is a reproach to a country when the law finds it necessary to offer rewards for secret information. I wish I could convince you, James, of the difference which exists between a person who devotes his time to peeping and prying for the purpose of conveying information to serve himself, and him who speaks the truth, from the upright and honorable motive of seeing justice to his fellow-creatures."

"I see the difference clear enough, sir," replied the farmer; "but none of my people ever turned informers. I'll have no call to it, and no use saying any more about the matter; there are plenty of people in the country can tell who was there as well as I—I'll have no call to it. When I went in the place, I little thought of who I'd meet there, and I'll go bail it's long before I'll trouble it again. There's enough said and done now."

"A good deal said, certainly," rejoined Mr. Herrick, "but nothing done. There are parts of the country where I know that my entering into this investigation would endanger my life, but, thank God, that is not the case here. I will pursue my investigation to the uttermost, and do not despair of discovering the delinquent."

"I hope you may with all my heart and soul, sir," replied the farmer.

"Then why not aid me? If you are s'n ere, why not assist?"

And again James Harragan muttered, "Do you think I'd inform?"

"I declare, before heaven!" exclaimed Mr. Herrick "you are the most provoking people under the sun to deal with."

"I ask your honor's pardon," said James, slyly; "but you have not lived long enough in foreign parts to know that."

"Your readiness will not drive me from my purpose. I repeat you are the most provoking people in the world to deal with. Convince an Englishman or a Scotchman, and having convinced his reason you may be certain he will act upon that conviction; but you have never convinced your reason may be, continue to act from the dictates of your prejudice. Remember this, however, James Harragan; you have refused to pluck out the arrow which an unseen hand has planted in the bosom of an excellent and industrious man—take care that the same invisible power does not aim a shaft against yourself!"

Mr. Herrick quitted the cottage more in sorrow than in anger; and after he was gone, James Harragan thought over what he had said; he was quite ready to confess its truth, but prejudice still maintained its ascendancy. "Aim a shaft against myself," he repeated "I don't think any of them would do that, though I'm sorry to say many as good and better than I, have been forced to fly the country through secret malice, it is bad thing, but times 'ill mend, I hope."

Alas! James Harragan is not the only man in my beloved country who satisfies himself with hoping that times will mend, without endeavoring to mend them. "Aim a shaft against myself," he again repeated. "Well, I'm sure what Mr. Herrick said is true; but, for all that I couldn't inform!"

"The fact was, that, reason as he would, James could not get rid of his prejudice; he could not make the distinction between the man who turns the faults and vices of his fellow-creatures to his own account, and he who for the good of others, simply and unselfishly sneaks the truth."

Time passed on: Mr. Herrick of course, failed in his efforts to discover the author of the anonymous letter; the person against whom it was directed, although protected by his landlord, was ultimately obliged to leave his employment, and seek in other lands the peace and security he could not find in his own; he might, to be sure, have weathered the storm, from his enemies, as will be seen by the following anecdote, had no immediate intention of prosecuting him to the death. A stranger, who bore a strong resemblance to the person obnoxious to those who met at the smith's forge, was attacked while travelling on the outside car in the evening, and in the immediate neighborhood, and beaten most severely before his assailants discovered they had ill-used the wrong man! Nothing could exceed their regret when they discovered their mistake.

"Ah, thin, who are ye at all at all?" inquired one fellow, after having made him stand up, that they might again knock him down more to their satisfaction; sure ye're not within a foot as tall as the boy we're after. Is it crooked in the back ye are purpose? Well, now think o' that!—what call had ye to be on Barney Brian's car, that so often carries him, and with the some surtoo? and why didn't ye say ye wasn't another? Well, it's heart sorry we are for the mistake, and hope it'll never happen to ye again, to be like another man, and he an out-lancer, as a body may say, having received enough notice to quit long ago, if he'd only heed it, which we'll make him do or have his life, after we admonish him onst more, as we've done you by mistake, with a taste of a bating, which we'd ask ye to tell him if you know him; there, we'll lay you on the car, as aisy as if you war in yer mother's lap and ask ye to forgive us, which we hope you'll do, as it was all a mistake! and no help for it!"

The victim of "the mistake, however, who was an Englishman, suffered for more than three months, and cannot comprehend to this day why those who attacked him so furiously were not sought out and brought to justice. He never could understand why an honest man should refuse to criminate a villain. The poor fellow for whom the beating was intended was not slow to discover the fact, and with a heavy heartache bade adieu to his native land, which, but for the sake of his young children, he would hardly have quitted even to preserve his own life.

James Harragan did not note those occurrences, without much sorrow; he saw his daughter Sydney's eyes red for three entire days from weeping the departure of the exile's wife, whom she loved with the affection of a sister; and he had the mortification to see his beloved barony distinguished in the papers as a "disturbed-district," from the mistake to which we have alluded at the very time when many of the gentry were sleeping with their doors unfastened. James Harragan knew perfectly well that if he had spoken the truth, all this could have been prevented. Still time passed on. Mr. Herrick seldom visited James; and though he admired his crops, and spoke kindly to his children, the farmer felt he had lost a large portion of the esteem he so highly valued.

But when a man goes on in the full tide of worldly prosperity, he does not continue long in trouble upon minor matters. Sydney's eyes were no longer red; nay they were more sparkling than ever for they were brightened by a passion to which she had been hitherto a stranger. And Sydney, though gifted with as much constancy, as most people, if she did not forget, certainly did not think, as frequently as before of her absent friend. Sydney, in fact, was what is called—in love; which, I believe, is acknowledged by all who have been in a similar dilemma, to be a very confusing, perplexing situation. That poor Sydney found it so, was evident, for she became subject to certain flushings of the cheek, and beatings of the heart, accompanied by a confusion of the intellectual faculties, which puzzled her father for a time, quite as much as herself. She would call rabbits chickens, and chickens rabbits, in the public market, and was known to have given forty-two new laid eggs for a shilling, when she ought only to have given thirty-six.

Then in her garden, her own pet garden, she sowed mignonette and hollyhocks together, and wondered how it was that what she fancied sweet pea had come up "love lies bleeding." Dear, warm affectionate Sydney Harragan! She was a model of all that is excellent in simple guileless woman; and when Ralph Furlong drew from her a frank but most modest confession that his love was returned, and that "if her father did not put again it," she would gladly share his cottage and his fortunes, there was not a young disengaged farmer in the county that would not have envied him his "good luck."

Soon after James Harragan's consent had been obtained to a union which he believed would secure the happiness of his darling child, the farmer was returning from the fair of New Ross, where he had been to dispose of some spare farming stock; and as he trotted briskly homeward, passing the well-known mountain, or, as it is called, "Rock of Carrickburn," he was overtaken by a man, to whom he had seldom spoken since the evening when he had seen him and some others at Gerald Casey's forge. Many, many months had elapsed since then. And, truth to say, as the young man had removed to a cottage somewhere on the banks of the blue and gentle river Slaney, James had often hoped that he might never see him again.

"I am glad I overtook you, Mr. Harragan," he said, urging his long, narrow mare, close to the stout well-fed cob of the comfortable farmer. "It's a fine bright evening for the time of year. I intended coming to you next week, having something particular to talk about."

"Nothing that concerns me, I fancy," replied Harragan, stiffly.

"I hope it does, and that it will; times are changed since we last met—with me particularly." Harragan made no reply, and they rode on altogether in silence for some time longer.

"Mr. Harragan, though you are a trustworthy man as ever, steep in shoe leather, I am afraid you hav'n't a good opinion of me."

"Whatever opinion I may have, you know I kept it to myself," replied the farmer.

"Thank you for nothing," was the characteristic reply.

"Ye're welcome," rejoined James, as dryly. Again they trotted silently on their way, until the stranger suddenly exclaimed, reining up his mare at the same moment; I'll tell you what my business would be with you, there's nothing like speaking out of the face at onst."

"You did not always think so," said the farmer.

"Oh, sir, aisy now; let bygones be bygones; the country's none the worse of getting rid of one who was ever and a ways minding other people's business; and you yerself, Mr. Harragan, are none the worse for not having high-bred people ever poking their noses in yer place."

"Say what you have to say at onst," observed James;—

"the evening will soon close in, and the little girl I have at home thinks it long till I return."

"It's about her I want to speak," said the stranger.

"If you'll take the trouble some fine morning early to ride over to where the dark green woods of Castle Boro dip their boughs in the Slaney, ye'd see that I have as tidy a place, as well filled a haggard, and as well managed fields, as any boulder of ten acres of land in the county; besides that, I have my eye on another farm that is out of lease, and if all goes right I'll have it. Now, ye see my sister's married, and my mother's dead, and I've no one to look after things; and for every pound ye'd tell down with ye're daughter, I'd show a pound's worth. And so, Mr. Harrigan, I thought, that of all the girls in the country I'd prefer Sydney; and if we kept company for a while"—he turned his handsome but sinister and impudent countenance towards the astonished farmer, adding—"I don't think she'd refuse me."

"You might be mistaken for all that," replied James, grasping his stout stick still more tightly in his hand, from a very evident desire to knock the fellow down.

"Well now, I don't think, I should," he replied with vulgar confidence; "it's the aiest thing in life to manage a purty girl, if one has the knack, and I've managed so many."

"Ride on!" interrupted the farmer indignantly. "Ride on, before I am tempted to knock ye off the poor starved beast that ye havn't the heart to feed!—You marry my Sydney—you!—a rascal like you!—Why, Stephen Murphy, you must be gone mad—Sydney married with a cowardly backbiter! I'd rather dress her shroud with my own hands. A—ride on I tell you," he continued, almost choked with passion; "there is nothing, I believe, that you would think too bad to do. And, hark ye, take it for your comfort, that she is going to be married to one worthy of her, and I her father say so."

"Oh, very well! very well!" said the bravo; "as you please Mr. Harrigan, as you please; I meant to pay yer family a compliment—a compliment for yer silence ye understand me; not that I should myself over and above obliged for that either. Ye like to take care of yerself, for the sake of yer little girl, I suppose; and he counthry might grow too hot for you, as well as for others, if ye made free with yer tongue. No harm done; but if I had spakin' with the girl for one hour, I'd put any sweetheart in the county, barring myself, out of her head. I'll find out the happy young man, and wish him joy. Oh, maybe I wout wish joy to the boy for whom I'm insulted," he added, inflicting a blow upon the bare ribs of the poor animal he rode, that made her start; "maybe I wout wish him joy, and give him Steve Murphy's blessing. Starved as ye call my baste, there's twice the blood in her that creeps through the flesh of yer overfed cob;" and, sticking the long solitary iron spur which he wore on his right heel into the mare, he flew past James Harrigan, flourishing his stick with a whirl, and shouting so loud, that the mountain echoes of the wild rocks of Carrickturn repeated the words "joy! joy!" as if they had been thrown into their caverns by the fiend of mockery himself.

Singular Jewish Custom.—Burkhardt in his "Travels through Syria," &c. informs us that at Tiberias, one of the four holy cities of the Talmud, the Jews observe a singular custom in praying. While the Rabbi recites the Psalms of David, or the prayers extracted from them, the congregation frequently imitate by their voices or gestures the meaning of some remarkable passages; for example, when the Rabbi pronounces the words "Praise the Lord with the sound of the trumpet," they imitate the trumpet's blast through their closed fists. When "a horrible tempest" occurs they puff and blow to represent a storm; or, should he mention "the cries of the righteous in distress," they all set up a loud screaming; and it not unfrequently happens that while some are still blowing the storm, others have already begun the cries of the righteous, thus forming a concert which it is difficult for any but a zealous Hebrew to hear with gravity.

TERMS OF THIS PAPER.—To subscribers residing out of the city, $2 if in advance—$2.50 if within six months, and $3, if not paid until the expiration of the year. BACK NUMBERS at all times furnished.

MASONIC INTERCOURSE.—It gives us great pleasure to announce, that by the arrangements which have been effected recently between the Grand Lodge of the State of New York, and the Grand Lodge of HAMBURG, we shall be enabled to furnish our readers with a great deal of interesting information in regard to the progress of our Institution in Germany. A large number of documents have been received lately from the north of Europe, which are now in the hands of the translator, some of which we shall no doubt be enabled to obtain copies of, from the Grand Lodge, and lay before the Craft in this, and other States. Those which relate to the executive departments of the Order, particularly, we shall only refer to occasionally. Amongst other documents, we are much gratified to find that the recent transactions of the Grand Lodge of New York have been translated into German, and circulated amongst the Lodges on the continent. A complete list has been furnished of all the members of the fraternity under the jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge of Hamburg, with a request that should any of them visit this country they may be received with the same kindness and attention, that is promised to the members of our Lodges visiting Germany.

The Worshipful FREDERICK LIESE, past master of Independent Royal Arch Lodge, No. 2, has been appointed the representative of the Grand Lodge of HAMBURG in the Grand Lodge of New York. With his commission he received a complete suit of regalia, which he is to wear in his official capacity. Our representative in the Grand Lodge of Hamburg, is the Worshipful AUTON DANIEL PERMOLLER, past master of the Lodge "Ferdinand zum Felsen." We would advise our brethren about to visit Germany to furnish themselves with Certificates from the Grand Lodge, or if they have them of more than three years old, to have them revised by the Grand Secretary, and endorsed by the German representative. This precaution will save Brethren from inconvenience abroad.

FOREIGN.—The steam ship Britannia, arrived at Boston, from Liverpool, on the 20th, making the passage in 13 days and 14 hours. The affairs of the East, remain in about the same state of confusion and alarm, although there had been some demonstrations which look more like a restoration of tranquility.

Trade in England remains in nearly the same gloomy state as by the last advices.

The Marquis of Camden died on the 8th ult., at the advanced age of 81.

The fortifications in the Island of Jersey are ordered to be put in a complete state of defence.

Great indignation has been expressed by the American merchants at Liverpool, as well by the Liverpool and London merchants at the new post office regulations, which it would appear subjects them to great inconvenience.

O'Connel, has again commenced with renewed enthusiasm, his efforts for the repeal of the union.

Father Mathew, is still engaged in the Temperance cause, with decided success.

Another attempt has been made to assassinate, the King of France. The requide's name is Darmes.—The musket was overloaded, which burst, and wounded the assassin very badly. It created great excitement in Paris.

France continues her preparations for war. Eighteen regiments have been ordered formed. All of her forts are to be put in a complete state of defence. The calls for the Marseillaise Hymn in the theatres, have become so general, that the authorities, having in vain endeavored to suppress it, have been obliged to give up to the public will.

Difficulties have sprung up between France and Prussia, in consequence of the latter having stopped 650 horses bought an account of the French Government. Explanations have been demanded and reprisals threatened.

The King of Holland has abdicated his throne, which took place on the 7th ult. His son the Prince of Orange, takes the place of his father, under the name of William II. The old King is 68 years of age, and assigns age and infirmity as the cause of his abdication.

The affairs of Spain, are at present, in a quiet state.

"THE LONG AGONY" is at length over. The people of the United States have cast their votes in the ballot box, and what is to be the result, is for time to disclose. Like the rest of our citizens, we have our predilections, although having nothing to do with party strife in our columns. Whoever is to be King, we are certain to be Subject; and we trust for the peace and prosperity of the country, that it will be a long time before the exciting scenes of 1840, will be re-enacted. The disgusting and revolting scenes of the present contest, is well calculated to bring into question serious doubts of the permanency of our political institutions. We do not intend personality, when we express our conviction that the "rotten boroughs" of England will afford no comparison with the iniquity, which has been carried out during this contest: and we hope in the recent elections for office, that we may find men who will advocate such laws as will as far as is possible, remove some of the mischiefs under which we now labor. Both parties are now we believe satisfied, that one term of presidential service, would be advisable; and we think a registry law, under wholesome regulations would have the tendency of removing many evils which now exist. In fact, we are willing to receive any thing which will prove a correction to present abuses.

TO OUR READERS.—The election being now over we cannot but anticipate in a little while a quiet state of things, which will afford us a better quantity of material, wherewith to fill our columns. Although we have an extensive exchange with our brethren of the type, for the last six months, they have been but of little avail; on account of their almost entire devotion to politics. We shall soon have a better state of things.

GRAND LODGE OF TEXAS.—The Grand Lodge of Louisiana, has abandoned the jurisdiction over the Lodges in Texas, & has recognised that body as a regular Grand Lodge, having sole jurisdiction over the Lodges in that young republic..

CAUTION TO BOYS.—A lad in Baltimore, 9 years of age, son of Mr. John Goldsmith, on Saturday irretrievably lost both his eyes by the accidental discharge of a small cannon with which he was playing.

JOHN SITTERLY, formerly of this city, but now a resident of Schenectady, fell down dead on the State street Bridge in that city, yesterday at noon.

Charles Cook, convicted at the last term of court in Schenectady, of the murder of Mrs. Merry in September last, is under sentence to be hanged on the 15th of December next.

Intelligence.

PUNISHMENT OF PARICIDES IN FRANCE.—Two brothers, named Vincent, were brought before the last assizes for the Nièvre, upon an indictment for having as long ago 1828, murdered their own father and mother, and robbed their house at Bruyeres Radon, of £5000 in gold. Although their crime was suspected at the time, they could not be brought to justice, because the witnesses had been afraid to depose as to all they knew. They had at last, however, come forward and delivered their evidence. One of them deposed that, being on the night of the murder seated under the hedge of the garden of the deceased, while tending some horses at pasture, he overheard the brothers plotting the murder, during which one of them said, 'I could very well kill our father, but I should not have courage to kill our mother.' To this the other replied—'Well, for my part, I am ready to kill them both.' This testimony being corroborated by other circumstances, no doubt of their guilt could be entertained, and the jury returned their verdict accordingly, but with extenuating circumstances: and the paricides, instead of receiving capital punishment, were only sentenced to hard labor for life at the hulks. The latter part of the finding, no doubt, arose from the feeling so general in France, against the infliction of the penalty of death in any case however atrocious.

A QUICK WAY TO GET RICH.—A Miss Ingram, of Pontiac, some time since was perusing a Texas paper and observed among the persons that bore a prominent part in the affairs of that government, a man bearing her own name, and jocosely remarked to her companions, that she had found a namesake in Texas, and intended to write to him and claim relationship. This resolution, more from curiosity and a desire of novelty than from any conviction that her hopes would be realized, was carried into effect. She wrote him a respectful letter, giving him a history of her family and parentage, and suggesting that as the name was not as common as most of the names of our country, the probability was strong that a relationship existed between them. She received in reply, a friendly and affectionate letter acknowledging her as a cousin, and expressing an earnest desire that the correspondence might be continued.

This was readily acceded to, and it was carried on agreeably and satisfactorily to both parties, until very recently, when she received intelligence of his death, and information, that in his will had bequeathed her the handsome sum of $20,000 in gold and silver, leaving his personal property and immense landed estates to his relatives in that country. A few days previous to the reception of this joyful communication, she had connected her fortunes with those of a Methodist clergyman, and should their deed of charity comport with their means, the widow's heart will be filled with joy, and many an orphan live to implore blessings upon the heads of their benefactors, for their deeds of benevolence and generosity.—Michigan Northern Advocate.

A DUEL was fought a couple of weeks since at St. Stephens, N. B., between a couple of young sprigs of the law, growing out of a professional dispute. At the first fire one jumped ten feet into the air, the other fell over incontinently to the ground. Both evolutions opposite as they were, were perfectly voluntary, neither being in the slightest degree hurt, but both prodigiously scared. It is more than hinted that there was nothing but powder and wad in their weapons, which were pistols.

Death of Dalton.—The Toronto Commercial Herald of the 26th ult. appears in half mourning, on account of the death of the somewhat celebrated Thomas Dalton, Esq., Editor of the Toronto Patriot, on the 26th ult., from the effects of an attack of paralysis. The paper is to be continued for the benefit of his family.

OUTRAGEOUS.—The Baltimore Clipper states that on Monday, Dr. Jacob Houck rode up to the sixth ward in his sulky, while those who lingered around it were in a high state of excitement. He brought up his horse in the midst of the crowd, and from his known sentiments, became a fair mark for those around him. Several efforts were made to pull him from his seat, on which he drew a dirk, and cut on both sides of him, wounding, as we understand, several persons. A large stone thrown from the crowd, struck him on the right side of his head, and severely wounded him.

POPULATION AND PROPERTY.—The books of several marshals employed to take the late census in this city, present an aggregate of 313,629, of whom 144,324 are white males, and 153,630 are white females. The colored population amounts to 15,675, of whom 6,637 are males, and 9,038 females. The increase since 1835 has been about 43,000. The value of real and personal property in the city assessed this year, is $187,121,464 real, and $65,721,699 personal;—total $252,843,168: being a decrease of $14,038,267 from last year's valuation.—N. Y. Sun.

Great Loss of Life.—In Augusta last, M. H. S. Ely, while cruising in the Mozambique channel, fell in with a slaver and drove her ashore. Of her cargo, consisting of 550 negroes, 200 were drowned, and the remainder were taken on board the Lily, and conveyed to Maritius.

ABOMINABLE.—During the late election in Pennsylvania, R. W. Middleton, Esq., editor of the Lancaster Examiner, while at the polls, was attacked by some ruffians who knocked him down, jumped upon him, and cut his face in the most horrible manner; the flesh was cut nearly off both sides of his face, and left his cheek and jaw bones nearly bare!

The Trial of the Bootmakers, at Boston for a conspiracy in forming (with others) what is usually denominated a Trades Union, on Thursday resulted in a general verdict of guilty against all the defendants, seven in number.—No sentence will be passed at present—the counsel of the defendants having taken exceptions to the charge of Judge Thatcher.

The Norfolk Beacon of Monday says:—'We learn that the crew of the ship Sea, Captain Delano, now in Hampton Roads, have refused to do duty for a week past, and that some difficulty is apprehended.'

Cold Weather South.—At Charleston, on Monday last, thermometer fell about 13 degrees, and there was ice the previous evening in the neighborhood of the city. A frost as big as a small snow was visible at Augusta, Geo., on Sunday week.

The Little Rock (Arkansas) Times of the 18th ult. states that John Howard Payne, esq. had reached that place on his route to visit the western Indians, for the purpose of completing investigations of their history and habits. He travels under a special passport from the Secretary of war, and recommendatory letters to all Indian Agencies from the Indian Department.

POETRY.

THE LAMENT OF AN EMIGRANT OVER THE GRAVE OF
HIS YOUNG WIFE.By the Author of the Collegians, &c.

The tie is broke, my Irish girl?
That bound thee here to me,
My heart has lost its single pearl—
And thine at last is free—
Dead as the earth that wraps thy clay,
Dead as the stone above thee—
Cold as this heart that breaks to say
It never more can love thee.

I press thee to my aching breast—
—No blush comes o'er thy brow—
Those gentle arms that once caress'd,
Fall round me deadly now—
The smile of love no longer part
Those dead blue lips of thine—
I lay my hand upon thy heart—
'Tis cold, at last, to mine.

Were we beneath our native heaven
Within our native land—
A fairer grave to thee were given.
Than this wild bed of sand—
But thou wert single in thy faith
And single in thy worth,
And thou should'st die a lonely death,
And lie in lonely earth.

Then lay thee down and take thy rest,
My last—last look is given—
The earth is smooth above thy breast.
And mine is yet unruven!—
No mass — no parting rosary—
My perished love can have—
But a husband's sighs embalm her corse,
A husband's tears her grave.

STANZAS.

Tell, spirit of the wilderness!
If Contemplation dwell
Amid gay fashion's proud excess,
Or in the cloistered cell?
Yes! she retires, with modest eye,
To scan in silence o'er
The orbs that gem the azure sky,
Or list the ocean's roar

In her such fadeless beauties bloom
As may not pass away,
From sorrow she dispels the gloom,
And points to brighter day:
Affection bends o'er her loved son,
To catch hope's transient ray,
And when it dies, 'tis she alone
The tear of grief can stay.

Joy may linger, pleasure beam,
Friendship never now decay;
These are but phantasies—a dream,
That leads the mind astray;
Then, Contemplation, be thou mine,
And throw around thy spell,
All spells above that sweetly shine
Unchanged, unchangeable.

WHEN WE ARE YOUNG.

When we are young we often think
Of time and death with fear;
But when we stand upon the brink
Of dread-eternity,—and hear
Our knell in every passing breath
Of the rude wind as it sweeps by,
We pray—if there be peace in death,
O let us quickly die!

When we were young, our lot was bright:
As earthly lot can be,
And youthful fancy shed a light
Even o'er the broad futurity.

Where is it now!—Our sky is dark,
And our life like the sea-boy tost
From all, save his benighted bark,
Which is, but to be lost.

When we were young, the plants of youth
Which round our pastimes knelt
In all the loveliness of truth,
Sprung from the hearts that beat and felt!
—There are new tombstones on the hill
Where our forefathers' rest;
But tombs are warmer than the chill
Of the alienated breast.

When we were young, 'twas bliss to feel
The love that walks abroad
O'er heaven, and earth, and sea,—and zeal,
On angel pinions, flew to God.
Now to the earth our souls are bent,
Or, in the agony of woe,
Lifted to pray the enchantment spent,
That binds the soul below!

BETTER MOMENTS.

BY N. P. WILLIS.

My mother's voice! how often creeps
Its cadence on my lonely hours!
Like healing sent on wings of sleep,
Or dew to the unconscious flowers.
I can forget her melting prayer
While leaping pulses madly fly,
But in the still unbroken air
Her gentle tone comes stealing by,
And years, and sin, and manhood flee,
And leave me at my mother's knee.

The book of nature, and the print
Of beauty on the whispering sea,
Give eye to me some linament
Of what I have been taught to be.
My heart is harder, and perhaps
My manliness hath drunk up tears.
And there's a mildew in the lapse
Of a few miserable years—
But nature's book is even yet
With all my mother's lessons writ.

I have been out at even tide
Beneath a moonlight sky of spring.
When earth was garnished like a bride,
And night had on her silver wing—
When earth was garnished like a bride,
And night had on her silver wing—
When bursting leaves and diamond grass,
And waters leaping to the light,
And all that make the pulses pass
With wilder fleetness, thronged the night—
When all was beauty—then have I,
With friends on whom my love is flung
Like a myrrh on winds of Araby,
Gazed up where evening's lamp is hung,
And when the beauteous spirit there,
Flung over me its golden chain,
My mother's voice came on the air
Like the light dropping of the rain—
And resting on some silver star
The spirit of a bended knee,
I've poured her low and fervent prayer
That our eternity might be
To rise in heaven like stars of night
And tread a living path of light.

I have been on the dewy hills,
When night was stealing from the dawn,
And mist was on the waking rills,
And tints were delicately drawn
In the grey east—when birds were waking
With a low murmur in the trees,
And melody by fits was breaking
Upon the whisper of the breeze,
And this when I was forth perchance
As a worn reveller from the dance—
And when the sun sprang gloriously
And freely up, and hill and river
Were catching upon wave and tree
The arrows from his subtle quiver—
I say a voice has thrilled me then,

Heard on the still and rushing light,
Or creeping from the silent glen
Like words from the departing night
Hath stricken me, and I have pressed
On the wet grass my fevered brow,
And pouring forth the earliest
First prayer, with which I learned to bow,
Have felt my mother's spirit rush
Upon me as in by-past years,
And yielding to the blessed gush
Of my ungovernable tears,
Have risen up—the gay, the wild—
As humble as a very child.

From the Baltimore Patriot.

THE DYING DEIST.

I saw him in the bloom of youth.
Ere he had felt affliction's rod;
He spurned the sacred book of truth,
The glorious gospel of our God;
And scorn'd the Almighty Power above.
Whose eye creation's scope may scan;
And read the source of hate or love.
Within the heart of thankless man.

To him a gracious God had given
The gift of genius, to survey
The wondrous works of earth and heaven,
Spread out in beautiful array;
But ah! Creation to his sight,
Was but a wild, a rude romance;
Sprung from the realms of rayless night,
By dark undesigned CHANCE.

He saw the charming seasons change,
And flowers bloom and blush for man,
But in all nature's radiant range.
The Mighty Mind he could not scan.
Each spire of grass, each being born,
Should have convinced a mind so wise;
And yet he even laughed to scorn
A suffering Saviour's sacrifice.

I saw the dying Deist roll
Upon an agonizing bed;
Hell's horrors harrow'd up his soul,
His eye-ball starting from his head;
With streaming eyes I saw him stretch
His impious hands to Heaven, in pray'r:
Save! save! Oh! save! he cried, a wretch,
Whose souls is shrouded in despair!

Death's darkest angel o'er him waved
His gloomy wings, to waft away
The sceptic's spirit, and he raged,
And wept, and prayed for one more day.
Philosophy, thou fool! say, where
Was now thy sweet controlling power?
Where was thy balm for his despair,
In dissolution's awful hour?

I saw him gathered to the grave,
In Christian holiness unborn;
He died cold scepticism's slave,
All unforgiven and forlorn;
With genius worthy Heaven's abode,
But with a hopeless heart of pride;
Rent by the awful wrath of God,
The poor unhappy Deist died.

What madness 'tis in man to mar
The joys which God has kindly given;
And blot out Bethlehem's beauteous star,
Whose light illumines our path to heaven!
'Tis pain to strive—no power may stay
The will and pleasure of our Lord;
Hell's deep dark dungeons must obey,
And heaven and earth receive his Word.

MASONRY IN TEXAS.

The Grand Secretary of Texas, has favored us with a list of the Subordinate Lodges of this flourishing Republic, as well as of the recently elected officers of the Grand Lodge, which we take pleasure in publishing, both as regards the interest and information it will impart to the Brethren, as well as the gratifying evidence, of the progress of Masonry in that part of the Viceroyalty. We hope the Grand Secretary will keep us advised of the state of Masonry in that quarter, from time to time.

THE PRINCIPLES OF MASONRY.

"Are illustrated and explained by the most striking examples and appropriate devices. Indeed, a Masonic lodge affords a most excellent school of instruction. In it, the brotherhood are engaged in the practice of the most useful and important lessons of life. They are impressed, with the necessity of system, order and regularity, in all their pursuits, and are instructed in such principles, as ought to govern them, on entering into the social state. The equality and good will which prevails in the lodge teaches us, to know, that "all men are created equal," that our safety and satisfaction in life, is derived from a mutual willingness and obligation to aid and assist each other, and that merit alone, constitutes the just ground of distinction between man and man. By it, we are convinced that power, to be lawfully exercised, must be fairly and voluntarily delegated, and that laws to be binding, must be enacted by the authority of those for whom they are made. The levelling power of masonry, instead of lessening, greatly increases our respect for those who are entrusted with offices, and it has demonstrated, that men from the most exalted to the humblest stations in life, have derived a heartfelt satisfaction, and have found it to be highly necessary, to meet together and associate with one another as brothers. The rewards of the just, and the punishment of the wicked are historically and practically taught, and the temple which we rear for the reception of a brother, is constructed in such a manner as to impress him with the beauties of faith, hope and charity; and to admonish him, of the solidity and strength of that union, which is cemented together by virtue and benevolence and founded upon justice and truth. The use of the senses, and the advantages of the arts and sciences, are also called into requisition; and the mechanical tools are especially necessary in our Masonic labors. These are all designed to enforce and represent various truths; moral, political and religious; and being lively and sensible images, are well calculated to make a deep and lasting impression upon the heart, and fasten themselves upon the memory.

"The light of masonry would have long since ceased to shine, had it not been for the eternal and immutable light which it derives from the Holy Bible. When surrounding that sacred altar we never can forget the book which is constantly before us. The same beacon light, by which the Christian is guided in pursuing his voyage to the haven of everlasting happiness, directs also, the mason's course "on life's troublous ocean," "In the beginning, God said, let there be light, and there was light." The sublimity of this awful fiat of the Almighty must have struck every mason with a peculiar force. We behold, daily, the world passing from light to darkness, and from darkness to light—but the illumination, and the gloom are made gradually to succeed each other, and by its frequency, the sublimity of the change is lost upon our senses.—We can imagine, it is true, an instantaneous change from darkness to light, and can form some adequate idea of the awful spectacle of a world emerging from darkness. But the mason is made especially to feel the abject state of wretchedness, ignorance and darkness by which he is surrounded in this sublunary sphere, and is solemnly impressed with the glorious and intense brightness which shines throughout the kingdom of the Most High! And I must say, the heart of that man is callous indeed, who is not struck with the sublimity of "Hieroglyphic bright, which none but craftsmen ever saw," and who feels no sensation at the mention of that name, which fills the good with hope, and the guilty with fear and trembling. It is not the light of day, which the mason beholds in the masonic temple. It is the light of religion, of virtue and of truth—the light of nature, science and philosophy—the light of justice, temperance, prudence and fortitude—the light of mercy, benevolence and charity. These are lights which illuminate the masonic sanctuary. It is the influence which they have, upon the life and conduct of a true mason, which gives dignity and distinction to his character, and calls for the respect of his fellow-men. Thus he is led to delight in his masonic duties—to cherish the warmest affection for the brotherhood—to lock up in his heart the invaluable secrets of the order; and to hold the masonic institution in the highest veneration. It is thus, that the blessings of masonry have descended from generation to generation, pure and undefiled and it is thus, that our society still exists, in the full enjoyment of all its capabilities of mitigating and assuaging the sorrows and afflictions of this vale of tears."—Fulton.

CHARITY.

A brother should bear a brother's infirmities.

There is no virtue, in which men are more deficient, than in the exercise of that spirit of charity, "which beareth all things, and hopeth all things." Though we ought never to countenance error, yet ought we to view and reprove with tenderness, the faults of others. The pride of our own hearts, which is ever leading us astray, impels us to detect and expose the errors of our neighbors, and thus triumph in our fancied superiority. We place our own characters as a model, and every difference or deficiency receives our condemnation. Unmindful of the endless diversity of characters; the peculiar constitution of different minds; and the variety of motives which govern human actions, we mark out one path of thought and action for the whole; an attempt as absurd and impracticable as to provide one orbit for all the planets which glitter in the firmament.

Charity does not require us to excuse the vices or overlook the errors of a friend. One of the best proofs of friendship is, that affectionate censorship which watches over the actions of another, marks his errors, and sedulously labors for their correction. But it instructs us to bear, with affectionate sympathy, those eccentricities of character, those fluctuations of temper, and those little excesses, either of gaiety or depression to which all are subject. We should advise a friend with caution and humility, and reprove him with that meekness which would result from a conviction that we ourselves are fallible, and that we frequently require to-day the admonitions which we so freely imparted yesterday. Another important duty is, to guard and defend the reputation of a friend. The world is prying and captious, and the shafts of calumny fly too thickly to miss even the most spotless character. We need not point out the numerous occasions which present themselves to silence the calumnious hint, and rectify the equivocal remark. As the depository of his sentiments, and the confidant of his secrets, we ought ever to guard the character of a brother—and without excusing or palliating his errors, we may often throw the mantle of protection over his foibles.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

THE SCREW vs PADDLE WHEELS.

A new principle of propulsion in the case of steamers has recently been introduced in England, and subjected to the test of experience. It is the Screw, in lieu of Paddle Wheels. The Archimedes, a three masted schooner of 240 tons, is constructed on this principle, and has attracted much attention. It is admitted on all hands that she performs tolerably well, and the inventor and owners appear to think that nothing can surpass her. At any rate, they have challenged any low pressure steamer to run with her a distance of 500 miles on the open sea, for a purse of £1000. A description of the Archimedes is thus given in the Inverness Courier:

The Archimedes is rigged as a smart three masted schooner, with her masts raking; her length is 125 feet, average draft of water 10 feet, capacity 240 tons, power of engines 80 horses. We take from the Courier the following description.

The mode of propulsion may be said to be by a portion only of the Archimedian screw. When the vessel was first tried a full turn of that species of screw (like a patent corn screw on a central straight spindle) was employed. The inventor afterwards for the sake of compactness, introduced the double threaded screw, with half a turn of each thread, as more applicable to this vessel, although he rather prefers the other. This is of iron, and is fixed in an opening on the run of the vessel, above the keel, and about 10 feet forward from the rudder. The screw works transversely wth the keel, radiating the water all round, as it turns with a backward movement. Its diameter is five feet nine inches, and the length fore and aft about five feet. It almost appears incredible that so small a portion of machinery could propel a vessel of such length, but the hold it takes of the water, and the velocity with which it turns, are the elements of its power. It is quite under the surface, and is therefore invisible by spectators, either on board or on shore. It is worked by a spindle forming its axle, which runs fore and aft, and is connected with the steam engine, the velocity being acquired by a combination of spur wheels and pinions. Each revolution of the larger wheel turned by the cranks of the engines, gives, by the multiplied power, five and one-third revolutions of screw, which consequently revolves at the rate of from 130 to 150 turns in a minute, according to the speed of the engine. In consequence of the powerful stream thus propelled against the rudder, the ship is actually found to obey the helm much more readily, and to be therefore more under command in steering, than either a common steam or sailing vessel; so that she can easily turn round in one quarter or one half of her own length, while it is well known that an ordinary steamer cannot do so with the paddle in less than six times her length. The shafts of the steam engine work fore and aft, the cranks turning transversely, so as to communicate the power directly, by cog wheels, to the screw; and there is one considerable advantage arising from this arrangement of the machinery, namely, that the cylinders, and in fact the whole weight of the engine, rest immediately over the keel, where the vessel is the least liable to straining or twisting from the effects of undue pressure. The larger wheel is toothed or cogged with horn-beam (timber.)

The action of the screw is different from the operation of "sculling," in the particular that in sculling there are but two motions, the chief force being derived from the lateral; whereas the screw exerts an equal degree of power for every part of its surface towards the periphery in the direction of the radii. The successive columns of water as fast as presented, are forced away by the act of rotation, pretty much as the earth is turned away from the mould board of a plough. The action of the screw may be said to bear the same relation to "sculling," which the use of paddle-wheels does to the ordinary mode of propulsion by oars.

The Archimedes has made several trips, and works well. Her speed is not quite so great as that of first rate steamboats in calm water. But this is believed to result from the fact, that her engines being on a new principle, and made by an inexperienced engineer, the full power of the boat is not developed. The nominal power of the engines is 80 horse power, but in reality they do not work up to more than sixty.

One of the greatest advantages of this invention, as applicable to all descriptions of shipping, is in the circumstance that the screw may be thrown out of gear in two minutes, and the vessel be put under sail alone. The screw is then turned by the motion of the vessel; but the drag is not more than a half mile in ten. Even the drag itself admits of being removed, as provision is made for totally unslipping the screw and bringing it upon deck.

The advantage of the screw over paddle wheels in ocean steamers, it will be readily seen, must be very great. The leaning over of the ship often throws one of the paddle wheels out of the water, and immerses the other too deeply. The screw is always in the water. The saving of fuel will be considerable, as the fires may be extinguished on board a ship propelled by the screw, and the vessel used as a sailing ship when the wind is full and fair. As a vessel of war the advantages would be palpable. The opinion has been expressed by officers of the royal navy, who have witnessed the performance of the Archimedes. When it is recollected that this invention is yet in its infancy, and the Archimedes is the first vessel on a large principle, we may readily infer that the introduction of the screw in the construction of steamers, is destined to work an important change in one of the most essential features of naval architecture.

MISCELLANY.

MAJ. ANDRE—AGAIN.

The Army and Navy Magazine, in the course of some gratifying comments upon the September number of the Knickerbocker, and especially of the revolutionary paper entitled 'The Robinson House,' observes: Familiar as are the main features of the Arnold plot to American readers, every new dress in which it appears, displays some additional incident, gathered from tradition or contemporary actors. The patriotism and love of virtue so inherent in the American people, have long since stamped the memory of the traitor with detestation, while that of his chivalrous victim is always viewed with sympathetic regret. From many communications to which the article in question has given rise, we select the subjoined 'Sequel to the "Robinson House,"' from the pen of an infrequent contributor, once made illustrious by Galt, our old friend 'Laurie Todd': 'Mr. Editor: In your number for September, is a very interesting, beautiful and correct history of the capture of Major Andre.—Permit me to add my mite to that history. I think it was in the month of September, 1800, that I made one of a company that was following the corpse of a friend departed, to the house appointed for all living. It was at Fairytown; and on our way to the grave, we paused on the spot where Andre was first hailed and stopped. My companion in the line informed me of the fact, and added 'Isaac Van Wart, one of the captors is now in our company.' At the conclusion of the funeral service, I was introduced to Mr. Van Wart; and on our way back, I desired him to lead me to the spot among the trees and brush wood, at that time unaltered, where the search and important discovery were made. He very kindly complied; and while I pressed the ground where stood the feet of Andre, he related the story as your correspondent has done, with this small addition, viz: that when Andre found he was discovered, and a prisoner, he offered successively his gold watch and a purse of gold for his liberty. This being refused, he tendered an order on the British commissary in New-York for any amount in goods and money which his captors might name; 'and for security of the payment,' he added, 'let one of you go to New-York and receive the sum. I will remain here a hostage with the other two, until your comrade returns. If the contract is not fulfilled, I am still your prisoner.' Here I interrupted Mr. Van Wart. I said: 'Sir, you were three poor young men; it was a great temptation. Did none of you hesitate?' 'Not one!' he answered: 'each stood firm, as appeared in the sequel.' Now, Mr. Knickerbocker, in the days of Rome an action like this would have been blazoned to posterity in letters of gold: it would have lived on the canvass of the painter, and in the marble of the sculptor. But poor was the reward, and small the thanks, which these brave and patriotic men received from their country. Four or five winters ago, if my memory serves me, an application was made to Congress from one of the surviving captors of Andre, for some sort of compensation. My impression is that it was refused.—Certain I am, it was warmly opposed, and especially by a member from our own state. They were branded as 'cow-thieves,' etc. Perhaps they were cow-thieves; but at that period, the most honorable men, both whigs and Tories, living between the lines, were cow-thieves. The British soldiers and American Tories stole cows from the whigs: the whigs had no remedy but to steal them back again. It is very probable that the British and Tories had driven off the whole stock belonging to the widowed mother of these boys; for if fame speaks true, neither of the three were of age; and according to the usages of war, they were justified in a recapture. It is evident they were not thieves for gain; else they would have taken the price which Andre offered for his ransom, which was more than would have sufficed to purchase the whole stock of cows, sheep and oxen, which belonged to Job, when he resided in the land of Uz. In my humble opinion Mr. Editor, (in which as a native Knickerbocker, I am sure you will join,) every New-Yorker should be proud that he was born in the state which produced three such men; and the fact of their being boys, and poor boys, adds very much to the glory of the act. Had this deed been done by a Van Cortlandt, a Phillips, a Van Rensselaer, or any three of the 'lords of the manor,' on the Hudson river, the act would have been engraved on the rocks with the point of a diamond. But it was done by three cow-herd-boys; and there is not a stone to mark the spot where this important event took place. In 1821, when the remains of Major Andre were placed on board the British sloop of war which had been sent to convey them to England, and while she lay in the North river awaiting a wind, I had an ardent desire to handle the skull that had once contained such mighty projects. I obtained an order from the British Consul, and repaired on board, taking with me a handsome myrtle plant, which I placed on the lid of the sarcophagus. This plant was carried to London in good condition, and many of the 'grandeens' obtained cuttings from it, which grew and multiplied under the name of 'Andre's Myrtle.' When I was in London in 1833, I saw several of these myrtles. I remember that when I held Andre's skull in my hand, I observed that the root of a cedar tree had struck thro' the bone of the right side, and came out at the left where it remained.—Knickerbocker for Nov.

A REMINISCENCE.

The original Declaration of Independence in the office of the Secretary of State at Washington, has elicited from the veteran Mr. B. O. Tyler, an interesting relative to that document. It had been kept in a tin case, and when the Capitol was burned by the British during the late war, Mr. King took the declaration, all the Treaties and as many other valuable papers as he could carry, and fled with them to the Montgomery Court House, Maryland—thereby preserving them from the general destruction. When J. Q. Adams came into the State Department, he had the Declaration taken out of its tin case, elegantly framed, enclosed it in a mahogany case, and hung it up in the Secretary's room—the case being provided with a door by opening which, any one can see the original. The splendid full length portrait of Washington, by Stewart, owes its preservation from a conflagration to Mrs. Madison. When that heroine saw the Capitol in flames, she took her carving knife, and cut the portrait out of the frame in which it hung, rolled it up, got in to her carriage, and drove with it to Montgomery Court House, where it, with the public documents, was preserved.—Baltimore Clipper.

Now that the Election is over and people begin to come to their senses, we suppose our readers will not accuse us of violating our neutrality, nor torture every good joke into "political capital," although it may perhaps have a little squinting to our side—which like every body's side, is the right side, although it may not be on the reader's side. Nature has given us a round face, which is not our fault, but her's, and we have always had a stronger propensity to laugh than to cry.—Consequently, we can never see a good thing—or a good fellow, but we are at all times ready to take it or him by the hand; always excepting an unrepenting anti-mason: The following piece of humor, is from the New Orleans Picayune.

RECORDER'S COURT.

SECOND MUNICIPALITY.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.—Frank Smith and Thomas Reddin were up before Recorder Baldwin on Sunday morning. They were arrested for being noisy and intoxicated.

"Smith," said the Recorder, "about what did you and Reddin quarrel?"

"Vy, about the old thing, your honor," said Smith.

"What do you call the old thing?" said the Recorder.

"Vy, this here election," said Smith.

"O, you differ in it, do you," said the Recorder.

"Certainly we do," said Smith—"he is a rabbit Loco Foco and I is a vig."

"A what?" said the Recorder.

"A violent politician and in favor of Wan Buren," said Smith: "But I'll tell your honor as how it is. Ve both lives in the same yard, and venever I passes him he says there goes Hard Cider; there is von of the party wot aint got no principles; there's a supporter of the man wot's been made brave by certificates and not by his sword; and he goes on in that ere vay vich no good vig can stand. Ven he finds the other vige out, what live in the yard and the Loco Focos at home, he is sure to take the wote and then he calls it a Wan Buren victory and a sign of the times, and all that. The fact is, your honor, if the feller vassn't looking out for an office I dosen't thing he'd be half as patriotic as he is."

"Reddin," said the Recorder, "is your conduct such as Smith describes it?"

"Not a bit on it,"—if I was to be let alone i'd never do nothing to nobody, but he's heterally talking politics. Ven my old woman locks the door and goes out, he makes a fox on it vith chalk and writes underneath it, 'this here is sly Reynard from kinderhook, vot vos for some time in the London Zoological Gardens, but now in the Menagerie at Vashington; he's the most cunning hanimal vots known to naturalists.' This is not all, your honor. Ven I wants to sleep at night I'm blowed if I can get a wink, he kicks up such a rumpus, singing Harrison songs the whole time and crowing like a reg'lar rooster, I have challenged him over and over again, but I never gets him to toe the mark, no how."

"Do you know," said the Recorder, "that by challenging him you have been guilty of inciting to a breach of the peace?"

"I dosen't mean a duel, your honor," said Redden, "but to a discussion of principles; but I'm blaped if I don't believe he haint got any."

"But can't you both retain your respective political opinions without quarrelling?" said the Recorder.

"Vell, then," said Redden, "your honor must bind him over not to sing Arason songs between the hours of ten o'clock at night and six o'clock in the morning, and not to be frightening my children out of bed by firing off that old rusty musket in celebration of victories when he haint gained none. Yes, and prevent im, your honor," continued Redden, "from making his big dog stand on his hind legs in my presence, and saying, as he points to him, 'here is von of Wan Buren's present standing army; nor I won't stand no more from him about negro testimony, cause it's all gammon.'"

On the part of Smith it was provided that Redden, was not to call him a hard cider cask nor a worshipper of log cabins, any more. They made mutual promises to act with more forbearance towards one another in future, and to display a greater degree of political charity than they have evinced heretofore and were discharged.

DEATH NOT A PAINFUL PROCESS.

It has been observed that many commit suicide from a notion that death from natural causes, is attended with considerable agony. This is the generally received notion, but it is an erroneous one. Those who have often witnessed the act of dying allow that it is not a painful process. In some delicate and irritable persons, a kind of struggle is indeed sometimes excited when respiration becomes difficult, but more frequently the dying obviously suffer nothing and express no uneasiness. Those who die of chronic diseases the graduation is slow and distinct. Consumptive patients are sometimes in a dying state for several days; they appear at times to suffer little, but to languish for complete dissolution; nay, we have known them to express great uneasiness when they have been recalled from the commencement of insensibility by the cries of their friends, or the efforts of the attendants to alleviate pain. In observing persons in this situation, we have always been impressed with an idea that the approach of natural death produces a sensation similar to that of falling asleep. The disturbance of respiration is the only apparent source of uneasiness to the dying: and sensibility seems to be just in proportion to the decrease of that function.—Besides, both the impression of present objects and those recalled by memory are influenced by the extreme debility of the patient whose wish is for absolute rest.—We could never see the close of life under these circumstances without recollecting those beautiful lines of Spencer:

"Sleep after toil, port after stormy seas; Ease after war; death after life, doth greatly please."—The Anatomy of Suicide.

BETTING.—The following article on this subject, from the Pennsylvanian, embraces a great deal of good common sense, which however nobody will follow.

One of the worst results of the protracted political excitement which follows the Presidential election, is the enormous amount of gambling it has given rise to. Both parties, wild with uncertainty, seem to think that their chance of success is increased in proportion to the sums they are willing to risk on the result. This is greatly to be deplored. Betting is gaming in one of its most reprehensive forms, and political gambling—that which treats an election as if it were a horse race or a cock fight—cannot be too severely condemned. We trust that no more may be heard of it. Multitudes have already risked what they can ill afford to lose, and it is a poor way of manifesting confidence or party attachment to impoverish one's self, or to gain a taste for winning, for a species of "sport," as it is called, which is too often a destroyer both of soul and body. Gentlemen partisans—Harrisonians and Democrats—keep your cash in your pockets, do not go stumping people lest in the end you yourself be stumped—for stumped somebody must be, that's a clear case.

An Irishman, who was committed to Knatsford (Eng.) tread-wheel for the space of a month, observed at the expiration of his task, "What a great deal of fatigue and botheration it would have saved us poor creatures if the they had invented it to go by steam like all other water mills; for d—l burn me if I have not been going up stairs four weeks, but never could reach the chamber door at all, at all."

GOOD.—A person said, in our hearing, the other day that editors for the most part, were a thin, pale-faced set. A lad standing near, made this witty observation to his chum:—"There, Bob, I told you I had often read about the editorial corpses."

FOREIGN EXTRACTS.

Important Fact.—The sum annually expended on bread by the population of the three kingdoms amounts to about twenty-five millions of money, while that expended in strong drink amounts to upwards of fifty millions sterling per annum. The money spent in gin only would supply the population of the kingdom with bread for half a year.—Boston Free Press.

Religious Statistics.—The following is from information collected by the Committee of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign parts: Christians, 260,000,000; Jews, 4,000,000; Mahometans, 6,000,000; idolaters of all sorts, 500,000,000. Total population of the world, 860,000,000.

Weaving Glass with Silk.—The most ingenious invention of weaving glass with silk is proceeding with great success. The patterns wove are beautiful in the extreme, and have induced many of the nobility to select them for curtains and other ornamental furniture.

New Invention.—An invention is in progress to supersede the necessity of using horse-hair for stuffing chairs, sofas, &c. The substitute (for which a patent is taken out,) is cork cut in the minutes particles, which is found upon trial to be superior to horse-hair in every respect, and the saving is considered at about 200 per cent. An extensive factory is fast progressing, and a large fortune appears likely to reward the inventor.

A Railroad Wonder.—The Great Western Railway has run 29,200,000 miles and carried 1,520,000 passengers, without any accident fatal to a passenger, from its opening, two years and three months.

Ashes of Napoleon.—While Louis Napoleon is, as it were, buried in the fortress of Ham, preparations are making on the grandest scale for entombing the remains of his illustrious ancestor at the Invalides. The ashes, after arriving at Havre, will be conveyed up the Seine as far as Courbevoi, near Paris, where an arch of triumph will be erected, and other arrangements made to receive with becoming pomp the remains of the Emperor. A procession will be formed there, which will enter Paris by the Champs-Elysees. Some trees are to be cut down in the vicinity of the Invalides, in order to form an approach worthy of the illustrious deposit about to be consigned to it. A temporary bridge is to be thrown over the Seine, and the spacious court yard of the Invalides is to be converted into an illuminated chapel, the ground of which is to be covered with violet-colored velvet of the richest description. The hearse is to be drawn by twenty-four milk-white horses, which are to be imported expressly from Germany.

An Important Verdict.—In the important case of the Marquis De Aycinena vs. the estate of James Yard, esq. deceased, which has been under trial before Judge Pettit, at Philadelphia, for the last two weeks, the jury, on Wednesday, gave a verdict for the plaintiff of forty three thousand six hundred dollars and eighty cents.

COMING CLOSE.—It is stated in a St. John, N. B. paper of the 7th inst., that the Government is about to erect barracks at Woodstock, on the upper part of the river St. John, twelve miles from the post at present held by the Americans at Holton.

FROM FLORIDA.—We learn from the Apalachicola Advertiser of the 24th the following paragraph. It has been long suspected that there were white men connected with the Indian operations in Florida, and this seems to be the first clue to their discovery.

There is a rumor here, for the truth of which we do not vouch, that two or three, or one or two white persons have been arrested at Tallahassee, on suspicion of being connected with the Indians.

The name of one is said to be Johnson Cook, a man well known to many of our citizens, who was endeavoring to purchase a keg of gunpowder. This man resided with the Indians previous to the commencement of hostilities, and is supposed to have been with them ever since. When taken, he is said to have displayed indications of having been recently painted after the manner of the savages. Every inducement will be made to elicit information concerning the lurking places of the enemy.

POPULAR TALES.

STORIES OF THE IRISH PEASANTRY.

BY MRS. S. C. HALL.

"Mind not high things: but condescend to men of low estate."
ST. PAUL.

[CONCLUDED.]

Instantly James urged his stout horse forward, crying at the top of his voice to Murphy to stop; but either the animal was tired, or the most endowed with supernatural swiftness, for he soon lost sight even of the skirts of Murphy's coat, which floated loosely behind him. "The scoundrel!" he muttered to himself, while the gallop of his steed subsided into a heavy, but tolerably rapid trot; "I wanted to tell him to take care how he meddled with me or mine. Sydney!—Sydney, indeed! And the rascal's assurance!—he never spoke three words to my girl in his life! It's a good thing we're rid of him here any way, I hope he's not a near neighbor of any of Furlong's people, that's all; his impudence—to me who knew him so well! Serve me right," he thought within himself, when his mutterings had subsided; "serve me right to keep the secret of such a fellow. I suffered those who war innocent to leave the country—and he to talk of paying my family a compliment! Mr. Herrick said it would come home to me, and so it has. I'm sure Murphy must have been overtaken,* or he'd never dare to propose such a thing. But, then, if he was, why, the devil takes the weight off a tipsy man's tongue, and then all's out."

It was night before Harragan arrived at his farm, and there the warm smiles and bright eyes of his Sydney were ready to greet his descent from the back of his stout steed, and the bridegroom elect was ready to hold the horse; and his sons, now growing up readily to manhood, crowded around him; and his dog, far more respectable in appearance than the generality of Irish cottage dogs, leaped to lick his hand; and the cat, with tail erect, purred at the door; the very magic, that Sydney loved for its love of mischief, stretched its neck through its prison bars to greet the farmer's return to his cottage home.

"There's no use in talking," said James Harragan, after the conclusion of a meal which few small farmers are able to indulge in—I mean supper. "There's no use in talking, Sydney—but I can't spare you—it's a certain fact I cannot spare you. Furlong must find a farm near us, and live here; why, wanting my little girl, I should be like a sky without a sun."

"Farms are not to be had here—they are too invaluable to be easily obtained, as you well know," replied the young man; but sure she'll not be a day's ride from you, sir, unless, indeed, my brother should have the luck to get a farm for me that he's after but the Slaney a little on the other side of the ferry of Mount Garrett; but that is such a bit of ground as is hard to be met with." The father hardly noticed Furlong's reply, for his eyes and thoughts were fixed upon his child, until the word "Slaney" struck upon his ear, and bro't back Murphy, his proposal, his threat, and his flying horse, at once to his remembrance.

"What did you say of a farm on the Slaney?" he inquired, hastily.

"That I have the chance, the more than chance, of a purty bit of land with a house, a slated house upon it, on the banks of the Silver Slaney, as ever was turned for wheat or barley—to say nothing of green crops, that would bate the world for quality or quantity. My brother has known the cows there yield fourteen or sixteen quarts. I did not like to say any thing about it before, for I was afraid I should never have the luck of it, but he wrote me to-day to say that he was almost sure of it, though some black-hearted villain had written letters without a name to the landlord, and agent, and steward against us. Think of that now! We that never did a hard turn to man, woman, or child, in the country."

James Harragan absolutely shuddered: and passing his arm round Sydney's neck, drew her towards him with a sort of instinctive affection, like a bird that shelters its nestling beneath its wing, when it hears the wild hawk's scream upon the breeze.

* T. p.

"Sydney shall never go there," said Harragan. "Not go to the banks of the Slaney!" exclaimed her eldest brother. "Why, father, you don't know what a place it is—you don't know what you say. Besides, an hour and a half would take you quite easy to where Furlong means. You make a great deal too much fuss about the girl." And having so said, he stooped down and kissed her cheek, adding, "Never mind, father, I'll bring you home a daughter that 'ill be twice as good as Sydney. I'll just take one more summer out of myself, that's all, and then I'll marry; maybe I won't show a pattern wife to the country!" And then the youth was rated on the subject of bachelors' wives. And he retaliated; and his sister threatened to box his ears, and was not slow in putting the threat into execution; and soon afterwards Furlong rose to return home; and Sydney remembered she had forgotten to see to the health and comforts of a delicate calf; and though the servant and her brothers all offered to go, she would attend to it herself; and, five minutes after, her father went to the door, heard her light laugh and low murmuring voice, and saw her standing with her lover in the moonlight—he outside, and she inside the garden-gate, her hand clasped within his, and resting on the little pier that was clustered round with woodbine.—She looked so lovely in that clear pure light, that her father's heart ached from very anguish at the possibility of any harm happening to one so dear. He longed to ask Furlong if he knew Murphy, but a choking sensation to his throat prevented him. And when Sydney returned, he caught her to his bosom, and burst into a flood of such violent tears, as strong men seldom shed.

The poisoned chalice was approaching his own lips. What would he not have given at that moment that he had acceded to Mr. Herrick's proposal!—for had Murphy's villany become public, he must have quitted the country. How did he, even then, repent that he had not yielded to his reason, instead of his prejudice!

Young Furlong was at a loss to account for the steady determination with which, at their next meeting his intended father-in-law opposed his taking a farm in every way so advantageous; James hardly dared acknowledge to himself, much less impart to another, the dread he entertained of Steve Murphy's machinations; this was increased tenfold when he found that he was the person who not only desired, but had offered for that identical farm a heavier rent than he would ever have been able to pay for it. The landlord, well aware of this fact, and knowing that a rack-rent destroys first the land, secondly the tenant, and ultimately the landlord's property, had decided on bestowing his pet farm as a reward to the superior skill and industry of a young man whose enemies were too cowardly to attempt to substantiate their base charges against him.

I can only repeat my often expressed desire, that every other Irish landlord acted in the same manner. It would be impossible to convey an idea of how continually James Harragan's mind dwelt upon Steve Murphy's threat; at first he tried if Sydney's love towards Furlong was to be shaken, but that he found impossible.

"If you withdraw your consent, father," she said, "after having given it, and perfectly unable to find a single fault with him, I can only say I will not disobey you; but father, I will never marry—I will never take to any as I took to him, nor you need not expect it, you shall not make me disobedient, father, but you may break my heart." Sydney, resigned and suffering, pained her father more than Sydney remonstrating against injustice. She had before shown him how hard it was, not only after encouraging, but actually accepting Furlong, to dismiss him without reason, and had reproached him in an agony of bitter feeling for his inconsistency. When this did not produce the desired effect, her cheek grew pale, her step languid, her eyes lost their gentle brightness, and her eldest brother ventured to tell his father "that he was digging his daughter's grave!" The disappointment of the young man beggars description; he declared he would enlist go to sea, "quit the country," break his heart, shoot any one who put "betwixt them," and, after many prayers, used every possible and impossible threat, except the one which the Irish so rarely either threaten or execute, that of self-destruction, to induce James to alter his resolution; and James, unable to stand against this domestic storm, did of course retract; and the consequence was, that he lost by this changing mood the confidence of his children, who had ever till then regarded him with the deepest affection. He dared not communicate the reason of his first change for doing so would have betrayed the foolish and unfortunate secret he had persevered in keeping, in opposition to common sense, and the estrangement of an old and valuable friend: he could not witness the returned happiness of his children without foreboding that something was to occur that would completely destroy it; and the joyous laughter of his daughter, at one time the sweet music of his household, was sure to send him forth with an aching heart.

Nor was young Furlong without his anxieties; he received more than one anonymous letter, threatening that if he did not immediately give up all thoughts of the farm, he would suffer for it; the notices were couched in the usual terms, which, in truth, I care not to repeat; it is quite enough to say that they differed in no respect from others of a similar kind, and with a like intention. However inclined the young man might feel to despise such hints, the experience of the country unfortunately proved that they ought not to be disregarded; but his brother, stronger of heart, and spirit, argued that their faction was too powerful, their friends too numerous, to leave for fear that their own country was (as it really is) particularly quiet; and that, as Mr. Harragan was "so humorous," the best way would be to say nothing at all about it; that it was evident those who had tried to set the landlord against them, having failed in their design, resolved to try the effect of personal intimidation; concluding by observing, "that it was a safe way to go on easy," and "never heeding," the lease was signed, and the wedding over, and they'd "see about it." However consistent this mode of reasoning might be with Irish feeling, it was very sad to perceive how ready the Furlongs were to trust to the strong arm of the people, instead of appealing to the strong arm of the law. I wish the peasantry and their friends could perceive how they degrade themselves in the scale of civilized society by such a course; it is this perpetual taking of all laws, but particularly the law of revenge, into their own hands, that keeps up the hue and cry against them throughout England. I confess the time has been when there was one law for the rich and another for the poor, but it is so no longer; and humane lawgivers and administrators of law grow sick at heart when they perceive that they labor in vain for the domestic peace in Ireland.

A few days before the appointed time arrived when Sydney Harragan should become Sydney Furlong, she received a written declaration of love, combined with an offer of marriage, from Murphy. He watched secretly about the neighborhood, until an opportunity arrived for him to deliver it himself. Sydney, to whom he was almost unknown, at first gave a civil yet firm refusal; but when he persevered she became indignant, and said one or two bitter words, which he swore never to forget. She hardly knew why she concealed from her father the circumstance, which, upon consideration, she was almost tempted to believe a jest; but she did not even mention it to her brothers, fearing it might cause a quarrel, and every Irish woman knows how much easier it is commenced than quelled. Moreover, one mystery is sure to beget another.

At last the eventful day arrived—Sydney all hopes and blushes, her brothers full of frolic and fun, the bride's maids arrayed in their best, and busied in setting the house in order for the ceremony, which, according to ancient Catholic custom, was to take place in the afternoon at the dwelling of the bride.

"Did ye ever see such a frown over the face of a man in yet born days?" whispered Essy Hays to her sister-maid. "Do but just look at the masher, and see how his eyes are set on his daughter, and she reading her prayers like a good Christain, with one eye out of the window and the other on her book. Well, she a purty girl, and it's no wonder so few chances were going to others, and she to the fore."

"Speak for yourself!" exclaimed Jane Temple, tossing her fair ringlets back from her blue eyes. "She is purty for a dark-skinned girl there's no denying it."

"Dark haired, not darked skinned!" said Essy indignantly; "the darlint! She's the very moral of an angel. I wish to my heart the masher would not look at her so melancholy. May be he's thinking how like her poor dead mother she is! My! if here isn't his reverence (I know the cut of the grey mare, so smoothly jogging over the hill), and Mither Furlong not come! He went to his brother across the Ferry Carrig yesterday, and was to sleep at his aunt's in Wexford last night; I think he might have been here by this! Well if it was me, I would be affronted; it is not very late to be sure, only for a bridegroom!"

"Whisht, Essy, will you," returned Jane, "for fear she'd hear you; I never saw so young a bride take so early to the prayers; it seems as if something hung over her and her father for trouble!"

"I wonder ye're not ashamed of yerself, Jane," exclaimed the warm-hearted Essy, "to be raising trouble at such a time. Whisht! if there isn't the bridegroom's brother trotting up to the priest. What a handsome bow he makes his reverence, his hat right off his head with the flourish of a new shillala; but good luck to us all what ails the masher now!"

James Harragan also had seen the bridegroom's brother as he rode up the hill which fronted their dwelling, and sprang to his feet in an instant. When the heart is fully and entirely occupied by a beloved object, and that object is absent, alarm for its safety is like an electric shock, commencing one hardly knows how, but startling in its effects. Sydney looked in her father's face and screamed, while he, dreading that she had read the half-formed thoughts which were born of fear within his bosom at the sight of the bridesman without the bridegroom, uttered an imperfect assurance that "all was well—Ralph had waited for his aunt—and, no doubt, they would arrive together." With this assurance he hastened to the door to meet the priest and his companion, and his heart resumed its usual beatings when he observed the jovial expression of the old priest's face, and the rollicking air with which the bridesman bowed to the bride, who crouched behind her father, anxious to hear the earliest news, and yet held back by that sweet modesty which enshrines the hearts of my gentle countrywomen.

"Where's Ralph?" inquired the farmer, while holding the stirrup for his reverence to dismount.

"That's a nate question to be sure," answered his brother. "Where should he be? And so, Miss Sydney, you asked Mr. Herrick to come to the wedding, and never told any one of it, by way of a surprise to us—that was very purty of you—and that's the top of his new beaver coming along the hedge. Well, it's quite time Ralph showed himself, I think, and we in waiting."

"Don't be foolish, Harry Furlong!" exclaimed the farmer hastily. "You know very well that Ralph is not here."

"Well, that's done to the life," said the light-hearted fellow; "that's not bad for a very big—I mustn't say before the bride; but it's as bold-faced a story as ever I heard. Not here! then where is he?"

"With his aunt, I dare say, if you don't know," answered Essy.

"Oh, you're in the mischief too, are you, bright-eyed one? Why, you know he's hid here on the sly to surprise us. Aunt indeed! To be sure he's with his ould Aunt Bell and his bride alone! What a mighty quare Irishman he must be! I'll advise him not to come to you for a character, whatever I may do; eh, Essy?"

"Will you give over bothering?" she said, "Look at the color Sydney's turned, and see to the masher, the Lord be betwixt us and harm, none of your nonsense, but tell us where is Ralph?"

The aspect of things changed in an instant. Harry saw that his brother was not there, concealed as he had supposed him to be in mere playfulness, and knew that he had parted from him the night before at the other side of Ferry Carrig; that he was then on his way to Wexford, where he had promised to meet him in the morning; that he had been to their aunt's to keep his tryste, but that he had felt no uneasiness on finding Ralph not there, concluding, that instead of going to the town, he had gone to his bride's house in the country, for which he had intended mirthfully to reproach him when they met. Now seriously alarmed, his anxiety to prevent Sydney from partaking of his feelings almost deprived him of the power of speech; but he had said enough, and, just as Mr. Herrick crossed the threshold, the bride fainted at his feet.

Nothing could be more appalling than the change effected in a few moments in the expression of the farmer's face. While each was engaged in imparting to the other hopes for the bridegroom's reappearance and reasons for his delay, Harragan having put forth every other assistance, was bending over his insensible child, on the very bed from which she had that morning risen in the fullness of almost certain happiness for years to come. Alas! how little can we tell upon what of all we cherish in this changing world, each rising sun may set!

"If she's not dead," he muttered to himself, "she will die soon. May the Lord deliver me!—the Lord deliver me!" he continued, while chafing her temples; "I saw it all along, like a shroud above me, to fall round her—I did—I did. 'Who's that?' he inquired, fiercely, as the door gently opened, and Mr. Herrick entered within its sanctuary; 'oh, it's you, sir, is it? you may come in; I thought it was some of them light-hearted who don't know trouble. Shut them out; my trouble's heavy, sir; look at her Mither Herrick; and this was the wedding my little girl asked you to, out of friendliness to her father. Her father! why, the Holy Father who is above us all knows, that as sure as the beams of the blessed sun are shining on her deathly cheek, so sure am I Ralph Furlong's murderer! You need not draw back, Mr. Herrick, I know he's murdered; I felt struck with the knowledge of his death, and I could not help it, the minute his brother, (God help him!) laughed in my face. Don't raise up her head, sir; she'll come too soon enough—too soon, like a spirit that comes the earth but to leave it. I'm not mad, Mr. Herrick, though maybe I look so. Be it by fire or water, or steele or bullet, Ralph Furlong's a corpse, and I'll inform this time. I've heard tell the man that betrayed Christ wept after. What good was his tears? What good my informing now? but I will—I will. I'll make a clean breast for onst. I'll do the right thing now, if all the devils of hell tear me into pieces! I tell you sir, Steve Murphy did it!—black-hearted, cunning-headed, and bloody-handed he was, from the time his mother begged with him from door to door for what she did want, and taught him lies by every hedgerow and green bank through the country. I'm punished. Mr. Herrick, I'm punished. If I'd informed—but I'll not call it informing—if I'd told the truth, when you wanted me about the letters of the forge, he would not been in the country to commit murder. She's coming too, now, sir; she's coming to."

Gradually poor Sydney revived, but only to suffer more than she had as yet gone through. The people were greatly astonished at the conviction which rested on the farmer's mind that the young man had been murdered, a belief which extended itself to his daughter; for, from the moment she heard that Ralph was not with his aunt, it appeared as if every vestige of hope had vanished from her mind. The men of the company set forward an immediate inquiry; the neighborhood poured forth, every cottage was emptied of its inmates, the women flocking to the farmer's house to pour consolation and hope into the bosom of the bereaved bride, and the men to assist in a search, which at the noon-day hour, was a very uncommon occurrence. It is very rarely, indeed, that the Irish peasantry seek assistance either from the police or military force;—though they are fond of going to law, they detest those connected with the law. But Mr. Herrick promptly rode into Wexford, and having made the necessary inquiries, ascertained that young Furlong had not been seen at the town, he informed the proper authorities of his mysterious disappearance, and then turned his horse towards Ferry Carrig, to ascertain from the gate-keeper who had passed over the bridge the preceding evening.

Ferry Carrig is one of the picturesque spots which are not so frequently seen by those who journey thro' my native country. On one side of the Slaney, here a river of glorious width, rises boldly, and wildly, a conical hill, upon the summit of which stands out, in frowning ruins, one of the boldest of the square towers, of which so many were erected by the enterprising Fitz-Stepher. The opposite side of the bridge is guarded by a rock, not so steep or so magnificent as its neighbor, but not less picturesque, though its character is different; the one is absolutely garlanded with heaths, wild flowers, and the golden-blossoming furze; while the other affording barely a spot for vegetation, seems planted for eternity—so stern, and fixed, and rugged, that nothing save the destruction of the universe could shake its foundation.

The bridge erected across this beautiful water is of singular construction, and partakes of the wildness of the scene; the planks are not fastened at either end, and motion has a startling effect to one not accustomed to such modes of transit. When Mr. Herrick arrived at the toll-house, he learned that many inquiries had already been made, and that all the toll-keeper could say was, "that positively Ralph Furlong, whom he knew as well as his own son, had not crossed the bridge the preceding evening, although he had been on the look-out for him." The elder Furlong had accompanied his brother to within a mile of the Ennis-corthy side of the bridge, so his disappearance must have occurred between the spot where they separated and the Bride of Ferry Carrig. Nothing could exceed the energy and exertion to discover the lost bridegroom: every inquiry was made, every break explored, the rivers dragged, but no trace of Ralph Furlong was obtained. Mr. Herrick returned to the farm, and it was heart-breaking to observe the totally hopeless expression of Sydney's beautiful face.

"There is no knowing," said the kind gentleman, with a cheerfulness that he but imperfectly assumed; "there is no knowing—he may have left the country."

"No," was her reply; "he would never have deserted me!" Thus did her trust in her lover's fidelity outlive all hope of meeting him alive in this changing world.

In the meantime, James Harragan had proceeded alone to Steve Murphy's cottage. The sun had set when he found him sitting by his fire, not alone, for his sister was seated on the opposite side.

Harragan entered with a determined air of a desperate man, and neither gave salutation, nor returned that which was given.

"I come," said he, "to ask you where you have hid Ralph Furlong." The man started and changed color and then assuming a bold and determined air of defiance, hesitated not to inquire what the farmer meant, who, in reply, as boldly taxed him with the murder. Hard and desperate words succeeded, and the screams of the accused man's sister most likely prevented death for the farmer, a tall powerful man, had grasped Murphy so tightly by the throat, that a few minutes must have terminated his existence. Although by no means a weakling, he was as a green willow wand in the hands of his assailant.

In vain did this terrified sister declare that her brother was at home early in the evening, and went to bed before she did. Harragan persisted in his charge;—and had it not been for the force of superior numbers, he would have succeeded in dragging him to the next police station; but Irish assistance is much more easily procured against the law, than for it, though I confess, in this instance it was hard for those who did not know all the circumstances, to determine whose part to take, for Harragan was under the influence of such strong excitement, that he acted more like a maniac than a man in the possession of his senses.

Having failed in his first object, that of dragging Steve Murphy to justice himself, he mounted his horse, and laid before the nearest magistrate sufficient reason why Steve should be arrested, and detained until further inquiries were made, but when the police force sought for him, he was gone!—vanished! as delinquents vanish in Ireland, where hundreds of sober honest men will absolutely know where a villain is concealed, and yet suffer him to escape and commit more crimes, because their prejudices will not suffer them to inform.

Great was the excitement throughout the country, occasioned by this mysterious event. James Harragan lived but for one object, that of bringing the murderer to justice. This all-engrossing desire seemed to have absorbed even his affection for his child, that is to say, he would stroke her hair, or press her now colorless cheek to his bosom, and then, turning away with a deep sigh, go on laying down some new plan for the discovery of poor Ralph's murderer. Every body said that Sydney was dying, but her father did not seem to observe that her summer had ceased, when its sun was at the hottest, and its days are the longest, and that the rose was dropping leaf by leaf to the earth. Once Sydney attempted take the produce of her dairy, which her kind friend Essy tended with more care than her own to the market.

"If they don't notice me," she said. "I'll do bravely; you'll tell them, Essy, to never heed me." And so Essy did, but it would not do. No prudent motive yet was ever sufficiently strong to restrain the sympathy of the genuine Irish. Twenty stout arms were extended when her car stopped at the corner of the market-place to lift the pale girl off. There was not a woman in the square that did not leave her standing, and crowd round the widowed bride. It would have been as easy to turn the fertilising waters of the Nile, as to turn that torrent of affection. The young girls sobbed, and could not speak for tears; but those tears fell upon Sydney's hands, and moistened her cheeks; it was refreshing to them, for she herself had long ceased to weep; hers were the only dry eyes in the crowd. The mothers prayed that God might bless her, and "raise her up again to be the flower of the country."

"Never heed, Sydney darlint; sure you've the prayers of the country."

"And the double prayers of the poor," exclaimed a knot of beggars, who had abated their vocations to put up their petitions in her favor.

Sydney could have borne coldness or neglect, but kindness overpowered her, and she was obliged to return, leaving her small merchandise to Essy's care.

Every one said that Sydney was hastening to her grave but still her father heeded it not; no bloodhound ever toiled or panted more eagerly to recover the scent which he had lost, than did the farmer to trace Steve Murphy's flight; it was still his absorbing idea, both by day and night. Had it not been for the exertions of his sons, his well-cultivated farm would have gone to ruin. His health was suffering from this monomania; the flesh shrank daily from his bones; and the healthy jocund farmer was changing into gantic skeleton. The priest talked to him, Mr. Herrick reasoned with him, but all to no purpose.

Time passed, and James Harragan entered his cottage as the sun was setting. He had stood for the last hour leaning against the post of his gate, apparently engaged in watching the sparrows flying in and out of their old dwelling-places in the thatch. His sons had prepared his supper, and he sat down mechanically in his old place; the two lads whispered for some time together at the window, when suddenly Harragan inquired "what they muttered for?" the youths hesitated to reply.

"Let me know what it was!" he exclaimed. "I'll have no whispering, no coohing, no hiding and seeking in my house. Boys, there's a hell at this moment burning in yer father's breast! Look, I never could kill one of them small birds that destroy the roof above our heads, without feeling I took from the innocent things the life I couldn't give; and yet, what does that signify? Isn't my hand red at this time of speaking with that boys blood; Red—it's red hot, hissing red with the blood of Ralph Furlong! It is as much so as if I did it! And why?—because I hold on at the mystery that shades the guilty, and hurries on the innocent to destruction—because I wouldn't inform! Now, mind me, boys, I'll hear nothing but out speaking; no whispering; where there is that sort of secrecy, there's sin and the curse. Why are you whispering?" he added, in a voice of thunder.

"We war only saying, sir," replied the eldest "that we wonder Sydney and Essy ain't back."

"Back! Why, where is my little girl?"

"She took a thought this morning and she answered, 'and we don't like to say against her, that she'd walk from Ferry Carrig Bridge to where he parted from his brother, and took Essy with her on the car as far as the bridge; it's a notion she had.'"

"My colleen—my pride!—my darlint!" he ejaculated, much moved, "and I not know this! Yer mother little thought when she made ye over to me before death, made her over to the holy angels, what would happen. And ye didn't tell me, because ye thought I didn't care! Well, I forgive ye—I forgive ye boys! I didn't neglect her though, for all that; my heart was set on another matter. There is but one thing she can spake on, one thing I can spake on—and it is better we shouldn't—but, and when she does look at me, though my little girl strives to keep it under, there is in her eyes what says, 'If he had spoken the truth long ago, it's a happy wife I'd be now instead of—' Oh, God! oh, God!" he exclaimed passionately. "that I should have suffered such a snake to fatten on the land, when I could have crushed him under my heel! I'd have rest in my grave if I could see him in his. I'll go meet her, boys. You should have gone before." And the farmer stalked forth, and, silently, mounting his cob, proceeded on the road to Ferry Carrig.

There are mysteries around us, both night and day, for which it would be difficult indeed to account; and the impulse that drew Sydney that morning to the banks of the Slaney, was, and ever must be, unaccountable.

"Nurses," she said to her faithful friend Essy, after they had crossed the bridge, and, quitting the coach-road, made unto themselves a path along the bank; "nurses like you, Essy, may be called the brides' maids of death, and you have been my nurse all thro' this sickness. Essy afterwards said she did not know what there was in those words to make her cry, but she could not answer for weeping. The two girls wandered on, Sydney every now and then to look into the depths and shallows of the river, and prying beneath every broad green leaf and clump of trees that overhung its banks. More than once did Essy propose their return, but Sydney went on, as if she had not spoken. At last they came to species of deep drain, almost overgrown with strong, tall leafy water plants, that was always filled when the tide was full in. Essy sprang lightly over it, and then turning a little way up to where it was narrower, she extended her hand to her feeble friend. Although the gulf was narrow, it was very deep: the root of a tree formed a natural dam across it, so that much water was retained. As Sydney was about to cross, she cast her eyes beneath, started, and held back. She did not speak, but, with her hand pointed downwards, Essy's shriek rang thro' the air—the face of Ralph Furlong stared at them from the bottom of the silent pond!

Had she not removed the broad leaves of a huge dock that shaded the water, so that Sydney's footing might be sure, the unconscious girl would have stepped without knowing it over his liquid grave. Essy was so overwhelmed with horror, that she ran shrieking towards the highway; several minutes elapsed before she returned with assistance; and then where was Sydney! The faithful girl in endeavoring to draw his body from the waters, had fallen in; her head was literally resting on his bosom, and her long beautiful hair floating like a pall above them!

They were buried in the same grave!

When Murphy's cottage was searched by the police, the only weapon, if so it could be called, which they discovered was a broken reaping-hook; this James Harragan had taken to his own house, and in the folds of poor Ralph's coat, those who prepared him for his earthly grave discovered the missing portion. The farmer was seen to shed no tear over his daughter, but registered an oath in heaven that he would never take rest upon his bed until he had brought the murderer to justice. Within a week after, he relinquished his farm to his sons, and it is believed he has journeyed to foreign lands in pursuit of one, who in the first instance, escaped justice through James Harragan's own weak and almost wicked perseverance in a wrong cause. Years passed since the melancholly event occurred, and no tidings has reached the country relative to Harragan or the murderer. Well, indeed, may he remember Mr. Herrick's warning. The farmer had, by withholding his information refused to pluck out the arrow which an unseen hand had planted in the bosom of an industrious man, and the same power had been employed to overthrow his happiness for ever!

ANTIQUE.—A colored man, named Thos. Prince, who lived at No. 82 East Broadway, aged 111 years, died yesterday at his house. He was a very smart old man, and no longer ago than Thursday walked down town and back with ease, and about as quick as a man in the prime of life. He died about 2 o'clock yesterday, suddenly, but undoubtedly from old age.—Sun.

The population of New Orleans is said to be about 100,000. In 1830 it was 50,000 having doubled in ten years.

MASONRY IN KENTUCKY.—The Grand Lodge of the State of Kentucky, held its annual meeting in the city of Louisville, on the last Monday in August last, 1840. We have been favored with a copy of its proceedings, from which we make such extracts, as we believe will be of interest, to the brethren of this, and other States.

During the past year dispensations have been granted to form new Lodges at Ottawa, Illinois; Flemingsburgh, Somerset, Hopkinsville, Hawesville, Crab Orchard, Danville, Louisville, Minerva, &c. Contrasting the present, with the proceedings of the past year, we are gratified to perceive an evident increase in the business of the Grand Lodge of that State, which looks well. There have been three hundred and twenty-seven initiations during the past year in the various lodges under the jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge, which affords gratifying evidence that Masonry is any thing but dead in our land.

Brother Pilcher, from the Committee on Foreign Communications, made the following report, which was read and concurred in:—

"It is perceived that the schism between the Lodges of New-York is still unsettled, while your committee regrets its continuance, they deem no action on it necessary.

The Grand Lodge of New York suggests a mode of intercommunication between the several Grand Lodges of the Union, by the appointment of resident representatives by each Grand Lodge at every other—this plan your committee find is disapproved by other G. Lodges in correspondence with this Grand Lodge—and they think it will not succeed.

The Grand Lodge of Alabama suggests a General convention of one from each Grand Lodge in the United States, to be held at Washington City, on the 1st Monday in March, 1842. This plan is also disapproved by your committee.

The Grand Lodge of New York calls attention to the propriety of communing with Masons, using the French and Scottish titles—and upon it your committee would report that the notice taken of it by other Grand Lodges is favorable to the communion—and your committee are aware of no good reason against it.

The Grand Lodges of Mississippi and Missouri, hold it to be the true Masonic doctrine, that all work of Subordinate Lodges should be done in the third degree—and that E. A. and F. C. Masons should not be regarded as members. The practice and rules of the Lodges subordinate to the Grand Lodges of Kentucky, has heretofore been different, and being part of the Constitution of the Order in this State, will not be lightly disturbed.

Your committee would congratulate the Fraternity on the acknowledged increasing prosperity of Masonry in the United States, as shown by the various communications they have examined."

During the Grand Communication, the following preamble and resolutions were offered, which were read and adopted. The object is a noble one, and much good cannot help but flow from it.

"Whereas, The brethren of the Masonic Order in the State of Kentucky, are deeply impressed with the salutary advantage of the Institution to its members; and desire to give to it a more diffusive and lasting value, by impressing its benefit on the whole community by acts of public benevolence consonant with the true spirit of its liberal and enlightened principles—Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of five brethren viz: — be, and they are hereby appointed, whose duty it shall be to enquire into the expediency of establishing and endowing, at the expense of this Grand Lodge, aided by such donations of Masons as their ability and willingness shall contribute, a Seminary of learning, at some suitable point in Kentucky, to be selected by said committee, on the labor principle—to be called the Kentucky Masonic Orphan's Asylum—where the orphans of Masons shall be reared, educated, and taught to practice healthy labor in agriculture, and such mechanic arts as such an institution can properly and easily afford; in addition to the useful branches of a mathematical and English education.

Resolved, That the site so selected shall be healthy and adapted for the purpose, and shall be a tract of good land, containing not less than 200 acres—and that said committee shall report the advantages and disadvantages of the site, the cost of the land, its distance from market, and the most suitable avocations of labor in which the pupils can be employed with most health and greatest profits.

Resolved, That said committee enquire and report the kind, and probable cost of suitable buildings for the accommodation of pupils, not exceeding 100 males and 50 females, capable of being enlarged as circumstances may hereafter require.

Resolved, That the said committee, enquire and report the number of the teachers or overseers required to conduct said establishment and the probable salary of each.

Resolved, That said committee prepare from the best lights they may procure or possess, a system of police for the government of said institution by this Grand Lodge, and for the internal regulation of said institution, fixing the times of labor and study in such manner as each duty will not interfere with the other, and which shall render it both easy and agreeable to the pupils.

Resolved, That the said committee be authorized to receive donations from private Masons to aid the object, and that the Master and Wardens of each subordinate Lodge in the State, be requested to open a subscription for, and receive donations from their members and other Masons in their vicinity, so as to show this Grand Lodge how much money can be raised in that way, previous to any further action on the subject by this Grand Lodge.

Resolved, That said committee report to the next annual Convention of this Grand Lodge, all the matters hereby confided to them respectively, and that said committee report all and any further information as they in their discretion shall deem useful on the subject, to the Grand Lodge.

Resolved, That the publication of the minutes of this Grand Lodge shall be sufficient notice to the said Master and Wardens of the subordinate Lodges, hereby appointed committees, and they are hereby requested forthwith to enter upon the duties hereby enjoined upon them.

Whereupon, Brothers Pilcher, Turpin, Breckenridge, Allen, and McCullough, were appointed said committee."

During the communication of the Grand Lodge a procession was formed by the fraternity, which moved to the Methodist Episcopal Church, where an Address was delivered by Br. Burch, upon the principles of Masonry—which was followed by some appropriate remarks from the Rev. Br. Wm. Holeman. The Procession then returned to the Hall, and were dismissed.

EARLY NOMINATION.—The last Westchester Democrat places the name of Richard M. Johnson, at the head of the column, as the next candidate for President. This beats the almanac makers all hollow.

THE STEAM SHIP PRESIDENT, which sailed from New York on Monday the 2d inst. has been compelled to return on account of the stress of weather and a lack of fuel. This unlooked-for delay will no doubt occasion much anxiety on the other side of the water, for those friends expected in her.

A NUISANCE.—Will the Keeper of the Exchange, oblige those citizens who resort to the post office (and particularly females) by driving from it the vagabond newsboys and other pedlars, who line the hall. The foul and disgusting language which is constantly used there, and which females are compelled to hear, is disgraceful, and deserves a horsewhip well laid on.

"DON'T GIVE UP THE SHIP."—The editor of the New York Standard is determined not to cry "enough" notwithstanding the reverses of the party. The Van Buren colors still fly on his "Standard,"—the magical letters of O. K. are not reversed—and the "Gentleman Hen," still struts as large as life at the head of the column, apparently without a feather disturbed.—Mumford is a game chicken—he is no crying philosopher. The following paragraph closes an editorial article, of Tuesday:

"We do not mean to be bragged down—crowded down—or laughed down. They may lie us down—but we won't lie as they do, when we are down. They may lay us out, but that won't make us lie. If they will lie on, why, let them lie still. They are more liable than reliable. Crow, Chapman, crow—S. O. K." [Silly Old Korrekt.]

THANKSGIVING.—Governor Seward has recommended Thursday, the Seventeenth day of December next, to be observed as a day of Praise, Thanksgiving and Prayer in this State.

The Executive mansion, purchased by the people of this State, for the use of the governor, about which our readers have heard so much, was sold on Tuesday last, to Mr. Erastus Corning, for the sum of $14,250.

ACCIDENT.—A young woman, by the name of Taylor, living in the employment of Mr. Talcott, of this city, was burnt to death, a few days since, in consequence of her clothes taking fire.

THE ELECTIONS, throughout the country have proved adverse to Mr. VAN BUREN. In this state, the Harrison Electoral ticket is elected from 10 to 12,000. The whig governor by about 6000, a whig Assembly from four to six majority, the congressional ticket nearly balanced, and the 8 senatorial districts have elected 4 democrats and 4 whigs.

In Pennsylvania, there still remains uncertainty although the whigs claim the state by 186 votes. The Evening Journal puts down the following states as having gone for Gen. Harrison, which gives him 185 votes in the Electoral college:—New-York, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Maryland, Ohio, Maine, Pennsylvania, Georgia, Indiana, Kentucky, Michigan, Massachusetts. Both parties, we believe, claim Virginia.

The Galveston Gazette states, that a man named John Tyler, had been sentenced to fourteen years imprisonment in Bermuda by the British Government, for having kidnapped negroes from The British Islands and sold them in Texas.

HORSE ECLIPSE.—The celebrated horse Eclipse is to be kept in Alabama next season. He will be twenty-six years old in May next.

A blacksmith of Cleveland, named Raiorden, was kicked on the head while shoeing a horse, on Monday last, and killed. A wife and three children mourn the sudden bereavement.

There is a traditionary prophecy among the Chinese, that they are to be conquered by white people from the west, clothed from head to foot.

EXPULSION.

At a stated meeting of Louisville Encampment, No. 1, held at their Temple, on the evening of 24th October, inst. Robert Storey of Louisville, and late of Cincinnati Encampment of Knights Templars, was expelled from all the rights, benefits and privileges of the Orders of Knighthood, for gross unmasonic conduct

POETRY.

THE BLIND HARPER.

He stood beside his silent harp,
That poor and sightless man;
And muteless o'er the slumbering chords,
His wasted fingers ran.

There was a tear upon his cheek,
Fall'n from his mindless eye:
The quenching of the visual ray,
Leaves not that fountain dry.

Some by-gone sorrow stirr'd the font,
Some mem'ry of the dead:
Some fitting harmony which spoke,
Of days of promise fled.

That chord has touched an answering chord,
And memory's hand portrays
Upon the mental retina,
"The light of other days."

Alas for thee! has all been dark,
In this fair world of ours?
Its hills, its dales, its woods and wilds—
Its sunshine and its flowers.

Its birds and butterflies that flit,
With bright and beautiful wings,
The broad blue vault, the depthless sea,
With all its thousand living things.

The many fair young forms which pass,
Where'er the eye can roam,
Which shed such love and loveliness,
On many a joyous home.

The bright and deep tinged eye of jet,
The blue's more melting ray;
The wreathes of curls about the brow,
Where mind and music play.

The smile upon her lip, the glance
Which kindest thoughts bespeak;
The lilies of the forehead fair,
The roses of the cheek.

A blank to thee! poor sightless man—
Then surely those who see:
Should spare the something from the store
Of gifts, denied to thee.

BRING WINE, &c.

Bring wine! but not for the festal board—
The wretch sits not where the song is pour'd!
Not where the lamps of the banquet blaze,
Falleth the gleam of his wandering gaze!
He hath gone apart, in the rayless night
Of his fierce thoughts, and scorns the light;
He hath gone apart, in his mute despair—
Bring wine! to cheer the dark man there,

Bring wine!—nor yet for the lip of youth;
There needs no flush for its glow of truth;
The man of years!—he hath turned aside,
The cursing moan and the tear to hide;
His foot hath crossed life's rugged steep,
And the valley opens for his dreamless sleep—
Sleep, that shall pain and grief assuage!
Bring wine, rich wine! for the sleep of age.

Bring wine, bring wine!—O'er the bridal bower,
That bloomed and blushed in the morning hour,
The night hath passed with its chilling breath,
And the rose-strewn couch is to the bier of death.
The guest sits there, and his cold still eye,
Looks where the forms of the bridal lie—
The guest!—with no wreath his brow is clad!
Bring wine! for the dead-watch—his soul is sad.

Yet, yet, bring wine! with floods of cheer,
To wash the stain of the mourner's tear!
The mother's grief, and the sister's woe,
The father's moan for his son laid low—
Mid his clanging arms, with stride of might,
He strode the morn—and is this his night?
The bowed are there, with the sigh and wail,

Bring wine, bring wine!—for their lips grow pale!

Bring wine!—vain,—vain! It hath nought of power,
The cheer of wine, in the souls darkest hour!
The cup is hurled from the wretch's rage,
It falls from the palsied hand of age!
The wine shines not where the dead have lain,
For the thirst of grief 'tis outpoured in vain;
It is vain, for the cheer of the glowing bowl—
Bring wine no more, for the darkened soul.

Bring wine no more, and awake no song
The bowed heart and the sad among!
But come with whispers of heaven and peace,
And the promised rest—the moan shall cease.
The tear shall fade from the mourner's eye,
And the grief weighed spirit mount on high;
Come where the plaint and the sigh is heard—
Yet bring no wine, but the Savior's word.

INEZ.

THE EARLY DEAD.

BY MRS. HALL.

He rests—but not the rest of sleep
Weighs down his sunken eyes;
The rigid slumber is too deep,
The calm too-breathless lies.
Shrunk are the wandering veins that streak
The fixed and marble brow,
There is no life-flush on the cheek—
Death! Death! I know thee now.

Pale king of terrors, thou art here
In all thy dark array;
But 'tis the living weep and fear
Beneath thy iron sway:
Bring flowers, and crown the Early Dead,
The hour of bondage's past;
But wo, for those who mourn and dread
And linger to the last.

Spring hath its music and its bloom,
And morn its glorious light,
But still, a shadow from the tomb,
A sadness and a blight,
Are ever on earth's loveliest things:
The breath of change is there,
And death his dusky banner flings
O'er all that's loved and fair.

So let it be—for ne'er on earth
Should man his home prepare;
The spirit feels its heavenly birth,
And spurns at mortal care.
Even when young Worth and Genius die,
Let no vain tears be shed,
But bring bright wreaths of victory,
And crown the early Dead.

THE RAISING OF LAZARUS.

Meekly he sunk into the arms of death,
And days and nights had seen his last deep sleep,
And they who loved him, with a breaking heart,
Had laid the lifeless form in its low grave;
And felt that nature in her smiles is dark,
And earth with all its joys, is comfortless
To those who mourn the dead. And there was One
In human form, the Lord of life, who took,
That man might be redeemed from the grave's power,
The weakness and sorrows of our nature.
And he, in friendship's pure devotedness,
Was bound to him who rested in the tomb;
And in the tenderness of mortal grief,
Was come to that low cave, and stood and wept.
The angels, bending from their bright abode,
Wondered at the strange love.

The Saviour stood,
And at his side were seen the grief bowed forms
Of those who wept in the deep silent woe
Of woman's heart, when woman's heart is broken.
And many witnessing that wordless grief,
Wondering that love so tender and so strong—
Love which had given light to sightless eyes,
Could not have stayed the wasting of disease
And saved the gentle-victim from the grave.

"Take ye the stone away," the Saviour said,
At his command, they took away the stone
From the dark chamber where the dead was laid,
And watched in their deep silence. All was hushed!
And Jesus raised his eyes to the pure heaven,
His home of glory ere the worlds were made,
And strong in faith unwavering, held, as man,
Sublime communion with the Source of Being.
Then he the Resurrection and the Life,
Spoke to the lifeless clay, 'Lazarus, come forth!
Death heard that mighty voice! The dead came forth
A living man.

AN ADDRESS,

Delivered at the public installation of officers of St. John's Lodge, No. 1, Portsmouth, New Hampshire, December, 27, A. L. 5837, by JOHN CHRISTIE, Past Master of said Lodge.

Respected Friends and Brethren.—It is a trite remark, but therefore not less true, that man is a social being.

If we were not in the possession of the divine declaration, "that it is not good for man to be alone," still all history, observation, and experience, furnish abundant evidence to establish the fact, that man was designed by the Creator for society.

God, in his infinite goodness, has implanted in the human mind, the germs of the most wonderful capacities, and enabling virtues; but it is only in the social state, that these can vegetate and be developed. Society alone furnishes opportunities for exhibiting all their beauty and loveliness, those tender affections and charities, which adorn and beautify the mind of man.

It is in social life only, that the nature of man can be displayed in its full dimensions and glory. It is in this condition alone, that we are to look for the evidences of the exalted nature of man. The progress of society has been gradual. It commenced with the most interesting of all relations, that of husband and wife; to these were added those of parent and child, then followed, in regular succession, the various relations that subsist between the individuals composing families, tribes, kingdoms, and nations.

As civilization has extended her benign and amelioration influences over the human race, so in the same rating, has knowledge progressed, and the various arts and sciences have advanced towards perfection; as man has emerged from the darkness of barbarism, so has his mental nature become purified and he has shaken off the debasing effects of modes of living for their chief object, the preservation and continuance of the health and life of the earthly tabernacle, with which infinite Wisdom has seen fit to connect the human mind, in the first stage of its existence.

It is in civilized society only, that the powers and endowments of man as an intellectual and moral being can, in any good degree, be discovered and brought into useful operation; but, for the full development of the moral and mental abilities of man, we must look onward to that stage of human existence, when the bright, pure, and life-giving beams of the glorious Sun of Righteousness, shall irradiate with light divine the dark recesses of the soul, and wake into active existence all the latent powers, capacities, affections, and graces, with which the Omnipotent has enriched our moral and intellectual natures. It is in that state alone that the human mind will become the "garden of the Lord;" that the true relations which exist between man and his Maker, between man and his fellow beings will be fully known, appreciated and acted upon.—This knowledge and moral action, we doubt not will result in the enjoyment of that holiness, and happiness, for which God has designed his offspring.

In the bosom of the grand divisions of the human race into empires and nations, numerous associations have at different times, and for various purposes, been organized and put in operation. Some have been formed for the advancement of the various arts whose productions are necessary for convenience, comfort and pleasure of man; others have been established for the promotion of sciences; others, for the diffusion of knowledge; and others for feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, relieving the distressed, and improving the moral and religious condition of our race. In no age of the world has the principle of association been so largely developed, and carried into operation so extensively as in our own day.

The present time is proverbial for the multifarious associations and institutions which are in operation for numberless objects having relation to the advancement of the arts, sciences, knowledge, morals and religion among men.

Amdst the variety of associations, the most prominent station is held by the Masonic Institution. This society has many peculiar and striking characteristics. It has existed from time immemorial, as there is abundant evidence to prove; it has spread over almost the whole habitable earth; it has witnessed the rise and fall of empires; it has beheld kingdom after kingdom, and nation after nation, rise to the zenith of earthly grandeur and fame, and fall into decay and ruin. Generation after generation have appeared upon the world's wide stage; have performed their parts in the great drama of human life, and sunk into their primeval dust. Year after year, century after century, have rolled away into the boundless and unfathomable ocean of eternity. Societies and associations of varied character have been organized in our world; have flourished, and at last, dwindled away into nonentity. And during this long series of changes, Freemasonry has existed. Nor has our society constantly enjoyed the sunshine of prosperity. No! "many times and oft," has the tempest cloud of adversity hung over it and darted its bolts in fury upon it; often have the raging waves of cruel persecution beaten against it, and the winds of foul calumny and reproach, blown their pestiferous blasts; but all in vain; the rain descended, the floods came, the winds blew, and beat upon it, but Masonry fell not; it stood—it still stands—and we believe with undoubting confidence, that it will stand, firm and steadfast, until the noontide blaze of the Millennial day, shall burst in glory upon our darkened and sinful world.

The question now arises, wherein does the strength of the Masonic Institution lie? from what source has proceeded that sustaining influence, which has borne it safely over the tide of time; that has preserved it amid the destruction of nations; that has shielded it from the storm of adversity; and rendered the efforts of power to effect its overthrow, impotent and vain? I reply—the strength of Masonry is to be found in its doctrines and principles; these are its very life-blood: take from our Institution its principles, and nought would remain but a useless skeleton.

My friends, I have to ask your indulgence, while attempting, in my simple manner, to present to your view a faint picture of the doctrines and principles of the Masonic Institution: these are, faith in God, hope in immortality, and charity or love to all mankind.

The atheist cannot knowingly be permitted to tread the courts, or even pass the threshold of the temple of Masonry; on those walls, in every apartment, from foundation to capstone, is inscribed in characters of living light, "THERE IS A GOD."

"But Masonry does not rest satisfied with admitting the abstract proposition that God exists. We, as Masons, believe in God as the architect of universal nature as a moral governor of the universe, who has established and promulgated laws, for the government of his moral creation; in one word, we believe in God as he has made himself known to man in the Holy Writings. This great light in Masonry, whose sacred pages are now lying open in our midst, we regard as the inestimable gift of God to man, and take as the man of our counsel, and the guide and directory of our faith.

Masonry views man as a being designed for immortality, and possessing attributes and powers which eternity alone can fully develop; and therefore, it is his intellectual and moral constitution that she values.—With her, the mind is the man, and it is in accordance with this principle, that she acts. Wealth, power, rank, and the many puerile senseless distinctions that poor deluded man is too apt to consider as constituting the very summit of greatness and glory, Masonry values only as they are made instrumental in promoting the good of our race, and increasing the sum of human happiness. She looks not at the temporal circumstances in which man may, by the providence of God, be placed. Moral virtue is the test, by which Masonry tries those who seek a participation in her privileges and pleasures. The man who acts constantly with reference to his high parentage, who makes the will of God his standard of duty, though he may be the tenant of a hovel or clothed in rags, Masonry regards as exalted in the scale of true greatness infinitely above the despot, elevated on a throne, and surrounded with all the "pomp and circumstance" of real grandeur, who with proud arrogance, looks upon his fellow-creatures but as the mere tools of ambition, and created solely for the purpose of administering to his wants, and gratifying his unholy passions and appetites. With such views of man, Freemasonry holds no communion.

Another of our doctrines is universal charity or love. Viewing the human race as constituting but one great family, whose dwelling-place is the earth, whose father is God, we are constrained to regard all, as proper objects of our love and good will. Our Institution teaches us that we are all members one of another; that the high and low, the learned and the ignorant, the rich and the poor, being the offspring of the same infinite parent, are bound by the most sacred ties to aid each other in all lawful undertakings, to exert their best powers in promoting each other's happiness, and in protecting each other as far possible, from danger and difficulty. On this broad basis, the Masonic superstructure is erected; and in conformity to this principle, men of every sect, opinion and country, are found among the members of the brotherhood. Kings and subjects, nobles and peasants, rulers and people, mingle together in Masonic assemblies on one common level and recognize in each other a friend and brother. In the Lodge, all earthly distinctions are lost, and differences of opinion are suffered to sleep. You see, my friends, in the circle of Masons here assembled, men attached to the different political parties into which our population is divided; men, too, who are zealous supporters of their peculiar views of public matters and measures. Notwithstanding these differences, we here meet as brethren, and interchange feelings of kindness and good fellowship. I would here remark, that in a country possessing a government like our own, where political struggles are maintained with such feeling and zeal, where the waves of party spirit sometimes roll over the land, threatening ruin and destruction to all we hold dear; it is beyond human power, to estimate the good that results from the Masonic Institution, in softening and subduing the angry passions; in quenching the kindling flames of hatred and discord, which too often appear in our political contests; and in allaying the feverish excitement incident to political life. Again, with reference to religious matters, similar effects are visible. In the Lodge are seen, members of the various denominations into which the Christian world is divided, divested of their distinctive badges, meeting each other as the children of the same Parent and offering their prayers and thanksgivings at the same altar. Said a deceased brother, (an Unitarian clergyman in a neighboring State,) "I bless God that there is one place on earth where men of different and opposing sentiments can meet as brethren. Yes, I am received with the cordial grasp of friendship when I enter the Lodge, by the Swedenborgian, the Episcopalian, the Methodist, the Calvinist, the Baptist, and the Universalist. All feelings of pity or compassion on account of each other's error are banished from our bosom. All hearts seem to be filled with brotherly love; and (he continues) if the Christian Church would exhibit a similar specimen of union and affection, it would represent more fully the kingdom of heaven."

When we consider this peculiar trait in the character of the Masonic Institution, we have great cause for thankfulness. There seems to be in the human heart, a strong tendency to nourish feelings of suspicion and jealousy towards those, who happen to disagree with us in opinions and sentiments; and unless these dispositions are neutralized and their baleful influence counteracted, they will at last break out in open dislike and hatred. But let the liberal and generous sentiment inculcated in the Masonic Lodges be felt in every bosom, and the time would soon arrive, when peace and love would pervade the earth "as the waters cover the sea."

With reference to the generous sentiments which Masons cherish towards each other, notwithstanding their differences of opinion in religion and politics, I would observe, that, in indulging these feelings there is no compromising of one particle of principle, no relinquishing of a single item in our religious or political creeds. Masonry recognizes the right of private judgment, and requires her votaries to think and act on all subjects, as duty and conscience shall direct.—Holding such doctrines, and supporting such principles certain duties become obligatory upon the Mason, from the performance of which, he cannot innocently release himself. At the head of the list stands our duty to God.

The consistent and true Mason, at all times and in every place, will never take the name of the Omnipotent upon his lips but with that reverence and awe becoming a creature produced by his power, and continued in being by his beneficence and mercy. In all his lawful undertakings, the good Mason looks to God in filial confidence, for his blessing and aid. When prosperity showers upon him in bountiful profusion, blessings and happiness, he forgets not the hand whence all blessings flow, the source whence all comfort springs. In adversity, he bows submission and resignation to the stroke of Providence, feeling assured that Omniscience cannot err, that Infinite Justice can do no wrong, that Boundless Love cannot wound, but for a benevolent purpose. In every event of life, he sees the finger of God.

As Masons we are bound to regard every human being as a proper object of our kindness and good offices. Our charity should be as extensive as the universe. Wherever misery exists, there should the Mason be found like the good Samaritan pouring oil and wine into the wounded, lacerated bosom. Wherever haggard want shows its emaciated features, there will the true Mason be seen, tendering his timely aid; feeding and clothing the hungry, freeing orphan, whom an inscrutable Providence has seen fit to deprive of its earthly protectors, and causing the heart of her who has been left alone to buffet the waves of poverty, to sing for joy. In a word, wherever sickness, distress and unhappiness are found, there is the proper place for the Mason to work.

In the State, the consistent Mason will always be the good citizen, the firm unshrinking supporter of law, of order, of right. He will never be found engaged in conspiracies or plots for the purpose of overturning and subverting a government based upon the principles of liberty and equal rights. He will not be the aider or abettor of those whose designs and objects are destructive to the public welfare and happiness, and inimical to those rights and immunities, which God has bestowed upon man. He will not, he cannot be the promoter of anarchy, licentiousness, or lawless violence.

In his religious character, the Mason, who knows, and acts under the influence of Masonic principles, will not be found in the ranks of the bigot; his hands will not be seen kindling the fires of persecution, neither will he be heard saying to his fellow, "stand by thyself, come not near to me, for I am holier than thou;" and why?—because he has, in the school of Masonry, been taught the great truths that man is accountable alone to his conscience and his God, for his opinions—that God possesses the prerogative of judging, as he alone reads the hearts of men, and knows the circumstances, causes, and motives under whose influence, man thinks and acts.

In all his dealings with his fellow-beings, the golden rule, "as ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them," is as obligatory upon the Mason as the Christian; and in all the varied relation and duties of life, the same laws that point out the course of the Christian should regulate the conduct of the Mason. Again the Mason owes certain duties to himself, and a due attention to these is made binding upon him by his profession. He should be ever conscious that he is not his own, but the property of his God, and that it is his bounden duty to cultivate and improve as far as possible, the numerous powers and faculties with which he is blessed, for his own advancement in virtue, and the advantage of all with whom he is connected. He will, therefore, be watched, and endeavor to keep every passion within its proper bounds; he will restrain every improper desire, curb his wayward propensities, and nature and cultivate every good disposition and affection of the soul. Every day's observation convinces us that intemperance is the prolific source of a great proportion of the suffering, misery, degradation and crime, with which our world is cursed. This dreadful vice debases the intellect, and prevents its noble powers; horrible marts and disfigures the image in which man was created; extinguishes the light of reason, "the candle of the Lord;" and spreads confusion and chaos over the mind. It sinks man, possessing powers and affections, which if properly cultivated and richly employed, would fit him for the society of angels, even below the level of the brute.

The wings of every breeze bear to our ears the deep sighs of the broken-hearted wife, whose hopes have been crushed, whose fond anticipations have been blasted—the cry of the little one perishing with hunger and cold—and the wail of poverty and despair.—Such are some of the horrible consequences of intemperance.

Would to God that the community would arise as one man, and exert every power it possesses in driving from the earth, the infernal demon of intemperance.—The good Mason will avoid intemperance and excess of every description, as he would deadly poison, knowing that their consequences are of the most deplorable character, destructive alike to the health and soundness of body and mind: he will ever be on his guard against every approach of the tempter in whatever form he may appear. And this course he is bound to pursue, as the friend of his race, as the lover of moral order and virtue.

Our principles are presented to the mind, and their observance is enforced, in various ways. One of the most beautiful, interesting, and impressive means employed in the school of Masonry for imparting instruction, is the adoption of a variety of sensible objects, as mementoes and emblems of valuable and important moral truths. It is unnecessary to enter into a discussion (even if I possessed the ability) of the utility and advantages of adopting symbols for the inculcation of truth, as their use is justified by the fact, that the Sacred Writings abound with instances of the sort, from the adoption of the rainbow as a token of the covenant which God made with Noah, to the last supper of the Saviour of the world, when he selected the elements of bread and wine, as emblems of his body and blood, then about to be broken and shed for sinful, and fallen man. Of the advantages of symbols and emblems it would seem every one must be aware. When the bow in the cloud meets the physical organ, there is instantaneously presented to the mental vision, a view of God's mercy and forbearance towards his rebellious creatures. And so with the Christian—when the bread and wine are offered to his bodily senses, the awful scenes of Calvary are vividly brought before the mind; he sees the body of his Master, nailed to the cross; he beholds the blood gushing from his mangled hands, feet and side; he hears his dying groans: in a word, the whole of the stupendous tragedy is presented to the mental eye, and all the soul subduing manifestations and evidences of that love which was stronger than death, are exhibited to the soul through the medium of the simple emblems of bread and wine, with a power and force infinitely greater than can be experienced by a mere perusal of a written and printed account of that momentous transaction.

Presuming it may not be uninteresting to those not conversant with Masonic writings, I will now offer some specimens of our symbolic language.

The Plumb, an instrument used by operative Masons to erect perpendiculars, "admonishes us to walk uprightly" in our several stations before God and man." The Square, that our actions should be regulated "by the square of virtue." The Level, reminds us "that we are travelling upon the level of time, to that undiscovered country, from whose borne no traveller returns." The Compasses teach us "to circumscribe our desires and keep our passions within due bounds." The Common Gavel is an instrument made use of by oper-tive Masons to break off the corners of rough stones, the better to fit them for the builder's use;" it teaches us to divest "our hearts and consciences of all vices and superfluities of life; thereby fitting our minds as living stones for that spiritual building, that house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." The Trowel, which is used by the operative workmen "to spread the cement which unites a building into one common mass, we, as free and accepted Masons, are taught to make use of, for the more noble and glorious purpose of spreading the cement of brotherly love and affection; that cement which unites us into one sacred band, or society of friends and brothers, among whom is no contention, or rather emulation, but of who can best work or best agree."

My brethren, professing such principles, "what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness?"

Let our own hearts answer. And here, brethren, let us pause for a moment, and inquire. Have we not often acted contrary to the high profession we have made as Masons? Have we not, by our conduct, given the world too much cause to think lightly of our Institution? Has our zeal in the cause of virtue been commensurate with our opportunities for doing good? Are we not justly chargeable with gross negligence of our Masonic duties to God, our fellow-men and ourselves?

What replies do our consciences make to these interrogatories? Brethren, if our hearts condemn us not, happy are we; but, if we are conscious that we have wandered from a path of duty, let us now resolve, solemnly and sincerely resolve, that we will hereafter act more in conformity to the requisitions of our order. "Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things. Those things which [we] have both learned, and received, and heard, and seen, [let us] do: and the God of peace shall be with [us]." For we cannot expect that Providence will smile upon us as Masons, unless we feel, and love, and act, as Masons should do. It is only in the performance of duty, that we must look for prosperity and happiness.

ARCANA OF SCIENCE.

ASTRONOMY,

From the "Objects, Pleasure, and Advantages of Science."

The size and motions, and distances of the heavenly bodies are such to exceed the power of ordinary imagination, from any comparison with the smaller things we see around us. The earth's diameter is nearly 8,000 miles in length; but the sun's is above 88,000 miles, and the bulk of the sun is above 1,300,000 times greater than that of the earth. The planet Jupiter, which looks like a mere speck, from his vast distance, is nearly 1,300 times larger than the earth. Our distance from the sun is above 95 millions of miles; but Jupiter is 490 millions, and Saturn 900 millions of miles distant from the sun. The rate at which the earth moves round the sun is 68,000 miles an hour, or 140 times swifter than the motion of a cannon ball; and the planet Mercury, the nearest to the sun, moves still quicker, nearly 110 miles an hour. We, upon the earth's surface, besides being carried round the sun, move round the earth's axis by the rotatory or spinning motion which it has; so that every 24 hours we move in this manner near 14,000 miles, besides moving round the sun above 1,600,000 miles. These motions and distances, however, prodigious as they are, seem nothing compared to those of the comets, one of which, when furthest from the sun, is 11,200 millions of miles from him; and when nearest the sun, flies at the amazing rate of 880,000 miles an hour. Sir I. Newton calculated its heat at 2,000 times that of red hot iron; and that it would take thousands of years to cool. But the distance of the fixed stars is yet more; they have been supposed to be 400,000 times further from us than we are from the sun, that is 38 millions of millions of miles; so that a cannon-ball would take between four and five millions of years to reach one of them, supposing there was nothing to hinder it from pursuing its course thither.

THE ATMOSPHERE.

From the same.

Experiments of a simple and decisive nature show the amount of the pressure of the air to be between 14 and 15 lbs. on every square inch; but, like all other fluids, it presses equally in every direction; so that, though on our hand there is a pressure downwards of above 250 lbs., yet this is exactly balanced by an equal pressure upwards, from the air pressing round and getting below. If, however, the air be removed below, the whole pressure from above acts unbalanced: hence the ascent of water in pumps, which suck out of the air from a barrel, and allow the pressure upon the water to force it up 32 or 33 feet, that body of water being equal to the weight of the atmosphere; hence the ascent of the mercury in the barometer, but only 28 or 29 inches, mercury being between 13 and 14 times heavier than water. Hence, too, the motion of the steam-engine; the piston of which, until the direct force of steam was applied, used to be pressed downwards by the weight the atmosphere from above, all air being removed below it by first filling it with steam and then suddenly cooling and converting that steam into water. Hence, too, the power which some animals possess of walking along the perpendicular surfaces of walls, and even the ceilings of rooms, by squeezing out the air between the inside of their feet and the surface of the wall, and thus being supported by the pressure of the air against the outside of their feet.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

Prepared for the American Masonic Register.

Peach stones, burnt in a close vessel, produce a charcoal, which, when ground on porphyry is employed in painting to give an old grey.

To make ivory and bone black.—Put into a crucible surrounded by burning coals, fragments or turnings of ivory, or of the osseous parts of animals, and cover it closely. The ivory or bones, by exposure to the heat, will be reduced to charcoal. When no more smoke is seen to pass through the joining of the cover, leave the crucible over the fire for half an hour longer, of until it has completely cooled. There will then be found in it a hard carbonaceous matter, which, when pounded and ground on porphyry with water, is washed on a filter with warm water, and then dried.—Before it is used it must be again subjected to the matter.

Black furnished by bones is reddish. That produced by ivory is more beautiful. It is brighter than black obtained from peach stones. When mixed in a proper dose, with white oxide of lead, it forms a beautiful pearl grey. Ivory black is richer. The Ologae and Cassel black, are formed from ivory.

To make economical white house paint.—Skim milk, 2 quarts, fresh slaked lime, 8 oz. linseed oil, 6 oz. white burgundy pitch, 2 oz. Spanish white, three pounds.

The lime to be slaked in water, exposed to the air, mixed in about one-fourth of the milk; the oil in which the pitch is previously dissolved, to be added, a little at a time; then the rest of the milk; and afterwards the Spanish white. This quantity is sufficient for 27 square yards, two coats, and the expense not more than ten pence.

To make cheap beautiful green paint.—The cost of this paint is less than one-fourth of oil color, and the beauty far superior. Take 4 lbs of Roman vitriol, and pour on it a tea-kettle full of boiling water; when dissolved, add 2 lbs of pearl ash, and stir the mixture well with a stick, until the effervescence ceases; then add a quarter of a pound of pulverised yellow arsenic and stir the whole together. Lay it on with a paint brush, and if the wall has not been painted before, two or three coats will be requisite. To paint a common sized room with this color, will not cost more than 5 or 6 dollars. If a pea green is required put in less, and if an apple-green more, of the yellow arsenic.

To prepare Carmine.—This kind of fecula, so fertile in gradations of tone by the effect of mixtures, and so grateful to the eye in all its shades, so useful to the painter, and so agreeable to the delicate beauty, is only the coloring part of a kind of dried insect known under the name of cochineal.

A mixture of 36 grains of chosen seed, 18 grains of autour bark, and as much alum thrown into a decoction of 5 grains of pulverised cochineal, and 5 pounds of water, gives, at the end of from five to ten days, a red fecula, which when dried weighs from 40 to 58 grains. This fecula is carmine. The remaining decoction, which is still highly colored, is reserved for the preparation of carminated lakes.

To make lake of Brazil wood.—Boil 4 oz. of the raspings of Brazil wood in 15 pints of pure water, till the liquor is reduced to 2 pints. It will be of a dark red color, inclining to violet; but the addition of 4 or 5 oz. of alum will give it a hue inclining to rose-color. When the liquor has been strained through a piece of linen cloth, if 4 oz. of the carbonate of soda be added with caution, on account of the effervescence which takes place, the color, which by this addition is deprived of its mordant, will resume its former tint, and deposit a lake, which, when washed and properly dried, has an exceedingly rich and mellow-violet red color.

To make a yellow lake.—Take a pound of turmeric root, in fine powder, 3 pints of water, and an ounce of salt of tartar; put all into a glazed earthen vessel, and boil them together over a clear gentle fire, till the water appears highly impregnated and stains a paper to a beautiful yellow. Filter this liquor, and gradually add to it a strong solution of roche alum, in water, till the yellow matter is all curdled and precipitated. After this, pour the whole into a filter of paper, and the water will run off, and leave the yellow matter behind.—Wash it with fresh water, till the water comes off insipid, and then is obtained the beautiful yellow called laque of turmeric.

In this manner make a lake of any of the substances that are of a strong texture as madder, logwood, &c. but it will not succeed in the more tender species, as the flowers of roses, violets, &c. as it destroys the nice arrangement of parts in those subjects, on which the color depends.

THE GATHERER.

PLAIN SPEAKING.

Lord Tyrawley, a little before his death, was visited by several Englishmen, who came with a pretence of asking how he did, but in reality to see if he was dying, that they might apply for his employments. The old general, who comprehended their motives for being so solicitous about him, gave them the following answer: "Gentlemen, I know your reasons for inquiring after my health; I have but two things worth having, my regiment and my girl, neither of which will fall to your lot: I'll tell you how they will be disposed of; a Scotchman will get the one, and an Irishman the other."

The other day, as a countryman was passing the back of a gaol, he recognised an old acquaintance among some of the inmates who stood at one of the upper windows, and through the grating of which, although denied the enjoyments of mountain air, he was at the moment contriving to supply himself with a pleasant substitute in the form of "mountain dew." "Ah, safe us, Saunders," said the countryman, who did not observe what was going on, "that's an awsome doxie hole, for such a cheery mairland bird as you to spend sic bonnie simmer days in: how do you manage to keep up your spirits, man?" "Brawley, as ye may see, Tam," replied the other, "when we feel our spirits down, we pull them up wi' a lang string."

At a public levee at the court of St James, a gentleman said to Lord Chesterfield—"pray, my lord, who is that tall awkward woman yonder?"—"That lady sir," replied Lord Chesterfield, "is my sister." The gentleman reddened with confusion, and stammered out—"no, no my lord, I beg your pardon: I meant that very nely woman, who stands next to the Queen."—"That lady sir," answered Lord Chesterfield calmly—"that lady, sir, is—my wife."

A JOKE AND THE AFTER-CLAP.—One day within the last week, says the Philadelphia Chronicle, a lady of Southwark who had conceived some cause of dislike for a certain physician of that quarter, and being disposed to wound his feelings, and mortify his professional dignity hit on the following expedient for so doing. She sent for the doctor intimating in her message that a sick person stood in need of his services. The doctor arrived, entered the apartment where the lady sat with two female acquaintance, and was directed to a cradle, in which he expected to find a sick child. On removing the quilt, he discovered a large tom cat, fitted up with a baby's cap, &c., and at the moment of making this discovery he heard a half-suppressed titer proceeding from the corner of the room. The doctor, no wise daunted, changed not a muscle of his countenance, but with all the gravity becoming a physician, felt the pulse of the quadruped, took out his pencil, wrote a prescription, took up his hat and cane, bade the ladies good afternoon and departed. As soon as he was out of hearing, Mrs.——— and her companion gave a full hurst to their merriment and laughed over the trick for an hour when their mirth was somewhat damped by the entrance of a young man who presented the doctor's bill, wherein was charged the maximum price for a visit. Nothing could be said against the justice of the demand, and the money was paid with evident vexation. So the doctor had his joke as well as the woman.

LORD CHIEF JUSTICE HOLT.

The following anecdote, which we extract, is not without its application.

When Holt was Lord Chief Justice, he committed some enthusiasts to prison; the next day one Lacey, who was of the same persuasion, went to his house, and asked to speak with him; the porter answered that his lordship was not well, and could not be seen: Lacey insisted that he must speak him, for he was sent to him by the Lord. When this message was delivered he obtained admittance. "I come," said he "from the Lord, commanding thee to grant a nolle prosequi, to his faithful servants whom thou hast unjustly committed to prison." "Thou canst not certainly have come from the Lord," replied Holt, "for he would have sent thee to the Attorney-General, knowing very well that it is not in my power to grant thy demand; therefore thou art a false prophet, and shalt go and keep company with thy friends in prison."

A story somewhat similar has been told of a notorious infidel writer, whose orgies were one evening interrupted by an old woman in a red cloak, who delivered him a message which she said the Lord had commanded her to give him. "Get away, old woman," said he, "for you are an impostor; the Lord would never have sent to me on so serious a matter at a time of night when he knows that I am always drunk and unfit for business."

UNFORTUNATE INTERRUPTION.

During a theatrical season in Providence, R. I., when Edmund Forrest was playing Damon and Pythias, in the most interesting of all scenes, when Damon rushes breathless on the stage, exclaiming to Dionysius, "Give me my daughter," when not a long breath was drawn and every eye was fixed on the actor, with the most intense anxiety—the ebony door keeper with nothing to be seen above the railing of the gallery but the white of his eye, and black face, exclaimed, "officer come up, here is a row." In an instant the audience burst into a roar of laughter, and Forrest seemed translated from "glory to gloom," for during the whole performance after, "Richard was not himself again."

A DEAR WIFE.—Lord W——r was looking very sour and blue at a long bill from Madame Caradan Carson, enlarged, not contracted by her ladyship, "W——r my love," said she in a tone of bewitching softness, "are you angry with me, that you look so very cross?" "Far from it my dear," replied his lordship "I feel at this moment you are dearer to me than ever."

POPULAR TALES.

From the Edinburgh Journal.

THE TWIN CHIEFS—A TALE OF THE SABINE.

The river Sabine is the boundary between the United States and Texas. It empties itself into the Sabine Bay, which opens into the Gulf of Mexico, and is surrounded by low marshy lands, which form an extensive uninhabitable district, the haunt of innumerable flocks of swans, wild geese, ducks, pelicans, cranes, and every species of water fowl. At the mouth of the bay, as the traveller enters from the gulf, the sides of the river have their bottom covered with mud several feet deep, rendering it dangerous to attempt to land, although it is the only part where any bluff offers a landing-place; it may be accomplished, however, at high water, in small flat-bottomed skiffs.—Here you have an extensive view of swamp, covered with coarse grass and rushes, unbroken by woodland of any description. The tide flows over it, and it would require a coat of mail to venture on an investigation of its peculiarities, for the musquitos are insufferable; and after in vain attempting to battle them off from your face and hands, you return to your boat covered as thickly as if a swarm of bees had settled on you, nor will you find common cloth garments a sufficient protection against them.

About a hundred miles up the river, there is a small Indian village, where the remnants of a large tribe have settled. They date the commencement of their fall from the first arrival of the white man, and will tell you that their race have become degenerate in every respect since that period. They have diminished in their size, as well as numbers. They were strong as the hard oak, erect as the cypress, as numerous as the leaves of the forest; now they are weak as woman, bent like old age, and few as the stars at summer's twilight. They were a race of warriors, who set even the Camanches at defiance, and whose ancestors slept in their graves unmolested; they are no longer fit for war, and the crow follows the white man's ploughshare, croaking with delight as it devours the worms that have fattened on the dead bodies of their forefathers.

Dilka, the chief's wife, had twin sons, who were so equal in their skill, and so equally beloved, that at their father's death it was difficult to determine which should succeed him; nor were they willing to submit to the decision of their tribe, but each declined in favor of his brother. It was therefore decided that they should act together with equal authority—an arrangement which was rendered highly advantageous from the great number of their people—both in war and peace. Their hunting-grounds extended from the seacoast to the Rocky Mountains, and the feats of Dilka's sons were whispered by their foes with dread—were sung by the friendly tribes with praise. They were seldom seen apart unless their duty required it nor was an angry word ever known to have passed between them; when they practised with the bow together, none would express more delight or warmer eulogies than the defeated brother.

It would be useless for me to make any comment on the perfect symmetry of the form in which nature had moulded these sons of the forest. But it was a sight truly beautiful to see them standing alone beneath some lofty pine, offering up their thoughts to the great spirit. One day, when they had descended with a party to fish at the lower part of the river, where the lake was visible, they saw a white object afloat upon its bosom, and long they stood gazing as it increased in size. It was unlike a bird, or any thing they had seen before. The blast of surprise was given from the horn of the buffalo, and party after party came hurrying down the river in their canoes, gathering around their chiefs with the spear, the war-club, tomahawk, and bow. A thrilling anxiety filled the bosoms of all, as their attention was drawn to the object. Not a word was spoken; and as the vessel approached, for it was a schooner, they prepared for an attack, readily perceiving that, although the thing was not alive, there were living beings on it. Offers of peace were offered by the strangers, who came with glittering presents in their hands. The gaudy display of red and yellow cloth, of blankets, beads, and gilded ornaments, attracted the notice of the less wary, who, with uncontrollable delight, disguised their well proportioned limbs in useless trumpery, strutting with vain conceit. Hitherto the deer-skin, prepared by themselves, and much better calculated for their pursuits, much more durable too, had sufficed. Their friendly visitors brought them the luxuries of their own country, but they also at the same time brought their vices. The chiefs became friendly with the captain, returned his presents a hundred-fold visited his wigwam on the big waters, displayed their own exploits, and saw with wonder the sailors spring from rope to rope; lost their natural courage at the sound of the fusée, and felt the condescension in one to them possessing the power of a god becoming familiar with them. They tasted their different preparations of food, and cooked for them the buffalo and venison, which they do in a peculiar manner. They likewise tasted the sweet wines and ardent spirits. At first, like children, they refused the draught, but soon they yielded to persuasion and example. They tasted and their love of it increased, with what they took.—Next came drunkenness, and all the wild insanity of the maniac. Then followed, as the fatal draught was more eagerly consumed, strange nausea, desperate confusion, and an unmanly cry as the earth seemed receding, whirling, sinking beneath them. At length nature relieved the stomach of its unwholesome burthen, and sound senseless sleep came on. How could the wary Indian now protect himself against a foe? The morning came, and with it, as they awoke, a parching thirst, a nervous dread, a cowardice they never yet had felt, a dejected spirit, and a downcast look—a combination, too, of such miseries as make the very heart shudder within the breast—such as no single one, nor all the natural diseases, if, combined, ever could produce. The captain, well accustomed to such feelings, soon gave them relief, by inducing them to take fresh stimulants; thus establishing, as a habit, what perhaps would never have of itself returned, a constant desire for intoxicating drinks. In such times as these, the brothers would begin to feel a jealousy if the captain did not bestow his favors and attention equally on them. It was then that selfishness overcame the nobler feelings of the heart. They were induced, not with any ill intent, but to amuse their friends, to try their strength against each other, and a severe trial it was. Two such athletic forms, so equally matched in strength and skill, could not well contend without great danger. A fist-fight between two boys is not likely to prove of a very serious nature, while one blow from the pugilist will readily terminate the life of his opponent; and in this instance both were severely hurt, without any decision being possible as to their superiority. Formerly, the regret of each would have been that he had hurt the other, now, this feeling was reversed. They struggled against each other as if they had been struggling against a deadly foe. And when, at length exhausted, they joined their friends; the glass went round again and again, until the same mad feeling rendered their passions ungovernable. Each boasted of his superiority over the other, and many attempts they made to get together, but were separated by the captain, who tried to reconcile them in vain, until they became helpless from excess.

The vessel left them, having previously disposed of all the wine and spirits they could spare, or rather were willing to part with, together with a fusée, some ammunition, and several trifling things. The greater number of the Indians had been sent up to their head quarters with the different presents as they were made to them, and the chieftains, after parting with the white men reluctantly, commenced the indulgence of their dissipation. One soon fell from his seat senseless from taking larger draughts, now that they were alone, and without the restraint imposed by the presence of strangers. The other became by degrees more furious as he drank. He called up every point of their previous contention, declared that the tribe should have but one chief as they had but one gun, that he was stronger and braver than his brother, that he could beat him; and in this manner working himself into a frenzy, at last fell upon his brother as he lay sleepless, and murdered him, lacerating his throat dreadfully with a knife which he had received from the captain. This was effected before any interference could be offered by those around, who fled instantly from fear on seeing it accomplished, and runners started to communicate the fact to the elders. The rapidity with which they travel, and the distance they can go at one journey, are almost incredible. After the perpetration of his crime, the chieftain rose and drank deeply from a jug of pure rum that stood near him. Then observing that all the Indians had left him, he tried to blow his horn; this he found himself unable to do; he shouted, he tried to raise the warwhoop, but the echo from the opposite bank mocked his vain attempt. Taking his gun and as much spirits with him as he could carry, he wandered he knew not where.

The elders of the tribe were appalled at such dreadful tidings, for the prophet, an ingenious man as all the Indian prophets are, seeing the strong attachment between the brothers, prophesied that their tribe should never be overcome until the twin chiefs quarrelled. A council was immediately called, and set off to the place where the murder was committed. They found the body, but the murderer was nowhere to be seen; and while some were sent in search of him, others set themselves to decide upon his punishment. They had laws for almost every offence, but they always considered twins as sacred; and for any one to have killed a twin, the most severe punishment they could invent was inflicted. But this was a still greater crime, and of a more revolting nature, besides betraying his tribe to the enemy, for they looked upon the prophecy as certain. After two days the council broke up; the criminal had been discovered and brought in.

He was found sitting amongst the rushes with a haggard countenance, his eyes bloodshot and swollen; the mud and water covered his legs, the gun and vessel of spirits lay beside him. He was singing, shouting, and throwing his arms about in a wild distracted manner; the blood of his victim had dried upon his breast and shoulder. As they approached him, he pointed the gun at them; it had been too long in the water, and would not go off; he threw it down, and erecting himself with difficulty, commenced giving his orders in a tone of authority. Seeing no one inclined to obey him, he stooped down, took up the vessel, and was in the act of finishing its contents, when he was in a moment surrounded and secured. They dragged him to the spot where his murdered brother lay, but he had become by this time insensible; the sentence of the council was nevertheless put into immediate execution. The trunk of a large tree was fixed deep in the earth, on the very spot where the murder was committed; to this he was fastened naked, with the dead body of his victim bound to his side; his arm around its waist, its hand upon his breast, their heads secured cheek to cheek; and thus for four-and-twenty days, he was condemned to be kept. Not a single thing was allowed to be removed from the place, nor any alterations more than were necessary to put the trunk in the ground. Two sentinels were placed to watch him, in such a position that he could not see them, and these were twice in the day to give him water. For many hours he remained unconscious of his situation; nor was it until, from the burning sunbeams falling on his head, his fever increased, and the salivary glands, exhausted by the poisonous liquor, which caused the stomach to require an extra quantity in its own defence refused to yield one single drop to moisten his parched tongue and throat, that he opened his eyes in search of water, asking for it at the same time; finding himself confined, he struggled to be set at liberty, and called on his brother to assist him. The water was held to his lips; and as it refreshed him, while looking down, his eye fell upon the ghastly wound that rested on his shoulder. The truth with all its horrors burst upon him. The violent struggle that he made against his bonds forced the blood from his nostrils; no cry of terror could escape his lips, and the next moment he fainted. When he recovered, the effects of intoxication had completely ceased, and he sent forth loud cries for assistance; shout after shout rang through the air, until his voice became feeble and hoarse; he could not move his eye from the horrid spectacle, but kept it involuntarily fixed on it, like one who watches the movements of a foe while standing face to face with him. The turkey buzzards now hovered over them, attracted by the smell of the dead body; and, oh! how he welcomed their appearance! They, like all other carrion birds, commence with the eye, and it would indeed be a blessing for him to lose his sight. Just as the welcome bird was venturing near, an invidious arrow pierced its body, and it fell near enough to them to be a warning to others. The lake that brought the cause of all this tragic scene, lay smooth and wide before him: what heavy curses fell from his lips against the white man! Had the captain been chained there instead of his brother, he could have borne it with delight. Again his eye fell on his victim, and another loud, long, piercing, straining scream was followed by the wild laugh of an idiot; then came tears and fiendish execrations, convulsive shudders, and spasmodic gasps for breath, mixed with hysteric sobs, as he struggled in vain; the body moving as he moved, the hand pressing more closely on his breast the more he strove to liberate himself, while the wound, as the body decayed, became distended more and more from his violent efforts.

Three days he remained in this situation, when the sentinels, who had already tasted the pernicious beverage, were unable longer to withstand the temptation; for every thing had been left as it was when the murder was committed. The war-cry had gone through the land, and the remainder of the tribe had left the spot; the sentinels, to whose integrity the whole nation might have been entrusted, had been tainted by the vices, subsequent to the abuse of the luxuries of life; they broached the spirits, and soon became intoxicated in this state they liberated the criminal, and fell immediately beneath his hand.

In the following year, about the same season, when the sky was beautifully clear, the weather mild, the surface of the lake but gently ruffled by the golden ripple that came dancing from the west, the white sails of the schooner were seen gracefully spread reflecting from their concave form the red rays of the evening sun as she approached her former moorings. This is strange, thought the captain, as they drew near; very strange. He had been watching for the smoke from their fires, which had directed him on a former occasion, but now no smoke was visible. We surely were expected, he muttered to himself.

He was expected.

When the vessel was brought to anchor, seeing no canoes come out to welcome him, he conceived the Indians to have changed their fishing ground to some other spot, and determined to go on shore to ascertain if any traces of them might be left. He took two men and the mate with him in the boat, and, landing at the accustomed place, proceeded to the camp. He saw, to his astonishment, every thing as he had left it, but the trunk of the dead tree in the centre. As he approached nearer, he discovered a skeleton fastened to it so as to be swinging to and fro in the breeze; two other skeletons lay upon the ground, beside which a tall grey-headed Indian. In his hand he held part of a raw-fish, which he was devouring, without apparently noticing their approach. His eye was glassy and wild. When the captain spoke, he made no answer, nor even turned his gaze away from some object which it seemed fixed. But when the captain approached within a couple of yards, at one bound the man sprang upon him with the cry of a hyena, and his teeth and fingers firm in his throat, forced him to the ground. In vain the men tried to remove him; it was the iron grasp of death. When they succeeded in tearing them apart, both were dead, and then discovered in the features of the grey-headed Indian their once friendly chief, who seemed to have passed a miserable life, merely sustained by an Indian revenge.

Mer traders soon contrived to visit the village of the Indians in the interior, and to introduce, with other luxuries of civilization, the use of ardent spirits. The ancient and virtuous habits of the Indians were now departed; they were unable to compete with their enemies, returned from their hunting expeditions in disgust, and as their feeble remnant now tell you the nation is no more.

CULTIVATED ACRE.

Mr. editor of the Maine Cultivator, "improves a single acre of ground with such good husbandry, that he is sufficient for his own family, of bread stuff or produce to buy it with, every kind of garden vegetables and fruits for home consumption, the wheat to fatten his own pork, and the beans to make w; potatoes, pumpkins, cabbages, &c. comprising useful articles too many to enumerate, and, by exchanging onions for hay, keeps a cow and makes his own butter. All this he accomplishes by his own labor, on a single acre of ground. He puts on to it eighteen cords of manure, and obtains annually in return thirty or forty bushels of sound corn, sixty or seventy of onions, and other vegetables, and plenty of fruit &c., as before hinted. Such is the production of a small farm well tilled.

MISCELLANY.

AN AFFECTING PICTURE.

The following extract from one of the last numbers of Master Humphrey's Clock is remarkable for its simplicity and its pathos. Nelly and her aged grandfather, in their wanderings, were hospitably entertained at the domicile of a village schoolmaster, who was in great distress on account of the illness of a little boy, his best scholar—one for whom he seems to have entertained a more than parental affection. He gives his pupils a half holiday—and leading little Nell by the hand, proceeds to the humble dwelling, where his little favorite lay on a bed of sickness:

"They stopped at a cottage door; and the schoolmaster knocked softly at it with his hand. It was opened without loss of time. They entered a room where a little group of women were gathered about, one older than the rest, who was crying very bitterly, and sat wringing her hands, and rocking herself to and fro.

"Oh, dame!" said the schoolmaster, drawing near her chair, "is it so bad as this?"

"He's going fast," cried the old woman; "my grandson's dying. It's all owing to you. You should'n't see him now, but for his being so earnest on it. This is what his learning has brought him to. Oh dear, dear, what can I do?"

"Do not say that I am in fault," urged the gentle schoolmaster. "I am not hurt, dame. No no. You are in great distress of mind, and do not mean what you say. I am sure you don't."

"I do," returned the old woman. "I mean it all. If he had not been poring over his books out of fear of you, he would have been well and merry now. I know he would."

The schoolmaster looked around upon the other women, as if to entreat some one among to say a kind word for him, but they shook their heads and murmured to each other that they never thought there was much good in learning, and that this convinced them. Without saying a word in reply, or giving them a look of reproach, he followed the old woman who had summoned him (and who had now rejoined them) into another room, where his infant friend, half dressed, lay stretched on the bed.

He was a very young boy, quite a little child. His hair hung in curls about his face, and his eyes were very bright; but their light was of heaven, not of earth. The schoolmaster took a seat beside him, and stooping over the pillow, whispered his name. The boy sprang up, stroked his face with his hand, and threw his wasted arms around his neck, crying out that he was his dear kind friend.

"I hope I always was. I meant to be, God knows," said the poor schoolmaster.

"Who is that?" said the boy seeing Nell. "I am afraid to kiss her, lest I should make her ill. Ask her to shake hands with me."

The sobbing child came closer up, and took the little languid hand in hers. Releasing his again after a time, the sick boy laid him gently down.

"You remember the garden, Harry," whispered the schoolmaster, anxious to rouse him, for a dullness seemed gathering upon the child, "and how pleasant it used to be in the evening time. You must make haste to visit it again, for I think the very flowers have missed you, and are less gay than they used to be.—You will come soon, my dear, very soon now, won't you?"

The boy smiled faintly—so very, very faintly—and put his hand upon his friend's grey head. He moved his lips up, but no sound came from them—no, not a sound.

In the silence that caused the hum of distant voices borne upon the evening air, came floating through the open window. "What's that?" said the sick child opening his eyes.

"The boys at play upon the green."

He took a handkerchief from his pillow, and tried to wave it above his head. But the feeble arm dropped powerless down.

"Shall I do it?" said the schoolmaster.

"Please wave it at the window," was the faint reply. "Tie it to the lattice. Some of them may see it there. Perhaps they'll think of me and look this way."

He raised his head, and glanced from the fluttering signal to his idle ball that lay with slate and book and other boyish property, upon a table in the room.—And then he laid him softly down once more, and asked if the little girl were there, for he could not see her.

She stepped forward, and pressed the passive hand that lay upon the coverlet. The two old friends and companions—for such they were, though they were man and child—held each other in a long embrace, and then the little scholar turned his face towards the wall and fell asleep.

The poor schoolmaster sat in the same place, holding the small cold hand in his, and chafing it. It was but the hand of the dead child. He felt that; and yet he chafed it still, and could not lay it down."

HAZARDOUS ADVENTURE.

A correspondent of the Madras Herald gives the following account of an adventure with a cobra di capello, which occurred to a gentleman who was reposing under a tamarind tree alone, after a day of shooting:

"I was aroused by the furious baying of my dogs; on turning round, I beheld a snake of the cobra di capello species, directing its course to a point that would approximate very close to my position. In an instant I was on my feet. The moment the reptile became aware of my presence, in nautical phraseology it boldly brought to; with expanded head, eyes sparkling, neck beautifully arched, by the head raised nearly two feet from the ground, and oscillating from side to side, in a manner plainly indicative of a resentful foe. I seized a short bamboo, left by one of the bearers, and hurled it at my opponent's head. I was fortunate enough to hit it beneath the eye. The reptile immediately fell from his imposing attitude, and lay apparently lifeless. Without a moment's reflection, I seized it a little below the head, hauling it beneath the shelter of the tree, and very coolly sat down to examine the mouth for the poisoned fangs of which naturalists speak so much. While in the act of forcing the mouth open with a stalk, I felt the head sliding thro' my hand; and to my utter astonishment became aware that I had now to contend against the most deadly of reptiles in its full strength and vigor. Indeed I was in a moment convinced of it, for as I tightened my hold of its throat, its body became wreathed around my neck and arm. I raised myself from my sitting position to one knee; my right arm, to enable me to exert my strength, was extended. I must in such an attitude appeared horrified enough to represent a deity in the Hindoo mythology, such as we so rudely emblazoned on the portals of their native temples. It now became a matter of self defence. To retain my hold it required my utmost strength to prevent the head from escaping, as my neck became a purchase for the animal to pull upon. If the reader is aware of the universal dread in which the cobra di capello is held throughout India, and the almost certain death which inevitably follows its bite, he will in some degree be able to imagine what my feelings were at that moment; a shudder, a faint kind of disgusting sickness pervaded my whole frame, as I felt the cold clammy fold of the reptile's body tightening round my neck. To attempt any delineation of my sensations, would be absurd: let it suffice, they were most horrible. I had now almost resolved to resign my hold. Had I done so, this tale would never have been written; as no doubt the head would have been brought to the extreme circumvolution to inflict the deadly wound.

"Even in the agony of such a moment, I could picture to myself the fierce glowing of the eyes, and the intimidating expansion of the head ere it fastened its venomous and fatal hold upon my face and neck.

To hold it much longer would be impossible. Immediately beneath my grasp there was an inward working and creeping of the skin, which seemed to be assisted by the firmness with which I held it—my hand was gloved. Finding, in defiance of all my efforts, that my hand was each instant forced closer to my face, I was anxiously considering how to act in this horrible dilemma, when an idea struck me, that if it was in my power to transfix the mouth with some sharp instrument, it would prevent the reptile from using its fangs, should he escape my hold. My gun lay at my feet, the ramrod appeared to be the very thing required which with some difficulty I succeeded in drawing out, having only one hand disengaged. My right arm was now trembling from over exertion—my hold becoming less firm, when I happily succeeded in passing the rod through the lower jaw up to its centre. It was not without considerable hesitation that I suddenly let go my hold of the throat and seized the rod with both hands, at the same time bringing them over my head with a sudden jerk, discharging the fold from my neck, which had latterly become almost tight enough to produce strangulation. There was then little difficulty in freeing my right arm, and ultimately throwing the reptile from me to the earth, where it continued to twist and writhe into a thousand contortions of rage and agony. To run to a neighboring stream to lave my neck, hands and face in its cooling water, was my first act after despatching my formidable enemy."

A YANKEE TRICK:

A friend has furnished us with the following narrative. Time, 27.—Location, Albany county, New York. Parties, a Dutchman and a Yankee. Jonathan had tired of sweating for his father, because, to use his own words, he "didn't git nothin but cabbage and homespun," and as for honors, he might once have been promoted to the rank of corporal if his sire had not utterly refused to loan him his cast off regimentals. But, for all disappointed hopes, Jonathan was a shrewd personage, ready to "gum the flats" whenever occasion offered, and exceedingly ambitious of boarding shiners which he could call his own. His pockets however never had felt the weight of a single flip which did not somehow or other find its way into the family locker. He therefore broke his allegiance with "the old man," begged three and sixpence from his grandmother, and journeyed westward. Fortune adopted him as her own, and he soon fell in with a Dutchman, whose inner-man borrowed its vivacity from his outer, which ranged somewhere between the Falstaff and Turtle-soup fashions, inclining as years multiplied to the former and indicating absence of thought in proportion to his corporeal rotundity. Michael Van Higginbeck girted precisely 8 feet Flemish. His words were few, and emphatic, his movements deliberate to a charm, and he made it his chief boast, that he never had been cheated.

Jonathan learned at an inn, that Michael had a snug but untenanted farm in a distant county, and, after making sundry inquiries touching Myneer, repaired to his homestead and offered to take the untenanted farm "at the halves." To this proposition Michael agreed, adding a condition, that he should have the tops, and Jonathan the bottoms of all that was raised.—Jonathan retired to his new abode to make the best of his bargain, and Michael to his pipe, chuckling at his adroitness in overreaching the Yankee. Time brought the harvest and with it Michael to demand his rent.—The season had been propitious, and Jonathan gathered in abundance. Will you take your half now, Sir? Yaw, replied Michael. Jonathan pointed to a huge pile of tops—the bottoms were—potatoes. The truth suddenly flashed upon Michael's understanding, but it was too late to grumble—there was the bargain and there were his tops. Thinking still to come round the Yankee, he rented his farm to him a second year, conditioning at its expiration for all the bottoms.—Another year elapsed and Michael appeared to claim the bottoms, but Jonathan had planned nothing but wheat. "Mine Got," exclaimed myneer, "te tan Yankee gets te tops and te bottoms, put I will have tem both mineself next year." At the close of the next year came Michael with his teams, but Jonathan had decamped with the corn, leaving behind him according to agreement all the tops and bottoms for his landlord.

The following unutterably curious sentence is frequently used in schools for the correction of Stammering—

"Theopolis Thistle the thistle sifter sifted a sieve full of unsifted thistles, and if Theopolis Thistle the thistle sifter sifted a sieve full of unsifted thistles, where's the sieve full of sifted thistles that Theopolis Thistle the thistle sifter sifted!"

It is hardly equal to the following from the famous Ben Johnson, "If a twister, a-twisting, doth twist him a twist, and one twisted twist of the twister while twisting, untwists; then the twister, who twisting, untwisted the twist, the untwisted twist must re-twist."

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, NOV. 21, 1840.

TERMS OF THIS PAPER.—To subscribers residing out of the city, $2 if in advance—$2.50 if within six months, and $3, if not paid until the expiration of the year. BACK NUMBERS at all times furnished.

THE LADIES FAIR.—We would earnestly call the attention of our readers, and particularly the female portion of them, to the Card of the Ladies of the 3d D. Church, in another column. The peculiar situation, in which this church is at present placed, commends its claims to all classes of citizens, and particularly to the Christian public. It seems that unless immediate means can be devised to extricate the Society from at least some of its present embarrassment, the church will have to be sold. The Ladies are making strenuous efforts on their part, and we trust they will be duly supported.

AVALANCHE.—A large portion of Mount Ida, in Troy, loosened by the late rains, came down on Saturday last, destroying a small tenement occupied by colored persons; and on Monday another slice came off, carrying with it part of an orchard. Providentially no one was injured. From this spot, some years since, there was an avalanche, which destroyed several lives.

NICHOLS' AMPHITHEATRE.—This establishment is nearly completed, and will we understand, be opened about the 1st of December. Mr. Nichols has the most extensive equestrian corps in the United States, and this establishment, which is built in a neat and durable manner is designed as the winter quarters of the company. We have no amusements now among us; and there is no doubt if the proprietor will make his concern a respectable place, but that the public will appreciate it, and extend to him a respectable support. He must make it a becoming place for females, and the men will of course follow. Mr. N. and his company at present are deservedly popular among us, and he can retain their good opinion; but it must be done by uncompromising hostility to every thing out of order.

MARYLAND—OFFICIAL.—The official return of the Maryland Electoral Election is 33,531 for Harrison, and 28,769 for Van Buren. Harrison's majority 4772.

The shock of an earthquake was felt at Philadelphia on Saturday night last during a tremendous storm.—The buildings trembled for several seconds, and the water of the Delaware were agitated by an unusual swell.

The population of the State of Connecticut is, according to recent census, 210,131. Increase in ten years, 12,420.

A regular packet line has been established between Philadelphia and Matagorda, Texas.

A white man was recently sold, in North Carolina in conformity to a law of that state, for bastardy, and his wife bought him in for one dollar. The papers say she got cheated at that.

THE CATHOLIC CONTROVERSY.—The movement of the Catholics to obtain a portion of the school fund for sectarian purposes was again on Monday evening the subject of discussion in the Board of Aldermen, and occupied the time of the Board till midnight. The result was the appointment of a committee, consisting of Ald. Chamberlain, Jones and Rich, to visit and examine the schools under the charge of the Public School Society, and inviting a committee of the Catholic petitioners to accompany that committee in the examination. The object of this joint examination appears to be some amicable arrangement in relation to the public schools which will satisfy in a measure the objections now made by the Catholics to their present management. The consummation sought will, we apprehend, be very difficult to accomplish."

We cut the above from the New-York Sun; and we agree with the editor in his opinion of the "Consummation." We hope the authorities will make such concessions as will place our Catholic citizens in the full enjoyment of all the privileges of other sects. But when any sect asks for the public money for a sectarian purpose, we much mistake the public sentiments, if such sect will not find themselves "behind the intelligence of the age." If the school books are objectionable, burn them up, and print more.

HONORABLE TESTIMONIAL OF AN OPPONENT.—The following just tribute is from the pen of a Mr. Cist; who has been recently engaged in taking the census of Cincinnati.

"One fact I have ascertained in my travels, which I record as of general interest. Much of the suffering and privation which exist at all times, and especially in the winter season here, I find are relieved by the Masonic Fraternity, whose liberality provides for the wants not only of the destitute among their own members and families, but alleviates, as I have reason to know, many cases of distress in persons who cannot make this plea for assistance. Doubtless in this way, much must be saved for the benefit of others in our public provisions for charity. An important difference too is, that in these cases the individual is not compelled to attend publicly as an applicant for relief, but the sons and daughters of want are sought out and relieved at their humble dwellings. I bear the testimony the more willingly, having myself denied, and publicly, that the order was a charitable institution on the principle that its charity began and ended at home."

PROHIBITED MARRIAGES.—The New York Churchman states that at the last general convention, a committee, consisting of Bishops H. U. Onderdonk, Moor and Brownell, was appointed to report at the next general convention, a canon prohibiting marriages with certain degrees of consanguinity and affinity. In its report, which will be one of much importance, the act of marrying a deceased wife's sister will be of necessity prominent. A pamphlet has been published in England advocating the repeal of the law in that country, which prohibits marriage within the degrees of affinity just mentioned. A circular soliciting three-penny signatures from amongst the clergy, and the measure is said to receive the countenance and active co-operation of the Archbishop of Dublin, and the bishop of Landaff.

MONOPOLY.—A gentleman in London has just concluded a contract for the exclusive navigation of steamers up the Amazon for forty-five years. The same person is now in negotiation for the establishment of a line of steamers between England and Brazil.

EXECUTION OF ROBERT M'CONANY. the murderer of Brown's family.—This wretched man suffered the awful penalty of the law at Huntingdon, Pa. on the 6th inst. He was executed in the gaol yard a few minutes before 3 o'clock P. M.

The closing circumstances of his guilty and miserable career were peculiar; down to the hour of his execution, nay to the very moment the drop fell, he stubbornly persisted in asserting his innocence. All hope of his making any acknowledgement was entirely removed by his dogged conduct. He was taken upon the scaffold—every thing adjusted—the moment arrived—the drop fell—and not a word confessed. But the rope broke and instead of hanging, very much to his astonishment we suppose, he found himself upon the ground under the gallows. He thought he was "clear;" but the illusion was present with him but a moment. He was immediately taken up on the gallows again—every thing made ready—the drop about to fall—when he begged for "time to talk a little," and proceeded "to make a full and detailed confession of his crimes to the clergymen present. Mr. Brown and Mr. Peebles, who reduced it to writing in his own words, as he made it," and who will cause it to be published for the benefit of his wife and children. His confession it is said, casts deeper and darker shades of cruelty over the bloody affair.

He had scarcely concluded his confession when the last moment execution could be delayed arrived, and he was again swung off, and paid his life a forfeiture of his crimes.

RAILROAD ACCIDENT.—A man, named Mason, was so much injured by some of the machinery of the locomotive engine near Trenton, N. J., on Friday, that he expired on Saturday afternoon. The engine ran over a cow on the track of the rail road, and so bent some of the apparatus of the locomotive, as to retard its progress. While Mr. Mason was attempting to straighten the bent iron, it suddenly broke, and he fell upon the broken shaft, which so injured him as to throw him into convulsions, which continued until he died.

Son against Father.—At the recent election in Massachusetts, Henry W. Cushman, of Bernardstown, a candidate for the Legislature, was opposed and beaten by his own father. This is right—if any beating is to be done, the father should always beat the son.—N. Y. Standard.

BARON ARDEN, of Arden (Eng) recently deceased, left personal property to the amount of $3,840,000.—The Registership of the high Court of Admiralty became vacant when he was an infant of six months old, and it was actually retained for him until he was capable of officiating; the duties being performed by deputy. In the time of war his emoluments from this office amounted to between $336,000 and 384,000.

There is a place we believe in New Hampshire, where they never have any old maids. When a girl reaches twenty-nine, and is still on the ladder of expectation, the young fellows club together and draw lots for her. Those who are so lucky as to escape, pay a bonus to the miserable fellow who gets her. There's gallantry for you.

ACCIDENT.—A young man named Lewis Penfield, was accidentally shot in the shoulder on Friday last, at a turkey shoot near this city. Another young man had taken aim with his piece cocked, when the turkey fell, and Mr Penfield went to replace it. While doing so the piece went off, and lodged the bullet in his shoulder.—Utica Dem.

The D'Huaveville case, which has occupied so much attention in Philadelphia, has been finally decided in favor of the mother's claim to the guardianship of the child. This decision is in direct contradiction with that recently made in this state, in the somewhat analogous case of Barry. The point in both cases was, whether the father or the mother—the parties not living together—should have the guardianship of the child. New York decides, in conformity with what we supposed to be well settled law; in favor of the father—Pennsylvania, in favor of the mother.—N. Y. Amer.

A jury at Richmond, V., in the case of a horse thief, was ten days in confinement without being able to agree on a verdict. On Thursday last they were liberated. One of the jurors was to have been married on Thursday evening to a lady fifty miles off.

Scott, the American diver, has repeated his performance of jumping from a height of 140 feet into the water, from the Chain pier, several times during the week. He continues to attract numerous spectators. Brighton Gazette.

George R. T. Hewes, the last of the Boston tea party, died at German Flatts on the 5th inst., at the advanced age of 106 years. His remains were sent to Richfield, Otsego county, for interment, where he had resided for many years.

A FEMALE SAILOR.—A female named Mary Perkins was sentenced to two months in the House of Correction at Boston last week for larceny. When arrested she was attired in a sailor's habit. She represented herself to be twenty years of age, and had been steward six months on board a brig on regular trips from Lucbe to New York.

Horrible Death.—M. Crevassal a merchant tailor of St. Louis, Mo., was found dead on the 20th inst., half buried in a marsh into which he had gone for the purpose of getting some game—He had been missed two days.

LEARNED IN THE LAW.—A young girl, aged 12 years, has recovered twelve hundred dollars, for a breach of promise of marriage, in the Maryland court at Frederick. She may be considered "smart of her age."

POETRY

From the Boston Magazine.

OLD AND NEW TIMES.

When my good mother was a girl—
Say thirty years ago,
Young ladies then knew how to knit,
As well as how to sew.

Young ladies then could spin and weave,
Could bake, and brew, and sweep;
Could sing and play, could dance and paint,
And could a secret keep.

Young ladies then were beautiful
As any beauties now,—
Yet they could rake the new mown hay,
Or milk the "brindled cow."

Young ladies then wore bonnets too,
And with them their own hair;
They made them from their own good straw,
And pretty, too, they were.

Young ladies then wore gowns with sleeves
Which would hold just their arms;
And did not have as many yards
As acres in their farms.

Young ladies then oft fell in love,
And married too, the men;
While men, with willing hearts and true
Loved them all back again.

Young ladies now can knit and sew,
Or read a pretty book,—
Can sing, and paint, and joke, and quiz,
But cannot bear to cook.

Young ladies now can blithely spin
Of "street yarn" many a spool;
And weave a web of scandal too
And dye it in the wool.

Young ladies now can bake their hair,
Can brew their own cologne;
In borrowed plumage often shine,
While they neglect their own.

And as to secrets, who would think
Fidelity—a pearl?
None but a modest little miss,
Perchance a country girl.

Young ladies now wear lovely curls,
—What pity they should buy them:
And then their bonnets—heavens! they fright
The beau that ventures nigh them.

Then as to gowns, I've heard it said
They'll hold a dozen men;
And if you once get in their sleeves
You'll ne'er get out again.

E'en Love is changed from what it was,—
Although true love is known:
'Tis wealth adds lustre to the cheek,
And melts the heart of stone.

Thus Time works wonders;—young and old
Confess his magic power.
Beauty will fade; but Virtue proves
Pure gold in man's last hour!

[The following beautiful lines are extracted from an embryo volume, entitled Peter Cornelis, a Tale with Songs and other Poems, by a Scottish peasant, named Rodger. It is said, the author has a wife and nine children, whom he has supported for the last ten years, upon wages which have not, on an average, exceeded twelve shillings sterling a week.]

"DINNA FORGET."

AIR—"When Adam at first was created."

Here put on thy finger this ring, love;
And, when thou art far o'er the sea,

Perhaps to thy mind it will bring, love,
Some thought—some remembrance—of me;
Our moments of rapture and bliss, love,
The haunts where so oft we have met,
These tears, and this last parting kiss, love,
It tells thee—O, "dinna forget!"

We might look on yonder fair moon, love,
Oft gazed on by us with delight,
And think of each other alone, love,
At one sacred hour every night:
But ah! ere she'd rise to thy view, love,
To me she long, long would be set;
Then look to this token more true, love,
On thy finger—and "dinna forget!"

Thou mayest meet faces more fair, love,
And charms more attractive than mine;
Be moved by a more winning air, love,
Or struck by a figure more fine:
But, should'st thou a brighter eye see, love,
Or ringlets of more glossy jet,
Let this still thy talisman be, love,
Look on it, and "dinna forget!"

And, oh! when thou writest to me, love,
The seal impress with this ring;
And that a sweet earnest will be, love,
To which, with fond hope I will cling;
That thou to thy vows wilt be true, love—
That happiness waiteth us yet:
One parting embrace—now adieu, love—
This moment I'll never forget!

THE SUM OF LIFE.

Searcher of Gold, whose days and nights
All waste away in anxious care,
Estranged from all life's pure delights,
Unlearned in all that is most fair—
Who sailest not with easy glide,
But delvest in the death of tide,
And struggles in the foam—
Oh come and view this land of graves—
Death's northern sea of frozen waves—
And mark thee out thy home.

Lover of Woman, whose sad heart
Wastes like a fountain in the sun,
Clings most where most its pain does start,
Dies by the light it lives upon—
Come to the land of graves, for here
Are beauty's smile and beauty's tear,
Gathered in holy trust;
Here slumbers forms as fair as those Whose cheeks, now living shame the rose—
Their glory turned to dust.

Lover of Fame, whose foolish thought
Steals onward from the wave of time—
Tell me, what goodness hath it brought,
Atoning for that restless crime?
The spirit-mansion desolate,
That opens to thy storms of fate,
The absent soul of fear—
Bring home the thoughts, and come with me,
And see where all thy pride must be;
Searcher of fame, look here!

And Warrior, with thy sunny plume,
That goest to the hugh's call—
Come and look down—this lonely tomb
Shall hold thee and thy glorious all—
The haughty brow—the manly frame—
The daring deed—the sounding fame—
Are trophies but for death!
And millions who have toiled like thee,
Are stayed, and here they sleep, and see,
Does glory lend them breath?

THE SOLDIER'S FUNERAL.

BY F. O. RICHARDSON.

Hark! hark! mid the busy stir of life
And the crowded city's hum,
I hear the thrilling tone of the fife,
And the roll of the distant drum!

But their altered tones chime sad and slow
To the mourner's silent tread;

For they breathe the hallowed dirge of wo,
The solemn march of the dead!

And looks of manliest grief are there,
And stern eyes drop a tear;
And soldiers falter as they bear,
The youthful warrior's bier!

And see, as that bier comes nigh—it brings
Bright arms—a useless show!
For he hath no need of those gaudy things
Who sleeps in the coffin below!

For the voice that gave the stern command
Hath sighed its latest breath!
And an infant now may snatch the brand
From his dull cold grasp of death!

And the breast so true, and the brow so proud,
Are cold and senseless all;
He hath changed for the coat of mail—the shroud;
For the warrior's cloak—the pall.

He would have hailed the dart that sped
His soul to a warrior's doom;
But a slow and sickly couch was spread,
To wait him to the tomb!

They have borne him to the sacred porch—
They have borne him to the grave;
And the last sad rites of the holy church
Are paid to the young and the brave!

They have breathed the funeral prayer and hymn—
They have fired the soldier's knell;
But it reached not, alas! the ear of him
Who sleeps in the narrow cell!

They have lowered the coffin dark and deep
In the lone grave's hollow womb;
And the lady he loved may come to weep
This eve o'er her soldier's tomb.

THE FORSAKEN: A FRAGMENT.

One evening, sooner than her wont, she sought
Her solitary chamber. There she sate
Beside the open window, where the rose,
With jessamine linked, and woodbine, twined
Around the casement. The night breeze came Freshly and sweetly through the leafy blinds,
And kissed her burning cheek and faded lip.
She slumbered—but not long: the evening wind
Shook from the boughs that trough the casement crept
A shower of rose-leaves: on her ivory neck
They fell, and waked her from her sleep; and then
She raised her head, and saw his portrait lie
Beside her: she pressed it to her fevered lips,
And slept again.

Next morning she was dead!
The sunlight streaming through the tremulous leaves
Fell on her neck in quivering light and shade:
Her face was pillowed on her fair white arms,
That rested by the lattice: her dark hair,
Stirred by the morning breeze, was all that moved.
They called her by her name—she answered not!
They raised her head—and then they saw her face
Was deadly pale and chill!—her marble lips
Were pressed against the portrait: she had died
Embracing it!

R. W. J. D. Caldwell, of Chillicothe, G. Secretary.
Rev. Jos. A. Roof, of Circleville, G. Chaplain.
R. W. John Barney, G. Lecturer.

Our correspondent, from whom we receive the above, says, "I have just returned, from the Grand Lodge, which held its communication in Lancaster, on the third Tuesday of October last. We had quite a refreshing time: about forty five Lodges sent up their representations, and a number of Lodges who have lain dormant for a number of years, also sent representatives, with petitions, praying the indulgence of the Grand Lodge, and asking permission to resume their labors under their old charters, with a strong assurance of persevering in the good cause. Masonry is flourishing in our part of the country, perhaps better than it has at any former period. It is patronized by the pious of all denominations, and such will ever be its destiny when it is conducted in a proper manner, with zeal and spirit. * * * I sincerely hope your paper may get an extensive circulation throughout the country, as I have no doubt it will be the instrument in dispelling some of those dark clouds which have been thrown over it by the ignorance of our enemies, and in some respects by the folly of our friends."

[Will the G. Secretary, please send us a copy of proceedings of G. L. when printed.]

[We make the following extracts from an address delivered by DE WITT CLINTON, before Holland Lodge at the time of his installation as Master, in 1793—47 years ago.]

It must be obvious to a mind of the least reflection, that were masonry to prescribe particular tenets and opinions in religion for her votaries, that it would be utterly incompatible with the universality of the order. For this, and the seasons before mentioned, she has wisely avoided an explicit patronage of any theological creed. The great fundamentals of natural religion she venerates and adores; an atheist can find no admission within the walls of a lodge. She well knows that in taking the religion of nature, as the ground work of her faith, she not only rests upon the immutable foundations of truth, but that she adopts a language in which the wise and the virtuous of all nations, countries, and languages agree—that those systems of artificial theology which have either flourished on the soil of popular delusion and imposture, or been immediately communicated from the Great First Cause, always count the assistance, and coincide with the principles of natural religion. Masonry, therefore, opens her arms to the followers of all systems of religion. The Mahometan, the Jew, the Christian, and the Theist, throwing aside the madness of religious hatred, meet under her protection as friends and brothers. As Christian masons, acknowledging the divinity of Christ, we have introduced the Bible into our lodges to manifest our belief in our doctrines which it inculcates. In like manner, the followers of Moses, Mahomet, and Brama, may introduce into their masonic assemblies, their Pentateuch, their Alcoran, and their Vedam; and yet the unity of masonry would remain—the essential principles on which she moves would be the same—she would still declare to her votaries, 'I regard not to what sect you attach yourselves; venerate the popular religions of your respective countries: follow the light of your own understandings; forget not, however, the doctrines of a religion of nature; adore the great architect of the universe; acknowledge the immortal soul, and look forward to a state of future retribution, when the virtuous of all religions and countries shall meet together and enjoy never-fading bliss.'

We learn from sacred history, that all the inhabitants of the earth are descended from the same stock. The ancestors of us all were once linked together by the ties of consanguinity, and the duties of such a near relation were incumbent upon them. One principle branch of the morality of our order, consists in restoring that tender connection among men, which the infinite diversities of family, tribe, and nation, had nearly reduced to nothing. It inculcates upon its members in their conduct to each other, the reciprocal right and duties of brethren that this artificial contiguity shall operate with as much force and effect, as the natural relationship of blood. A man is bound to consult the happiness, to promote the interests of his brother; to abstain from reproach, censure, and unjust suspicions; to warn him of the machinations of his enemies; to apprise him of his errors; to protect the chastity of his house; to defend his life, his property, and, what is dearer to a man of honor, his character, against unjust attacks; to relieve his wants and distresses; to instill into his mind proper ideas of conduct in the department of life which he is called to fill; and let me add, to foster his schemes of interest and promotion, if compatible with the paramount duties owing to the community. If such are the obligations which a man owes to his brother, they are precisely the duties which one Free Mason ought to perform to another. Our order enjoins them as rules, from which nothing can justify a deviation, and considers their infraction a violation of honor, conscience, and religion; a prostitution of all that is deemed sacred and venerable among men.

But Masonry does not confine the benignity of her precepts to her followers; she rises higher in the scale of moral excellence, and enjoins the observance of her honor, honesty and good faith to all men; she espouses the cause of universal benevolence and virtue; she declares, as unworthy of her patronage, those who violate the laws of rectitude; and her votaries exemplify in their lives, the truth of the remark, that although there be vicious men in the fraternity, yet that they are better than they would be if they were not masons. Of all the virtues which adorn our institution, heaven-born Charity stands pre-eminent in rank. It is not, however, that restricted beneficence which is confined to the administration of pecuniary relief: it comprises all the benevolent affections which one rational being can entertain for another; it teaches us to think, to speak, and to act, in the most favorable and friendly manner, with regard to our fellow creatures. Those who have mixed in a small degree in the world, must have often witnessed the distorted views in which a man's conduct has been represented. Some have a native propensity to discolor the excellencies, and to exaggerate the failings of others—the least fault is magnified into an inexpiable vice; the defects of nature become the subject of shameless ridicule, and the most innocent actions are attributed to the worst of motives. There are others who, ambitious of shining in the walks of wit, make unfriendly observations when the heart harbors no malignity; and who, for the sake of exciting a momentary pleasure in their companions, often rack the feelings of a worthy friend. Masonic charity explodes such improper practices. The faults of a fellow creature are to be scanned with a brother's eye; the imperfections of humanity are not to be ranked in the catalogue of his vices; and if glaring defects are seen in his conduct and character, we are not to trumpet them forth to the world, and commit to the eagle wings of immortal scandal, those failings which should be buried in our benevolent sensibilities.

The numberless ills to which humanity stand exposed, render the tear of consolation and the hand of relief necessary to make existence supportable. There is a fund of comfort in unbosoming our distresses to a sympathetic friend, and alluring his sensibility on the side of our misfortunes. A generous mind will cheerfully lend its assistance administering all the consolation to be derived from a friendly communication of grief. But, alas, more than words and tears is often requisite to arrest the arrows of affliction, and to smooth the rugged paths of life. How many of our fellow men are destitute of the common necessities of existence; shut up in the dreary walls of prisons, and deprived of the light of heaven: languishing in the midst of helpless families of children, without clothes to screen them from the wintry blast, or food to protect them from the voracious famine: no better prospect before them than misery; hope, the last refuge of the wretched, nearly converted into despair, and the retrospect of past days serving as an ignis fatuus, to bewilder them deeper in affliction, and upon its disappearance to increase the 'darkness visible' of their misery. How glorious, how godlike, to step forth to the relief of such distress; to arrest the tear of sorrow; to disarm affliction of its darts; to smooth the pillow of declining age; to rescue from the fangs of vice, the helpless infant, and to diffuse the most lively joys over a whole family of rational, immortal creatures. And how often has our institution done all this and more! How often has it showered down its golden gifts into the seemingly inaccessible dungeons of misery! How often has it irradiated with its beneficent rays, the glooms of affliction, and converted the horrors of despair into the meridian splendor of unexpected joy! How often has it, with its philanthropic voice, recalled the unhappy wanderer into the paths of felicity, and with its powerful arm, protected from the grasp of malice and oppression, the forlorn outcast of society! Let the widow, the orphan, the prisoner, the debtor, the unfortunate, witness its beneficent deeds, and in a symphony of gratitude declare, that on the flight of all the other virtues, charity, as well as hope, remained to bless mankind.

EXTRACTS

From an Address delivered before the Grand Lodge of Ohio, by Bro. HUGH H. WAIT.

Masonry has been judged and condemned, in violation of every rule and dictate of justice. By this, we mean, that false accusations have been made, and inconclusive arguments of their truth have been admitted against us. The faults of Masons, have been charged to Masonry, and from thence a system of argument and insinuation have followed as unjust as injurious.

The world is entirely indebted to ourselves for all its knowledge of our institution; consequently, unless we have pronounced our own condemnation, it could never in justice have condemned us. Our doors open only to the touch of the initiated no listening ear has ever heard, no watching eye has ever seen the transactions of our Lodges. But society was doubtless entitled to an assurance and evidence that the principles and designs of our institution were in perfect accordance with its interest, peace and happiness. This assurance and this evidence have been given. We profess to be at peace with Christ and his altars, with kings and their thrones, to inculcate and promote union, harmony and love, between man and man; that our motto and the cornerstone of our institution is "good will toward men."

Not only have these assurances, but likewise, conclusive evidence of their truth and sincerity been given. Ask the sons of Washington whether there be in Masonry anything to corrupt the patriot's heart, or unnerve the soldier's arm? Ask the numerous professors of any and every denomination among us, whether Masonry sets at naught the counsels of their Redeemer? Is not our act this day, in commemoration of the anniversary of St. John the Baptist, conclusive evidence of our cordial reception of the book of God? If pure religion, and undefiled, before God be, to visit the widows and orphans in their affliction, to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, to open our doors to the wanderer, then, indeed, are the lessons of Masonry the lessons of Religion itself.

The secrecy, as it is termed, of our Institution, has likewise been a subject of suspicion and censure. It has been asked, "if Masonry indeed be innocent in its design, and beneficial in its influence, why shroud it in the veil of mystery? why not reveal it to the world, and thus at once, silence every accuser?" Masonry is not a secret Institution, and Masons have done wrong in ever, for one moment, admitting this charge to be true. Can an Institution justly be called secret because it has its own way, and that of necessity too, of communicating its knowledge? Our secrets are our knowledge, and we ever have been and ever will be willing, freely to communicate this to every one worthy of the sacred trust; and surely you will not censure us for withholding it from the unworthy; if you do see and acknowledge your own inconsistency. Here often have you censured us for admitting them among us and used it as an argument against us. The reason why the secrets of Masonry have ever been confined to Masons is simply this; the very moment they are communicated, they make the recipient a Mason. Thus, should the whole world become a Lodge, the knowledge of Masonry would still be confined to Masons.

Who is he that charges us with secrecy—of keeping our knowledge locked up among ourselves to the exclusion of every one else? Is he sufficiently virtuous suitable to employ, if entrusted with them, the means of doing and receiving good? Let him come to our Lodge, and we will make him a Mason. So far from denying him, we sincerely desire freely to communicate to him our secrets. Such an one is entitled to and should have them. Yea, and they are worthy of his reception, for they may do him the utmost good. They have stayed the Indian tomahawk, and quenched his torturing fires; in distant and hostile lands, they have whispered in the ear of the native that a Mason was there, the token has brought him beside the bed of affliction, to wipe away the tear of sorrow, and cheer the lonely heart in a stranger's land. You cannot, then, justly charge us with secrecy, though you may object to our method of communicating our knowledge; but this, would be like the pupil dictating to his preceptor the method of instruction.

But if such be the value of our secrets, and they be the just reward of virtue, what argument can justify withholding them from the female sex? We answer—her native gentleness, the tender sensibilities of the female heart make her already a Mason. She needs not a Masonic sign to call her to the bed of affliction; better than man, she needs not the stimulus of Masonry to prompt her to do good. Her heart is already the Lodge of every Masonic virtue, and though she be excluded from our Lodges yet she is remembered and protected there.

The exclusion of females from our Lodges is an evidence of our regard for, and promotion of, their own peace and happiness, and that of the domestic circle. Would the denouncing enemy of Masonry trust his wife, his daughter, or his sister among us? Would it not introduce monster Jealousy, into many a domestic circle, where it has never yet shown its hideous form?

If the virtuous female desires to view the interior of a worthy and well regulated Lodge, let her look into her own heart; if she wishes to learn a Masonic sign of distress, let her analyze the sympathetic feeling of her heart at the sight of human woe.

Dr. Johnson very beautifully remarks, that "when a friend is carried to his grave, we at once find excuses for every weakness, and palliation for every fault; we recollect a thousand endearments which before glided off our minds without impressions—a thousand favors unrepaid, a thousand duties unperformed—and wish for his return, not so much that we may receive as that we may bestow happiness and recompense that kindness which before we never understood."

MISCELLANY.

FIRE EATERS.

BY BENSON E. HILL, AUTHOR OF "PLAYING ABOUT, ETC."

Public attention has of late been occupied by the accounts of duels, suggesting to one's memory the truism that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, prompt and proper interference would prevent men, under a mistaken notion of wounded honor, from placing the lives of their adversaries and their own in peril, besides involving not only the friends selected to accompany them, but the surgeon, whose attendance, in the event of mischief, would be at the service of either party.

That the causes of such meetings are often ridiculously disproportionate to their probable effects, two instances may show:

Captain Johnson, and his two subalterns, Frank Townley and Jarret Morris, were seated together one evening enjoying the most brotherly and social intercourse. The Captain had seen much service, and gained golden opinions from his commanders; his senior lieutenant had distinguished himself in the field, was a light-heart, well-tempered fellow, a keen sportsman, and as fond of a bit of innocent fun as a man need be. Morris's age had not afforded him an opportunity of showing his mettle; but his old playmates at Marlow had often witnessed his victories over bigger boys than himself, and with what thorough good humor he now and then submitted to a thorough good thrashing from one of superior thews and sinews, who had taken lessons in the art of self-defence.

The trio thus briefly described were at supper.—Townley was relating some occurrence to his captain, connected with recent exploits, and was fast arriving at the very climax of his narrative, when Jarret, who cared much less for log, gun or rod, than for the cold beef before him, broke in upon the speaker with an application for the mustard. Frank seized the small brown jug which contained it, and in passing it across to the beef-eater, lifted the silver lid, so that, part of the pungent emulsion ran over his fingers. He started back, and, forgetting in an instant the terms of familiar friendship which had long existed between himself and the sportsman, exclaimed in a thundering rage—

"—— it, Townley, what do you mean by that? See, sir," he said holding out his soiled fingers, "what you have done!"

"Well," replied Frank, in a careless tone, "you wanted some mustard, and 'you've got what you asked for,' and he could not resist laughing at the air of offended dignity which Morris's face displayed.

"This is no subject for mirth, sir," retorted Jarret; "you have insulted me and you must apologize."

"Eat your beef, man," said Johnson, "and let Frank finish his adventure, 'tis you who ought to apologize for having cut him short in the very best part of his story."

"Well, sir," said Morris, drawing up to his full height, "since you please to support Mr. Townley in his rudeness, I shall seek other means of redress;" and away went the youth, boiling over with rage.

But not a word of his exit speech reached his companions. Frank had arrived at a ludicrous incident, the good captain and himself was relishing it so absorbingly, that poor Morris's wrongs were unheeded.

Some minutes passed; Johnson expressed his wonder that Jarret did not return to finish his repast, adding, that he was a long while employed in washing his hands. The supper tray was kept on table in expectation of his re-appearance. Drawing towards the fire, the two friends lit their cigars, and having made themselves some grog, were chatting over divers matters, quite unprepared for coming events. Presently the Captain's servant entered with a note, which he handed to Townley, saying, that it had been given him by Mr. Morris's man. This instantly aroused Johnson's attention, who desiring the domestic to withdraw, said—

"I must see that epistle."

"Nay dear, sir, it's only an intimation that Jarret does not rejoin us to night."

"But he shall do so, you may be sure. I insist on seeing his note."

With some reluctance Frank handed it to his commanding officer. It was indeed a challenge, and referring his antagonist to a friend, who would arrange a hostile meeting. Johnson sent, desiring to see Morris immediately. The messenger returned, saying, that he had retired for the evening.

"Go back and tell him that, as he is officer on duty for the week, I require his presence."

Frank, sadly annoyed at the turn affairs had taken, remained silent, and would have left the quarters but that his commanding officer had laid his orders upon him to remain. A short time elapsed, and Morris, dressed as though for parade, with sash, sword, &c., entered the apartment, his countenance betraying considerable emotion. Captain Johnson thus addressed him—

"Mr. Morris, it is not my intention to take serious notice of what has just occurred; I shall not, therefore, place you in a close arrest, but as your friend, point out the very ridiculous position in which you have placed yourself. You fancy an insult offered you where none was intended. You leave the table, and pen a deadly challenge as the only means of healing your wounded feelings. Suppose I had not learned your intention, Townley would no doubt, have suffered you to shoot at him. Doubtless, you are a shot; of your coolness and bravery there can be no doubt; there ye are matches. You might be fallen, or you might have deprived the service of an efficient officer and yourself of a pleasant companion. You would have been wretched for the rest of your life; nor would regret alone have been the consequence of your intemperance—you would have been a marked man.—People would have pointed at you and said—'Do you, see that fellow? Would you believe it—he shot a brother officer because his friend dipped the duellist's fingers in a mustard pot. If the unfortunate gentleman had subjected his foe to any unsavory contact, there had been some excuse, but Mr. Morris, though no coward, could, as the nursery rhyme says, eat a pound of mustard. Was it worth while to immerse his hands in blood because they had incurred such an innocent stain? It was so babyish an affront for which to kill a man. Who ever before heard of death in the mustard pot?'"

The conclusion of this harangue awakened such ludicrous association of ideas, that Townley, tried in vain to hide his merriment. Morris, almost equally tickled, colored to his temples, and hastily said—"Frank, I feel that I have played the fool—you will forgive me?"

Townley eagerly caught his hand, and gave it a hearty shake. Johnson, clapping Morris on the back, called him "a good boy," made him finish his beef, and, soon after, the would-be-fire-eater was sitting between his friends, smoking an Havana, endeavoring to persuade himself that what had passed within the last hour was but a grotesque dream.

Another unlooked for termination to an intended tragedy occurred some years ago, at Portsmouth.—Captain Adamson was constantly complaining that his subaltern did not treat him with sufficient respect; but the more he pointed out the necessity for his being accosted with the deference due to his age and superior rank, the more waggishly familiar would Ridley's language and manner become. Adamson for a considerable portion of his life held some post at an isolated corner of one of our West India Islands, and being the "head buckra" while there, acquired an idea of his own importance, with which, on his revisiting Britain, he was reluctant to part. He was in the main, however, a kindly-disposed person, but very illiterate, and not overblest with natural sagacity; yet, despite the constant freedoms of Ridley, the captain was never so happy as when in his sub's society.

One day, nevertheless, the superior opined that his lieutenant had carried the joke too far. The head and front of his offending was that of having called Adamson "Jimmy," in the presence of some ladies, at whose house the captain flattered himself he was a welcome guest, not only for his amusing conversation, but from his rank in the army.

"If ever you presume to call me so again, I shall take serious notice of it," he spluttered; "James would be quite bad enough, young sir, but Jimmy—it is not to be borne—and I'll show you that I could, if I liked, bring you to a court martial for using language to your superior unbecoming the character of an officer and a gentleman."

"Court martial, indeed?" replied Ridley; "try it my jolly old boy; why you are known only by the name of Jimmy, and hang me but I think you were christened Jimmy."

"I shall not bear this insolence; you shall hear from me."

A friend of the captain's waited on Ridley, informing him that his presence was expected on South-sea Common, at the hour of eight, on the following morning.

Before the clock struck, Adamson, his second, and a surgeon, to show that the bold challenger was determined to bring matters to a sanguinary issue, were seen on the ground. The morning was raw and cold, a heavy sea mist came rolling over the flat much to the discomfort of one who had resided long in the tropics. The trio remained at their post for an hour, yet Ridley came not; then Adamson, apologizing for having given his companions such unnecessary trouble, took leave of them, and made his way to the barracks, breathing vows of vengeance against the man whose conduct had forced him to seek the only means of insuring future respect, yet who had shrunk from giving him any satisfaction: instead of which the air and exercise had given him a ferocious appetite, and his inward man betokened by certain grumblings that he required his morning meal with as little delay as possible.

On entering his room, he found to his disagreeable surprise that no preparations had been made for his breakfast, his grate was empty, all looked cheerless and uncomfortable.

"What is the reason of this shameful neglect, sir?" he demanded of his servant.

"Why, please sir, Mr. Ridley's man came and said as how I wasn't to get breakfast ready, but when you came in from your walk, I was to give you this."

Adamson glanced at the note presented; it was in Ridley's hand. Some new insult doubtless; he dared not open it while even the eye of the servant was upon him. Desiring the man to quit the room, he broke the seal, and read as follows:

"MY DEAR JIMMY.—How could you think I should be such a fool as to leave my warm bed to go out in the damp for the purpose of shooting at you? Lord love your dear stupid head! Did I establish my character in Spain for nothing? Ask any man in the service who knows me, whether I can't afford to refuse fighting with my James. I hope the sea breezes have cooled your fever and made you hungry. I have a capital breakfast ready for you—tea, coffee, hot rolls, broiled ham, eggs, and what I know you dote on—a red herring, stuffed with bird's eye peppers. Come along at once, for by the god of war, I shan't wait for you half as long as you were fool enough to cool your heels expecting me—likely. What! fire at my own captain? my dear friend Jimmy? Impossible!

Yours as ever,

"FRED RIDLEY.

"P. S.—If you don't make haste, your West Indian favorite will be overdone."

Perfectly astonished at this epistle, half dying with emptiness, and really feeling a strong regard for the offender, Adamson did not think it necessary to deliberate, but went directly to his subaltern's room, the savoury steam of the viands urging his steps; he tapped at the door.

"Come in, old boy!" was shouted by his tormentor, who seizing him by the hand, placed him in a chair close by the fire.

"Mr. Ridley," attempted Adamson, "this is very extraordinary—"

"Warm yourself, Jimmy."

"I really ought to be offended, but—"

"Eat Jimmy."

"You are so fond of a joke that—"

"Drink, Jimmy."

He interrupted the captain's every speech by plying him with good things, and when he saw that the cravings of nature were satisfied, said to him in a tone of mock gravity—

"Now, my dear Jimmy, take my advice; keep this little piece of folly of yours entirely to yourself, or you will be laughed at more than ever."

The butt did not take this counsel. It was to his unwisely detailing the particulars that the garrison owed the diversion occasion by the story of this defeated due!

From the New Orleans Picayune.

Luke Able was one of the oddest looking men arranged. Luke Able was able to hear nothing, to see nothing, or to say nothing certain. To every question put by the Recorder it was non my reco do. He came from some of the Western States, could not remember which, did not recollect the year, but believes it was since the battle of New Orleans; does not know his own age, but from what he heard his mother say, is of opinion that his birth occurred since the war of the Revolution; has no idea of what the population of the United States is but thinks it must be considerable; he never had any fears about the yellow fever, always found brandy and water an antidote for it; never gave himself any trouble about the election, because he thought he had no chance of being President himself. He thinks with a sufficient force of men and dogs, the Florida Indians may be conquered, and that it is possible to settle North-Eastern Boundary question without going to war. He looks on the Mississippi as a river not to be sneezed at for its size, but thinks in point of grandeur and startling sublimity, the falls of Niagara goes ahead of it. He cannot distinctly state who was first President of the United States, but believes he's right in saying it was not Arnold.

"As Mr. Able was able to remember nothing and to tell less, the Recorder sent him down to the calaboose, for thirty days, by way of refreshing his memory."

A CLINCHER.—In the coffee room of the Bush Tavern, at Bristol, the conversation of the company a short time since, turning upon the mermaids, one of the party declared he himself had seen several in the North Sea, at different times, with long black hair and their young ones hanging to their breasts. This bold assertion naturally treated some doubt no one presumed to be so rude as to call in question the veracity of the relator. This however, the worthy and facetious host of the Bush contrived to effect in the following manner:—

"Sir,—Captain—of the  informed me that one Sunday morning a merman suddenly appeared to his men, with his hair frizzled, and powdered as white as a cauliflower, and demanded if the captain were on board. The Captain came on deck, when the merman politely addressed him—"Sir, I shall feel particularly obliged if you will give orders for your anchor to be taken up; 'it lies again my street door and prevents my family from going to church!'"

DIET.—Baglivi, the celebrated Roman physician, mentions, that during Lent, an unusually large proportion of the sick in Italy recover their health. An English reviewer suggests, that if the season was strictly observed throughout England, the fashionable physician would lose his employment. It is indisputable, that the fashionable classes, in England and this country, suffer from the effects of high living; but we apprehend that a more generally pernicious evil, and one that fosters and increases the other, is the want of proper occupation. It is one of the greatest misfortunes that can befall human beings, to live without an aim, to have no noble object constantly to draw forth the powers of the mind, and the exertions of the body. Religion supplies such an aim, such an object; and the glory of it is, that the higher attainments in piety we may make, and the wider the sphere of usefulness we may occupy, there is still more to do on earth, and in heaven there is to be enjoyed felicity more exulting, more complete, more durable, than imagination can conceive or hope anticipate.—Bap. Advocate.

An Excuse.—Miravaux was one day accosted by a sturdy beggar, who asked alms of him. "Ho is this," required Miravaux, "that a lusty fellow like you is not employed?" "Ah!" replied the beggar looking very piteously at him, "if you did but know how lazy I am!" The reply was so ludicrous and unexpected that Miravaux gave the varlet a piece of silver.

Asiatric Cholera.—An English Physician in Bombay has discovered the following remedy for the above frightful disease, which is said to prove effectual in 14 cases out of 15.

"An emetic and copious drafts of hot water are given, after which, every twenty minutes, pills composed as follows: aloes, 260 grs.; colocynth, scammony, gamboge, 75 grs. The above powdered fine, and beat up with 12 I-8 grs. hard soap. Add equal quantities of oil of cloves and cadjuput to soften the whole. Divide it into 50 pills, which must be kept in close phials. One pill at a time for adults; for children smaller quantities, ground down in syrup."

An unexpected Proposal.—A young lady came from a great distance "to be cured," and when asked the nature of her complaint, she replied, "as to the matter, I believe there is not a single complaint under the sun which I have not." Here was a fine catalogue of disorders! I asked if she was married or single? "Single," was the answer. I then told her that so many complaints as she seemed to have, could only be cured by a husband! At which observation she was exceedingly exasperated, but her anger terminated in a proposal to marry me. I never was more surprised in my life, and looked quite stupid.—Hardy's Travels in Mexico.

Egyptian Title Deeds.—A few years ago, the Swedish Consul at Alexandria obtained an original MS deed written in the Greek language, on papyrus. It is in good preservation, though it is 1944 or 1946 years old or more than 100 years before Christ. A perfect fac-simile was obtained by Gen. Minutoli, and transmitted to the Academy of Science at Berlin, where it was engraved and published. In the last number of the North American Review, is a fac-simile from the Berlin, engraving, made (without being drawn anew,) by the new and admirable process in lithography, called Dixon's transferring process from the name of an ingenious mechanic, Mr. Joseph Dixon, of Taunton, Mass. The manuscript is an original instrument of sale of a piece of land in the city of Thebes, and by one Nechutes. The document is interesting as a memorial, in the history of the written language of Egypt. We have never had so ancient an authentic monument of the cursive or running hand. By an extraordinary coincidence, another papyrus has been found, containing the record of a law-suit in which reference is made to title deeds by which Nechutes, the purchaser in the deed just explained, bought the land which was in litigation.

The Greek women of Smyrna, are famous for their charms. Their dress is singularly picturesque, being the same costume as the better class of the Turkish women. It consists of loose, large trousers, falling to the ankle, and vests of velvet, bound round the waist by rich embroidered zones, confined with claps of gold or silver. Their black tresses wave unconfined over their shoulders, or are bound round the head intertwined with roses. The stature of the greek woman of Smyrna is rather below than above the ordinary height. Their beauty lies in the Grecian fane, the coal black eyes, which sparkle like diamonds set in a field of vermilion, and the combined expression of classically moulded features, fresh colors, and the soft, languid air, which the climate gives to the form and countenance.—U. S. Gazette.

A Fancy Fairing.—The Hon. Mrs.—, while mistress of a stall, at a fancy fair, observed a gentleman was particularly staring at her. "What is it you please to want?" she inquired. His answer was, "I am pleased to look at you." "That costs a guinea!" she informed him. He paid the money, and demanded, "How much for a kiss?" The honorable lady quickly replied, "Two guineas!" It was bought, and honorably passed across the counter.—London Courier.

Printed Reply.—A singing master, while teaching his pupils, was visited by a brother of the tuneful art. The visitor, observing that this chorister pitched the notes a little low, said, "Sir, do you not use a pipe?"—"No, sir," with admirable gravity replied Semibreve, "I do not."

THE ROMANCE OF WESTERN HISTORY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF 'BORDER TALES.'

THE WAR-BELT.

In the year 1786, there stood upon the margin of the Ohio, near the mouth of the Miami, a small fortress, over which waved the flag of the United States. The banner was that of a confederacy which had just emerged from a successful struggle with one of the most powerful nations of the world, and over which the illustrious WASHINGTON presided as Chief Magistrate. In the eye of a military engineer, the fort would not have deserved that name, as it was a temporary structure, intended only to protect its small garrison against a sudden attack by an Indian force. It was composed of a series of log houses, opening upon an interior area, while the outer sides, closely connected, formed a quadrangular rampart, without apertures, except a single entrance, and a few loop-holes from which to discharge fire-arms. The whole presented the appearance of a single edifice, receiving light from the centre, and forming barracks for the garrison, as well as breast-works against the foe. The forest was cleared away for some hundreds of yards around, leaving an open vista, which extended to the water's edge; and a few acres inclosed in a rude fence, and planted with corn and vegetables, for the use of the soldiers, exhibited the first attempt at agriculture in that wild and beautiful region.

It will be recollected, that when the shores of the Ohio were first explored by the adventurous pioneers, no villages were found upon them; not a solitary lodge was seen along its secluded waters. The numerous and warlike tribes, whose battle-cry was often heard on the frontier, inhabited the tributary branches of the Ohio, leaving the immediate shores of that river an untenanted wilderness, rich in the glorious productions of nature, and animated only by the brute and the wild bird, by the lurking hunter and the stealthy war party. It seemed as if man had been expelled from this blooming paradise, and only invaded its flowery precincts at intervals, to war upon his fellow-man, or to ravage the pastures of the deer and the buffalo. Historians are not agreed as to the reasons of this curious arrangement; but we suppose that the Manitou of the Red man had reserved this loveliest of valleys to be the happy hunting-ground of the blessed and that though living forms were seldom seen within it, the spirits of warriors lingered here, to mourn the destiny of their race, and curse the coming of the white man.

A few adventurous pioneers from Pennsylvania, Virginia, and North-Carolina, had crossed the Alleghanies, and settled at different places, far distant from each other; but these also were inland as respected the great river; the civilized man avoiding its dangerous shores on the one side, from an instinct similar to that which induced the Indian to shun a residence upon them on the other.

All the tribes inhabiting the country north of the Ohio, were at that time hostile to the American people, and beheld with great jealousy these migrations into the west, that indicated an intention to plant a civilized population on this side of the mountains.—The agents also of a foreign power, which saw with dissatisfaction the growing prosperity of the United States, deemed this a favorable moment to unite the savage tribes against our young republic, and they were accordingly instructed to address such arguments to the chiefs as would be likely to effect that object.—Councils were accordingly held, at which inflammatory speeches were made, and arms and trinkets distributed by those unprincipled emissaries. In consequence of these efforts, the hostile feeling of the savages, already sufficiently bitter, became greatly excited; and at the period of which we write, a war with the combined forces of the north-western tribes seemed inevitable.

The policy of the American government was pacific. They did not aim at conquest. They desired to extend to the savages within their borders the same justice by which their foreign relations were intended to be governed. Difficult as this proposition might seem, it was not impracticable. That the enterprising and intelligent population of the United States would spread out from the sea-board over the wilderness; that the savage must retire before the civilised man; that the desert must be reclaimed from a state of nature, and be subjected to the hand of art, were propositions too evident to be concealed or denied. Had the government been disposed to perpetuate the reign of barbarism over the fairest portion of our country, it could not have enforced its decree for a purpose so inconsistent with the interests of the people, and the spirit of the age. But it was never intended that the Indian should be driven from his hunting grounds by violence; and while a necessity, strong as the law of nature, decreed the expulsion of the mere hunter, and gave dominion to art, industry, and religion, it was always proposed that the savage should be removed by negotiation, and a just price given for the relinquishment of his possessory title.

Had these counsels prevailed, humanity would have been spared the anguish and humiliation of blushing for acts of deception, and weeping over scenes of bloodshed. They did not prevail: the magnanimous policy of the government remained unaltered; but many individuals have committed deep wrongs against the savage, while the latter, misled to their ruin by foreign interference, spurned at the offers of conciliation, the acceptance of which would have insured to them the strong protection of the nation.

Such was the posture of affairs, when the little fortress alluded to was established, at the outlet of the fertile valley of the Miami, and near the track by which the war parties approached the Ohio, in their incursions into Kentucky. The position was also that selected by Judge Symmes and others, the purchasers from Congress of a large tract of country, as the site of a future city; though a trivial accident afterward changed the locality, and placed the Queen City of the West at a point twenty miles farther up the Ohio. The fort was garrisoned by a small party of soldiers, commanded by a captain, who was almost as much insulated from the rest of the world, as Alexander Selkirk, when in the island of Juan Fernandez.

At this sequestered spot, a treaty was to be held by commissioners appointed by the President, with the Shawanoes, a migratory and gallant nation, which had fought from South Carolina to Pennsylvania, along the whole line of the western frontier, and whose eventful history, unless it has been lately collected by an ingenious writer who is about to publish a life of Tecumthe, remains to be written. It is enough to say of them here, that no western tribes has produced so many distinguished individuals, or carried on so constant a series of daring enterprises.

For several days previous to that appointed for holding the council, parties of Indian warriors were seen arriving, and erecting their temporary lodges at a short distance from the fort. An unwonted bustle disturbed the silence which usually reigned at this retired spot. Groups of savages, surrounding their camp-fires, passed the hours in conversation and in feasting; the tramp of horses and the barking of dogs were heard in every direction. The number of Indians assembled was much greater than was necessary, or was expected; and their disposition seemed to be any thing but pacific. Irritated by recent events, and puffed up by delusive promises of support, they wore an offended and insolent air. Their glances were vindictive, and their thirst for vengeance scarcely concealed. No one acquainted with the savage character could doubt their intentions, or hesitate for a moment to believe that they only waited to ripen their plan of treachery, and at a moment which should be most favorable to their purpose, to butcher every white man in their power.

The situation of the garrison was very precarious. The fort was a slight work, which might be readily set on fire, and the number of Americans was too small to afford the slightest chance of success in open fight against the numerous force of the Shawanoes. The only hope for safety was in keeping them at a distance; but this was inconsistent with the purpose of meeting them in council, to treat for peace.

Both parties held separate councils on the day previous to that appointed for the treaty. That of the Indians was declamatory and boisterous. The caution with which they usually feel their way, and the secrecy that attends all their measures, seem to have been abandoned. They had probably decided on their course, and deeming their enemy too weak to oppose any serious opposition, were declaiming upon their wrongs, for the purpose of lashing each other into that state of fury which would give relish for the horrid banquet at hand, by whetting the appetite for blood.—The American commissioners saw with gloomy foreboding these inauspicious movements, and hesitated as to the proper course to be pursued. To treat with savages thus numerically superior, bent on treachery, and intoxicated with an expected triumph, seemed to be madness. To meet them in council, would be to place themselves at the mercy of ruthless barbarians, whose system of warfare justified and inculcated every species of stratagem, however disingenuous. To close the gate of the fortress, and break up the negotiation, would be at the same time a declaration of war, and an acknowledgment of weakness, which would produce immediate hostilities. In either case, this little band of Americans stood alone, dependent on their own courage and sagacity only, and cut off from all hope of support. They were far beyond the reach of communication with any American post or settlement.—Under these circumstances, it was proposed to postpone the treaty, upon some plausible pretence, and to endeavor to amuse the Indians, while the utmost diligence should be used in preparing the fort for a siege: and in this opinion all concurred, save one, and happily, that one was a master spirit, the Promethean fire of whose genius seldom failed to kindle up in other bosoms the courage that glowed in his own. That man was Colonel GEORGE ROGERS CLARKE.

Clarke was a Virginian, of high spirit, and of consummate skill as a military leader. A series of daring exploits, evincing a brilliant genius in their conception, executed with accuracy and energy, and terminating in successful results, had placed his name in the first class of our revolutionary heroes. It was said of him, by one who had followed him in battle, "He was the bravest man I ever knew; his courage was governed by a wisdom that bore him through whatever he undertook, in security and triumph; and one could only see after the event, that it partook not of rashness nor presumption, although it bore that appearance." The truth was, that this remarkable man to the gallant spirit that belonged to him as a native of Virginia, added a knowledge of human nature, that enabled him to read, and control the minds around him, and a promptness and energy of purpose, that no ordinary obstacle could obstruct.

Whatever might have been the real opinion of Colonel Clarke on this occasion, he treated the idea of danger with ridicule, and insisted calmly, cheerfully, even playfully, and in a way that disarmed all opposition from his colleagues, that the negotiation should go forward.

An apartment in the fort was prepared as a council-room, and at the appointed hour the doors were thrown open. At the head of the table sat Clarke, a soldier-like and majestic man, whose complexion, eyes, and hair, all indicated a sanguine and mercurial temperament. The brow was high and capacious, the features were prominent and manly; and the expression, which was keen, reflective, and ordinarily cheerful and agreeable, was now grave, almost to sternness.

The Indians, being a military people, have a deep respect for martial virtue. To other estimable or shining qualities they turn a careless eye, or pay at best but a passing tribute, while they bow in profound veneration before a successful warrior. The name of Clarke was familiar to them: several brilliant expeditions into their country had spread the terror of his arms throughout their villages, and carried the fame of his exploits to every council-fire in the West.—Their high appreciation of his character was exemplified in a striking as well as an amusing manner, on another occasion, when a council was held with several tribes. The celebrated Delaware Chief, Buckingahelas, on entering the council-room, without noticing any other person, walked up to Colonel Clark, and as he shook hands cordially with him, exclaimed, "It is a happy day when two such men as Colonel Clarke and Buckingham meet together!"

Such was the remarkable man who now presided at the council table. On his right hand sat Colonel Richard Butler, a brave officer of the revolution, who soon after fell, with the rank of brigadier-general, in the disastrous campaign of Saint Clair. On the other side was Samuel H. Parsons, a lawyer from New-England, who afterward became a judge in the north-western territory. At the same table sat the secretaries, while the interpreters, several officers, and a few soldiers, stood around.

An Indian council is usually one of the most imposing spectacles in savage life. It is one of the few occasions in which the warrior exercises his right of suffrage, his influence, and his talents, in a civil capacity, and the meeting is conducted with all the gravity and all the ceremonious ostentation, with which it is possible to invest it. The matter to be considered, as well as all the details, are well digested before hand, so that the utmost decorum shall prevail, and the decision be unanimous. The chiefs and sages—the leaders and orators—occupy the most conspicuous seats: behind them are arranged the younger braves, and still farther in the rear appear the women and youth, as spectators. All are equally attentive. A dead silence reigns throughout the assemblage. The great pipe, gaudily adorned with paint and feathers, is lighted, and passed from mouth to mouth, commencing with the chief highest in rank, and proceeding by regular gradation to the inferior order of braves. If two or more nations be represented, the pipe is passed from one party to the other, and salutations are courteously exchanged, before the business of the council is opened by the respective speakers. Whatever jealousy or party spirit may exist in the tribe, it is carefully excluded from this dignified assemblage, whose orderly conduct and close attention to the proper subject before them, might be imitated with profit by some of the most enlightened bodies in Christendom.

It was an alarming evidence of the temper now prevailing among them, and of the brooding storm that filled their minds, that no propriety of demeanor marked the entrance of the savages into the council room. The usual formalities were forgotten or purposely dispensed with, and an insulting levity substituted in their place. The chiefs and braves stalked in, with an appearance of light regard, and seated themselves promiscuously on the floor, in front of the commissioners. An air of insolence was marked in all their movements, and showed an intention to dictate terms, or to fix a quarrel upon the Americans.

A dread silence rested over the group: it was the silence of dread, distrust, and watchfulness—not that of respect. The eyes of the savage band gloated upon the banquet of blood that seemed already spread out before them; the pillage of the fort, and the bleeding scalps of the Americans, were almost within their grasp; while that gallant band saw the portentous nature of the crisis, and stood ready to sell their lives as dearly as possible.

The commissioners, without noticing the disorderly conduct of the other party, or appearing to have discovered their meditated treachery, opened the council in due form. They lighted the peace-pipe, and after drawing a few whiffs, passed it to the chiefs, who received it. Colonel Clark then arose, to explain the purpose for which the treaty was ordered. With the unembarrassed air, with a tone of one accustomed to command, and the easy assurance of perfect security and self-possession, he stated that the commissioners had been sent to offer peace to the Shawanoes; that the President had no wish to continue the war; he had no resentment to gratify; and that if the red men desired peace, they could have it on liberal terms. "If such be the will of the Shawanoes," he concluded, "let some of their wise men speak."

A chief arose, drew up his tall person to its full height, and assuming a haughty attitude, threw his eye contemptuously over the commissioners and their small retinue, as if to measure their insignificance in comparison with his own numerous train, and then stalking up to the table, threw upon it two belts of wampum, of different colors—the war and the peace belt.

"We come here," he exclaimed to offer you two pieces of wampum: they are of different colors; you know what they mean: you can take which you like!" And turning upon his heel, he resumed his seat.

The chiefs drew themselves up, in the consciousness of having hurled defiance in the teeth of the white men. They had offered an insult to the renowned leader of the Long Knives, to which they knew it would be hard for him to submit, while they did not suppose he would dare to resent it. The council-pipe was laid aside, and those fierce wild men gazed intently on Clarke. The Americans saw that the crisis had arrived: they could no longer doubt that the Indians understood the advantage they possessed, and were disposed to use it; and a common sense of danger caused each eye to be turned on the leading commissioner. He sat undisturbed, and apparently careless, until the chief who had thrown the belt on the table had taken his seat: then, with a small cane which he held in his hand, he reached, as if playfully, toward the war-belt, entangled the end of the stick in it, drew it toward him, and then with a twitch of the cane, threw the belt into the midst of the chiefs. The effect was electric. Every man in council, of each party, sprang to his feet; the savages, with a loud exclamation of astonishment, "Hugh!" the Americans in expectation of a hopeless conflict, against overwhelming numbers. Every hand grasped a weapon.

Clarke alone was unawed. The expression of his countenance changed to a ferocious sternness, and his eye flashed, but otherwise he was unmoved. A bitter smile was slightly perceptible upon his compressed lips, as he gazed upon that savage band, whose hundred eyes were bent fiercely and in horrid exultation upon him, as they stood like a pack of wolves at bay, thirsting for blood, and ready to rush upon him, whenever one holder than the rest should commence the attack. It was one of those moments of indecision, when the slightest weight thrown into either scale will make it preponderate; a moment in which a bold man conversant with the secret springs of human action, may seize upon the minds of all around him, and sway them at his will. Such a man was the intrepid Virginian. He spoke, and there was no man bold enough to gainsay him—none that could return the fierce glance of his eye. Raising his arm, and waving his hand towards the door, he exclaimed: "Dogs! you may go!" The Indians hesitated for a moment, and then rushed tumultuously out of the council-room.

The decision of Clarke, on that occasion, saved himself and his companions from massacre. The plan of the savages had been artfully laid: he had read it in their features and conduct, as plainly as if it had been written upon a scroll before him. He met it in a manner which was unexpected: the crisis was brought on sooner than was intended; and upon a principle similar to that by which, when a line of battle is broken, the dismayed troops fly, before order can be restored, the new and sudden turn given to these proceedings by the energy of Clarke, confounded the Indians, and before the broken thread of their scheme of treachery could be re-united, they were panic-struck. They had come prepared to brow-beat, to humble, and then to destroy: they looked for remonstrance, and altercation; for the luxury of drawing the toils gradually around their victims; of beholding their agony and degradation, and of bringing on the final catastrophe by an appointed signal, when the scheme should be ripe. They expected to see on our part great caution, a skilful playing off, and an unwillingness to take offence, which were to be gradually goaded into alarm, irritation, and submission. The cool contempt with which their first insult was thrown back in their teeth surprised them, and they were foiled by the self-possession of one man. They had no Tecumseh among them, no master-spirit, to change the plan so as to adapt it to a new exigency; and those braves, who in many a battle had shown themselves to be men of true valor, quailed before the moral superiority, which assumed the vantage ground of a position they could not comprehend, and therefore feared to assail.

The Indians met immediately around their own council-fire, and engaged in an animated discussion. Accustomed to a cautious warfare, they did not suppose a man of Colonel Clarke's known sagacity would venture upon a display of mere gasconade, or assume any ground that he was not able to maintain; and they therefore attributed his conduct to a consciousness of strength. They knew him to be a consummate warrior; gave him the credit of having judiciously measured his own power with that of his adversary; and suspected that a powerful reinforcement was at hand.—Perhaps at that moment, when intent upon their own scheme, and thrown off their guard by imagined security, they had neglected the ordinary precautions that form a prominent feature in their system of tactics: they might be surrounded by a concealed force, ready to rush upon them at a signal from the fort.—In their eagerness to entrap a foe, they might have blindly become entangled in a snare set for themselves. So fully were they convinced that such was the relative position of the two parties, and so urgent did they consider the necessity for immediate conciliation, that they appointed a delegation to wait on Clarke, and express their willingness to accept peace on his own terms. The council re-assembled, and a treaty was signed, under the dictation of the American commissioners. Such was the remarkable result of the intrepidity and presence of mind of GEORGE ROGERS CLARKE.

THE LÉGENDAIRY.

CATHERINE GREY.

The really affecting history of Catherine Grey and her husband the Earl of Hertford, forms the tale to which her name is assigned. Queen Elizabeth is here described to be enamoured of the earl; and after the discovery of his connexion with Catherine, her jealousy vents itself in confining them in the Tower.—We pass over the imaginary interview between the queen and Catherine, and shall commence our extracts with the resolution taken by Elizabeth, who is supposed to be residing in the Tower at the time, to visit Seymour, at the moment when the lieutenant of the fortress has permitted his prisoners to meet, notwithstanding her majesty's express command to the contrary:

The blood faded from Warner's cheek, his knees knocked against each other, and so violent was the agitation of his whole frame, that he was for some time unable to utter a syllable in reply to the queen's address.

"How now, master lieutenant!" asked Elizabeth; "what mean this? My resolution, is, perhaps, a somewhat singular one; but surely there is nothing in it so appalling that it should banish the blood from your cheek, and prevent your limbs from performing their functions. Lead on, I say."

"Gracious madam!" said Warner, "pause a moment ere you take this step."

"Not an instant, Sir Edward," said the queen—"How! do you dispute the commands of your sovereign?"

"Then, most dread sovereign," said the lieutenant, seeing that it was impossible to preserve his secret, and throwing himself at the queen's feet, "pardon, pardon, for the most guilty of your majesty's subjects."

"Ha!" said the queen, using the favorite interjection of her father, while his own proud spirit flashed in her kindled eye, and lowered in her darkening brow; "what dost thou mean?"

"The Earl of Hertford is not in his dungeon."

"What, escaped! Traitor—slave, hast thou suffered him to escape?"

"Warner grovelled on the ground in the most abject posture at the queen's feet, and his frame trembled in every fibre as he said, "He is in the Lady Catherine's apartment."

"What, ho there!" shouted the queen, as the white foam gathered on her lip, and her own frame became agitated, though not with fear, but with uncontrollable anger—"Guards, seize the traitor!"

Several yeomen of the guard immediately entered the apartment, and seized the lieutenant of the Tower, binding his arms, behind him, but not depriving him of his weapons. The queen acting on the impulse of the moment, commanded one of the guards to conduct her to the dungeon of the Lady Catherine Grey, and ordered the others to follow her with Sir Edward

Warner in their custody. Anger, hatred, fear, jealousy, all lent wings to her steps. The dungeon door was soon before her; the bolts were withdrawn, and with little of the appearance of a queen in her gait and gestures, excepting that majesty which belongs to the expression of highly wrought feelings, she rushed into the dungeon, and found Catherine Grey in the arms of Hertford, who was kissing away the tears that had gathered on her cheek.

"Seize him—away with him to instant execution!" said the queen.

The guards gazed for a moment wistfully on each other, and seem as if they did not understand the command.

"Seize him! I say," exclaimed the queen; "I have myself taken the precaution to be present, that I may be assured that he is in custody, and led away to the death that he has taken so much pains to merit."

The guards immediately surrounded the Earl, but they yet paused a moment ere they led him out of the dungeon, when they saw the Lady Catherine throw herself on her knees before Elizabeth, and seize the skirt of her robe.

"Have pity, pity, gracious queen!" she cried, "have pity!"

"Away, minion!" said the queen; "he had no pity on himself when he ventured to break prison, even in the precincts of our royal palace. His doom is fixed."

"Not yet, great queen, not yet!" said Catherine, still grasping Elizabeth's robe, "Can nought save him?"

"Nought, save my death," said the queen; and then she added in an under tone, which she did not seem to intend should be audible, while a dark smile played on her lip, "or perchance thine."

Catherine's ear caught the last part of the queen's sentence, and with the quickness of lightning she exclaimed, "Thy death or mine, O queen? Then thus!" she added, plucking from the belt of Sir Edward Warner, who stood by her side with his hands bound behind him, a dagger, and brandishing it aloft—"thus may his life be spared!"

A cry of "treason! treason!" pervaded the dungeon, and the guards advanced between Catherine and the queen, whose life she seemed to threaten; but, ere they could wrest the dagger from her hand, she had buried it in her own bosom.

"Now, now do I claim thy promise, O queen!" she said, as she sunk to the earth, whilst the blood poured in a torrent from her wound; "Catherine Grey no longer disturbs thee—spare the life of the princely Seymour."

Her last breath was spent on these words—her last gaze was fixed upon the queen—and pressing the hand of her husband, who was permitted to approach her, in her dying grasp, the spirit of Catherine Grey was released from all its sorrows.

The sacrifice of the unhappy lady's life preserved that for which it had been offered up. The queen, touched with the melancholy termination of her tire woman's existence, revoked the despotic and illegal order which she had given for the execution of Hertford, but ordered him to be conducted back to his dungeon, where he remained in close custody for a period of more than nine years. The death of Elizabeth at the expiration of that time, released him from his captivity; and then, although he was unable to restore the Lady Catherine to life, he took immediate steps to re-establish her fair fame. In these efforts he was perfectly successful, he proved before the proper tribunals the validity of his marriage, and transmitted his inheritance to his son, who was the only child of that ill-fated union.

Courage, tall 'uns!—The Cahawba (Alabama) Democrat states that there is a man in those diggings so tall that he has escaped the fever and ague, merely by carrying his head above the miasmatic region of the atmosphere. This is an advantage of long legs that cannot be too highly appreciated.

An elderly maiden, meeting a newly married man, who had once been her servant, carrying home a cradle, exclaimed, "Ah, John, these are the fruits of marriage." "No madam," replied John, "this is only the fruit basket."

THE GATHERER.

Depth of the Ocean.—The sea was recently sounded by lead and line, in latitude 57 degrees south, and 85 degrees 7 minutes west longitude from Paris, by the officers of the French ship Venus, during the voyage of discovery, at a depth of 3,470 yards or 2½ miles, no bottom was found. The weather was very serene, and it is said that hauling in the lead took sixty sailors upwards of two hours. In another place in the Pacific ocean, no bottom was found at the depth of 4,140 yards.

We have heard that when a Scotch dutchess, once "the admired of all observers," was questioning the children at one of her charity schools, the teacher asked, "What is the wife of a King called?" A Queen, bawled out one of the philosophers. "The wife of an Emperor?" "An Empress," was replied with equal readiness. "Then what is the wife of a duke called?" "A drake," exclaimed several voices, mistaking the title duke for the biped duck, which they pronounced the same.—Richmond Star.

A School of Whales.—What do whales want of a school, papa?

To learn to spout! They are the greatest spouters in the world—except, perhaps, some of our noisy Congress men.

An old man who had been henpecked all his life, was visited on his bed by a clergyman. The old man appeared very indifferent, and the person endeavored to arouse him by talking of the King of Terrors! I've been living six and thirty years with the Queen of them, and the King canna be muckle waur."

Take care of your Baggage.—Travellers should be careful to deliver their baggage to proper persons, as a gentleman, a few days since, on alighting from a stage coach, entrusted his wife to a stranger, and has not heard of her since.

CANAJOHARIE, has been visited by a very destructive fire. Upwards of $100,000, has been destroyed. Among the sufferers, is Mr. Levi Backus, the worthy proprietor and editor of the Canajoharie Radii. Mr. B. was absent at the time, and every article of his furniture was destroyed as well as his printing office. Mr. B's. case is a peculiarly hard one. Both he and his wife are deaf and dumb; yet with this almost insuperable obstacle to the acquiring of a profession, Mr. B. regularly served an apprenticeship to the printing business, acquired the art, and became the editor of a newspaper, which we can bear testimony was conducted with a degree of talent, far above mediocrity. In one brief hour he has lost the labor of years of the most unremitting industry. Is it not then the duty of us all and particularly those who are blest in their Store, by a kind and gracious Providence, to assist this worthy and distressed fellow being, whose natural afflictions, (with all our kindness) commenced with his birth, and can only end with the grave. Any donations sent to Jared L. Rathbone, Mayor of this city, will be thankfully received, and applied to the benefit of Mr. Backus.

Nota Bene.—We suppose our friend of the Westchester Democrat, is aware, that almanac makers do not usually prognosticate beyond the year in which they, as veritable chroniclers, manufacture our snowstorms, etc. hence by the token and sign at the Democrat's mast head, Mr. John Beers is beat "all hollow," by at least three years, some months, and several days, which by way of liberality, we will throw in. Is this "light" enough?

EDITORIAL CHANGE.—We have received the first No. of the Saratoga Sentinel, and Waterford Champion, united under the title of the Champion, and Sentinel, published at Saratoga Springs, under the editorial supervision of Hiram Wilbur, Esq. Mr. W. is a downright clever fellow, and we sincerely wish him a larger share of quoin (coin) than either he or ourselves, are likely to realize from a printer's "bank," however large the emission of our bills may be.

"THE HEIGHT OF CRUELTY."—The Evening Journal of Tuesday, in speaking of the Election in Ohio, says, "The official result of the Presidential election has not been ascertained. Enough is known, however, to enable us to say that the Van Buren ticket, is considerably ahead of the Birney ticket." These salt river flings are very cruel to us of the "used-up community."

ACCIDENT.—Two boys belonging to Hyde Park, were run down a few nights since while in a sail boat, by the steamer Dewitt Clinton, and one of them drowned.

Philadelphia Theatricals.—The Arch street Theatre is about to be opened in Philadelphia on an extremely low scale of prices, namely, 25 cents for the boxes, and 12½ cents for the pit.

Short Weight in Tobacco.—It is asserted by the shippers of this article, that Tobacco which is weighed in the spring, and then lies until fall, will shrink in weight forty or fifty pounds per hogshead.

Resolutions have been introduced into the Legislature of Georgia, now in session, instructing the Senators in Congress from that State to vote for a repeal of the Sub-Treasury act, or resign.

THE MORMONS.—held a Semi-annual conference at Hancock county, Illinois, on the third of last month. About 5000 members were present including elders and preachers, and about one hundred new converts were baptised. They have recently had a large addition to their community from England! Wonders will never cease.

MRS. KINNEY.—The grand jury of Boston, have found a true bill against Mrs. Kinney, for poisoning her husband, Geo. T. Kinney. She was arraigned and pleaded not guilty.

CUSICK, a chief of the Tuscarora tribe, who served faithfully for six years under Washington, died a few days since. They are fast fading away.

The last Natchez papers received state that Gen. Jackson is quite ill, so much so as to be confined to his bed.

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT.—An order has been issued in Canada and other English Colonies, to the effect that all the Lodges shall go in mourning for the late Earl of Durham, for the term of six months from the time of his disease, Lord Durham was Pro. Grand Master of England.

LAMENTABLE CATASTROPHE—LAST LESSON.—On Saturday afternoon, of last week, the widow Coit's family, distant one mile from this village, was visited with deep affliction. Gurdon, a son about 4 years of age, while carelessly handling a musket, shot his youngest sister, who was about 10 years of age. It appears that the boy went across the road to the house where his brother lives, and procured the gun supposing that it was not loaded, and when he came back his little sister was in the back stoop, mixing up some indian bread, and without doubt, with an intention of frightening her, he pointed the gun at her, when it went off, discharging the whole contents into the right side of her neck, severing the main artery, and nearly carrying away one of her hands. Of course she died almost instantaneously. The mother went to the door, but only to see her daughter a mutilated corpse; she clasped her child in her arms, and with feelings which can better be imagined than described, carried her into the house and laid her on the bed. Mrs. Coit was alone at the time, and was perfectly frantic.—Ellicottville (Cattaraugus) Rep.

Exchange on New-York.—We learn that the State Bank of Illinois, through its agency in this city, is drawing sight checks in New York for bills of the institution at 4 per cent discount. This will be quite a relief to our community; yet we trust exchanges will soon be down to the old mark, from 1½ to 2 per cent.—Chicago Democrat.

Duel at Natchez.—"An affair of honor" took place on Natchez Island on Thursday, between Mr. H. B. Barbour, a lawyer, and Dr. G. C. McWhorter, both of Vidalia, in this State. At the first fire, Mr. Barbour received the ball of his antagonist in his body, which resulted in his death in 20 hours. Thus has another victim paid the forfeit of his life to a false notion of honor.—N. O. Picayune.

TEXAS.—Galveston dates are to the 7th November. The President of the Republic was at that time dangerously ill, and unable to attend to his official duties.

Two expeditions were fitting out against the Indians who had returned into winter quarters.

The Houston Star mentions a rumor that the Federalists were defeated and flying back into Texas—that the success they obtained was merely over the rear guard of Arista, but on the coming up of his main body, they were cut to pieces. The intelligence is also confirmed by news from Matagorda.

LOOK OUT.—Five dollar notes of the old broken down Commercial Bank of Millington, altered so as to read "Commercial Bank, of New York," are in circulation. Look out for them.

Whales in the Gulph of Mexico.—A Martinique letter states that, on the 20th June, 50 cachalot whales were driven on shore during a stiff gale near the Basae Points. The inhabitants hastened to make as much oil as they could from their carcasses, before the heat of the climate rendered them putrid. The appearance of whales in these regions is not of usual occurrence.

Emmigration to Jamaica.—The Northampton Courier says:—"A large company of gentlemen started from this place on Monday morning for Jamaica, West Indies. Most of them are mechanics who are employed by the Governor of this Island to erect necessary buildings for the purpose of making Silk, which he intends to make a staple commodity."

RACE BETWEEN "BOSTON" AND "GANO."—The four mile match race between the celebrated horses "Boston" and "Gano" will take place at Augusta, Georgia, on the 7th of December. The stakes are $10,000 a side, half forfeit, with an inside bet of $5,000.

TEXAS AND GREAT BRITAIN.—It is reported by the Great Western that Gen. Hamilton, the Ambassador of Texas, has agreed with Lord Palmerston upon the terms of a treaty between these two high contracting parties, by which Great Britain consents to acknowledge the independence of Texas, and use her endeavors to obtain the same recognition on the part of Mexico. It is included in the report that this treaty with Great Britain would probably enable Gen. Hamilton to consummate his arrangements for a loan. Of course the loan had not been made when announced some weeks ago by several of our contemporaries.—Jour. Com.

A LARGE UMBRELLA.—The Birmingham Journal gives a description of the largest umbrella that was ever made in that place. Its height is eighteen feet, mounted with a balloon; its diameter is seventeen feet taking sixty-two yards of crimson damask to cover it. The brass work weighs fifty pounds; the total weight is four hundred and a half. The price about two hundred and fifty dollars. It has been made to the order of a sea captain and intended as a present to an African prince.—N. Y. Standard

DEDICATION HYMN.

To thee, this Lodge we dedicate,
With praise aloud proclaim,
While we as brethren celebrate
Thy virtues and thy fame.

Though we possess the gift of tongues,
Great God, without thy grace,
Our fondest words, our loftiest songs
Would be but sounding brass.

Oh, brethren, then, while on this earth
Let brotherly love abound,
As heirs of our inheritance,
On each our friendships crown.

While we shall feel a brother's sigh,
And with him bear a part,
Let sorrow flow from eye to eye,
And joy from heart to heart.

May love in one delightful stream
Through all our bosom flow,
And union, sweet with fond esteem,
In all our actions glow.

Let discord, odious child of hell,
Be banished far away,
While we in sweetest friendship dwell,
And our great Architect obey.

O then, as brethren here below,
Let us resemble those above,
Where streams of friendship ever flow
With joy, and peace, and love.

For ties of love, ye "rocks and hills,
Your lasting silence break,
And all harmonious human tongues"
With loudest praises speak.

Staunton, July 22, 1837.

[From the N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.]

The Colonel of the Boston Post is a man of inexhaustible resource. He was knocked down flat by the overwhelming defeat of his party, but it was only for a moment; he jumped up in a twinkling, and has been telling the world ever since that he don't care, in a succession of witty and good humoured paragraphs. Now, lest these should tire, he vents his insouciance in metre. Hear him.

THANKSGIVING.

BY A FINGERER.

"What number shall this be?"
"Four!" "I'm dished!"

Election times are over now,
And sober times are coming;
No more our ringing ears will crack
With that infernal drumming;
No more the life inciting fears
Of murd'rous midnight slaughters,
Will shriek upon the startled rest
Of anxious wives and daughters;
God bless 'em! they can snuggle now
Beneath the sheet and blanket,
Or, if the baby need a spank,
Why, venture out and spank it!

Once more at welcome breakfast time,
While moping o'er our coffee,
We hail the smoking newspaper,
Spread out to dry by Sophy,
And hope to find some pleasant jest
To drive away the vapors,—
Not yard by yard, consecutive,
Of stupid "Glentworth papers;"
The "claret colored coat" once gave Me fits of epilepsay, or
The cramp, I have forgotten which,
And Glentworth the dyspepsia!

No more the bunting, spread by wags
Who know not what remorse is,

Will fly to tickle idle boys,
And frighten skittish horses;
No more the victors' lungs will swell
Like forty thousand STENTORS;
No more the stout election lies
Return "to plague th' inventors;"
And when we meet hereafter, let
No politics be brought on,
But BUCK take snuff with JOSSELYN,
GREENE nig gerec with HAUGHTON!*

As ever after thunder squalls
The atmosphere is purer;
As ever after lover's spats
Their passion is the surer;
As shines of "gentlemen in black,"
Feel better after aching.
So may we all the better be
For this tremendous shaking;
Then, victims, pony up your bets,
Remember luck's a rover;
And, Doctor, take those boots, and be—
Right glad election's over.

THE FUNERAL OF A MOTHER.

I saw the soul's big tear in manhood's eye,
O'er youth's fair cheek the shade of filial woe,
And heard sad echoing to the clouded sky,
The mournful knell in dirge-like measures flow,

And there She lay, for whom such grief awoke,
Rent from the world while all around was fair,—
Ere from her brow the flush of health had broke,
Or wasting years had worn their trace of care.

Oh, God! if 'tis a bitter thing to die,
To creeping age, neglected and forlorn,
What must it be where every tender tie
Is fresh and clustering in its balmy morn?

Yes,—there she lay! and round her coffin bed
Burst forth the piercing wail of infant woes;
While "Mother!—Mother!"—filled the ear with dread,

As from those nurslings' ruby lips it rose.

And was there aught amid that hearsed gloom,
In youth's fond tear, or manhood's deeper groan,
In smitten beauty, or the yawning tomb,
That smote the soul like their wild, wailing tone?

For who to them the hearts deep void shall fill,
Watch o'er their cradle couch with sleepless care,
Lure the first lisp,—and soothe the fancied ill,
Check the young fault, and bless the trembling prayer?

A Mother's love!—Go ask the buds that live
By heaven's pure dew on yonder parching hill,—
Ask the pale flower that summer suns revive,
For some faint emblem of that holy thrill;—

The fickle dews may shun the plant that pines,
The lofty Sun force the flowery glen,—
A Mother's love with death alone declines.
And say ye white robed angels,—dies it then?

WEEP NOT FOR HIM THAT DIETH.

BY THE HON. MRS. NORTON,

"Weep ye not for the dead, neither bemoan him;
but weep sore for him that goeth away, for he shall return no more, nor see his native country."—Jeremiah.

Weep not for him that dieth—
For he sleeps and is at rest;
And the couch whereon he lieth
Is the green earth's quiet breast;
But weep for him who pineth
On a far land's hateful shore—
Who wearily declineth
Where ye see his face no more!

Weep not for him that dieth—
For friends are round his bed,

*Greene the Colonel—Niggerer, synonymous with liquor, or liquerize; Anglice, take a drink—Maughton, the Major, alias, the At las; Green's Antipodes in politics.

And many a young lip sigheth
When they name the early dead:
But weep for him that liveth
Where none will know or care
When the groan his faint heart giveth,
Is the last sigh of despair.

Weep not for him that dieth—
For his struggling soul is free,
And the world from which it flieth
Is a world of misery:
But weep for him that weareth
The captive's galling chain,
To the agony he beareth,
Death were but little pain.

Weep not for him that dieth—
For he hath ceased from tears,
And a voice to his replieth
Which he hath not heard for years:
But weep for him that weepeth
On that cold land's cruel shore—
Blest, blest is he that sleepeth—
Weep for the dead no more!

ALL THAT'S BRIGHT MUST FADE.

All that's bright must fade,
The brightest still the fleetest;
All that's sweet was made
But to be lost when sweetest;
Stars that shine and fall,
The flower that droops in springing;
Those, alas! are types of all
To which our hearts are clinging.

Who would seek or prize,
Delights that end in aching?
Who would trust to ties
That every hour are breaking?
Better far to be
In utter darkness lying,
Than be blest with light, and see
That light forever flying.

AN EPIGRAM.

A skeptic to a censor said
"I have no soul about me;"
The latter mildly thus replied,
"I have no cause to doubt thee:
For if, within thy narrow case,
There's any soul at all,
A gross upon a needle's point
Would dance—they are so small!"

MASONIC.

For the American Masonic Register.

ORATION ON THE

Origin, Design, and Duties of Free-Masonry; pronounced at the Second Street Presbyterian Church, in the city of Troy, on the 24th of June, 1840.

By the R. W. JAMES HERRING,

Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge of the State of New-York.

*Of all lands upon the broad surface of the earth, Palestine offers to our study the most extraordinary history; and of all cities, Jerusalem is the most remarkable for its antique associations, and its many transitions from splendor to misery, from glory to abasement, from power to desolation. Founded, unquestionably, soon after the flood, it has been by turns the object of strife amongst the professors of all religions, and has by turns been possessed by all. From the royal Priest Melchisedec, the "King of peace," and the "Priest of the most high God," who dwelt there while in all probability it was but a little village, it fell into the hands of the worshippers of Ashteroth and Dagon; of the descendants of Isaac and Ishmael; the fire worshippers of Persia, the Idolaters of Rome, the Saracens, the Turk and the Christian. The fame of that city has gone to the uttermost parts of the earth. Princes and people have congregated there from distant regions to gaze upon its gorgeous palaces or to worship on its sacred soil. Kings, and warriors, and poets, and holy men were born there, whose wisdom, prowess, genius and piety have shone, and continue to shine, with undiminished lustre, though surrounded by bright and lustrous names which have illuminated the world thirty centuries. There has wealth abounded, and delicacy and refinement and the arts of peace; there too have war and pestilence and famine displayed their power with cruelty, misery and destitution in their train; and the land that once, in the expressive language of the East, "flowed with milk and honey," has become waste and sterile and the city, of which it was once said, "thou shalt not swear by Jerusalem for it is the city of the great King"—is now in captivity.

"Rest of thy sons, amid the foes forlorn.
Mourn widowed Queen, forgotten Zion mourn!
Is this thy place, sad city, thus thy throne,
Where the wild desert rears its craggy stone?
While suns unblest their angry lustre fling
And way worn pilgrims seek the scanty spring?
Where now thy pomp, which Kings with envy viewed?"

Where now thy might which all these Kings subdued
No martial myriads muster in thy gates;
No suppliant nations in thy Temple wait;
No prophet bards, thy glittering courts among,
Wake the full lyre, and swell the tide of song:
But lawless Force, and mongre Want is there;
And the quick-darting eye of less Fear;
While cold Oblivion, 'mid thy ruins laid,
Folds his dark Wing beneath the ivy shade?"

HERR.

But the history, the marvellous history, of that land of promise, and of that city of vicissitudes has not yet closed; its past eventful existence is even now struggling with the future. Even now, events long foretold appear to be enacting for its delivery once more from captivity, and the eyes of both the Jew and the Christian are turned thitherward with equal intentness, both believing that that city's future history will not be less extraordinary than the past.

Our attention, however, on this occasion is due only to the past, though I may be permitted to say, that as Masons we shall take as deep an interest in the liberation of that land and city as any class of people at the present day on the face of the earth.

There was our order founded, thence was it diffused over the civilized world, and there at various periods have our fraternity assembled to restore freedom to the land promised to the father of the faithful; where our first Grand Master by the hands of the craft erected a temple to the true and living God; where the book of the law was preserved by the fraternity, "when Judah was made desolate by the Chaldees;" and where, when the daily offering and oblation had ceased, the blessed Redeemer gave himself as a ransom for the redemption of mankind.

I have said that at Jerusalem, our order was founded: I shall now proceed to shew why it was organized, and that when it was accomplished, it was one of the most important movements ever devised by the wisdom of man, and worthy of the wisest of Kings, for the promotion of Science, for the diffusion of religious truth, and for the cultivation of those moral and social duties, which at that time were neither generally practiced nor understood in the world, but which have since been so universally approved that they now constitute the grand characteristics of civilized nations.

The Jews were a peculiar people. Of the seed of Abraham through Isaac, they were kept separate from other families for the purpose of preserving the purity of that line, in which all the nations of the earth should be blessed, according to the promise of God to the Patriarch. Through all the severe trial and vicissitudes of nearly five centuries, until their establishment with an independent government in the land of Canaan, they preserved, the faith of their great progenitor, while the nations which had been established throughout the earth after the flood, had fallen into Idolatry. Here and there, probably, a family might have been found, like that of Jethro, in which the worship of the most high had been preserved; and in some countries, particularly in Egypt and Greece, the unity of the Godhead and the immortality of the soul were taught, in contradiction to the popular religion, but with accompanying circumstances of mysterious ceremonies, and severe trials of integrity. With such exceptions, the whole world had fallen away from the knowledge of the one living and true God, and had made unto themselves Gods in the likeness of men, beasts, fishes and reptiles: others worshipped the Sun the Moon and the host of heaven. Baal and Baal Zebub, Moloch and Rephan, Ashteroth and Dagon, Jupiter and Diana and a countless multitude of Idols had usurped the altars of the Creator and father of Men. Sensuality had become a constituent of religious worship, and when the Israelites had escaped from their Egyptian bondage, it proved a wearisome and difficult task for Moses and the leaders of the tribes, to bring back the mass of the people to that purity of faith and worship, which their high destiny demanded. The sacred history abounds with the evidences of the blindness and perversity of that people during their forty years sojourn in the wilderness. Still the up-raises of their God were accomplished, and they were at length, as the people of God, brought into collision with the idolatrous inhabitants of the promised land, whom they drove out, destroyed, or brought to subjection. For a long series of years however, there was no peace nor rest in the land. By the sword they had taken possession, and by the sword they had to maintain it. Between them and their neighbors there was continual strife, and not unfrequently civil dissensions led to bitter contests and much bloodshed. It was not until David came to the throne of Israel, after having been seven years King of Judah, that the undivided powers of the whole people could be brought to bear upon their enemies. The King's first effort was to capture the strong hold of the Jebusites, which was Jerusalem. The city was carried by assault and immediately became the seat of government and the residence of the King.

Hiram, who had but recently become the King of Tyre and Sidon, sent Ambassadors to David to congratulate him, and with them a present of Cedar trees, with Carpenters and other artificers to assist him in his buildings. By their assistance, a royal palace was erected, and when the King took possession, the thought came to his mind, that the Ark of the Lord was kept under a tent, and that he ought to provide a temple for the services of religion. This design he communicated to Nathan the prophet, who at first encouraged him to proceed, but the following night was commanded to forbid it, with the assurance that God accepted his sincere intentions, praised that his Son should build a temple, and that his posterity should reign for many generations. David was a man of war, and as he was not permitted to erect the house of the Lord, he thought himself bound to subdue his enemies on every side, that when his Son came to the throne he might have the advantage of peace through all his borders. Towards the latter part of the King's life that result was attained. An immense amount of rich spoil was accumulated, and dedicated to the service of the Sanctuary.

About two years before the death of David, he committed an offence in the pride of his heart against the Lord, by causing a census of Israel to be taken. It was followed by a pestilence, which in three days swept off seventy thousand men. David humbled himself before God, and being instructed by the prophet Gad, he purchased the threshing floor of Ornan, the Jebusite, where he erected an altar, and offered sacrifices, and called upon the name of the Lord, who heard his prayer and stayed the plague. The spot whereon this altar was erected was on the hill Moriah, near to the city of Jerusalem, though probably not at that time within the walls. David afterwards purchased the whole crown of the hill as the site of the Temple. It was a place of great sanctity as the spot where Abraham had laid his son upon the altar for sacrifice. During the remainder of the King's life he made not only the necessary preparations for the erection of the house of the Lord, but in settling the number of the offices, and the manner of the daily service of those who were to attend it, and in the arrangement of all military and civil affairs of the Kingdom. He then nominated Solomon as his successor, and caused him to be inaugurated and proclaimed as King. He gave him also the plans of the temple and all its parts, gold, and silver, and brass, and iron, and wood, and marble, onyx stones, and polished stones of divers colors. Finally he gave him his admonition and advice and commended him to the congregation of Israel. And when he saw that the whole people from the chief of the fathers and the princes, to those who held meanest offices, and whosoever possessed any thing of value gave with a willing heart, David rejoiced with great joy, and blessed the Lord in language, that, as a summary of the national faith, must be noted particularly in connexion with the present argument.

"And David said, Blessed be thou Lord God of Israel our father for ever and ever."

Thine O Lord, is the greatness, and the power, and the glory, and the victory, and the majesty for all that is in heaven and in the earth is thine; Thine is the kingdom O Lord, and thou art exalted as head above all.

Both riches and honor came of thee, and thou reignest over all, and in thine hand it is to make great, and to give strength unto all.

When Solomon became King, Jerusalem had been the seat of government thirty three years, and peace and tranquillity was over all the land. All enemies had been subdued, and all the neighboring nations either paid tribute, or were on friendly terms. His rule extended to the border of Egypt to the Euphrates, his dominion surpassed that of all other men, and for his wisdom and severance in the acquisition and diffu-

Of wealth he had abundance, his commerce was extensive, he was in the bloom of manhood, and he applied himself to the increase of the glory of his Kingdom, and especially to the great work which had been committed to him by God and his father David. The wisdom of the King, and the happy state of the country shed an unprecedented joy throughout the land: his reputation soon spread into remote regions, where distance gave license to the wild imaginations of a wonder loving race, who ascribed to him not only all human knowledge but superhuman power over nature, and genii, and the spirits of the world unknown.

"And he the kingly sage, whose restless mind
Through nature's mazes wandered unconfin'd,
Who every bird and beast, and insect knew,
And spake of every plant that quaffs the dew,
To him were known—so Ilagar's offspring tell—
The powerful sigil and the starry spell,
The midnight call, hell's shadowy legions dread,
And sounds that burst the slumbers of the dead.
Hence all his might; for who could these oppose?
And Tadmor thus and Syrian Balbec rose.
Yet 'e'en the works of toiling Genii fall,
And vain was Estakhar's enchanted wall.
In frantic converse with the mournful wind,
There oft the houseless Santon rests reclined, [ears]
Strange shapes he views, and drinks with wondering
The voices of the dead, and songs of other years.
Such the faint echo of departed praise,
Still sound Arabia's legendary lays;
And thus their fabling bards delight to tell,
How lovely were thy tents, O Israel!"

It will be remembered that when David was about to erect his palace at Jerusalem, Carpenters were sent to him from Tyre. If he had had Architects of his own people this would have been rather an insult than a favor and compliment. Tyre, was at that time celebrated for the perfection of her manufactories. Homer frequently alludes to the skill of Tyrian artists, but there were others at that time in Asia, far more skilful in the Science of Architecture than the Tyrians, and I consider it more than probable, that thirty years afterward, David secured the services of those Architects, who at that time had spread themselves in companies over Syria, Persia and India. In his last charge to Solomon, after enumerating the materials he had prepared, he added, "moreover, there are workmen with thee in abundance, hewers and workers of stone and timber, and all manner of cunning men for every manner of work." That these persons were not Israelites is evident. Solomon numbered all the strangers that were in the land, and found they amounted to 153,600; and he set 70,000 to be bearers of burdens 80,000 to be hewers in the mountain, and three thousand and six hundred overseers to set the people to work. These were the remnants and descendants of the former inhabitants of the land, who were held as bondmen; and the scriptures expressly declare, that "of the children of Israel did Solomon make no servants for his work, but they were men of war, and chiefs of his captains, and captains of his Chariots and horsemen." There is no evidence that Architecture as a science had ever been cultivated in Judea, and yet here was a work to be carried on which required the exercise both of science and skill of the highest class.—And the building itself, as has been illustrated by Villalpandus and other learned Architects was constructed upon the most correct principles of the Corinthian order, varied in its details and ornaments.* I therefore think it clear that the Architects were included in David's enumeration of the "cunning men"—

In a work entitled, "The whole holy of ancient and modern Architecture," by the celebrated John Evelyn, dated 1663, may be seen the engraved illustration of the order, and the following remarks: "Behold here a kind of particular Order, but of an excellent composition, which, though I dare not affirm to have been precisely the same profile with that of Solomon's temple, (the model of which I propose to myself) yet as near as one can approach to that divine idea from its description in the bible, and some other famous histories mentioned in the great work of VILLALPANDUS, where all the ornaments and principal proportions of each member are specified, I conceive it to be sufficiently conformable. The composition is perfect Corinthian, though the foliage of the Capital and its Cavities, or branches, are of Palms, and the frieze of the Entablature have borrowed the Doric ornaments which are the Triglyphs, whose solidly bear, but little conformity with the tenderness of the Corinthian; but by whatever name you will call this order, (notwithstanding that Josephus affirms it to have been the Corinthian,) certain it is that it was never any more perfect." He afterwards calls it "the flower of Architecture, and the Order of Orders."

men of knowledge—"for every manner of work,"—whom he had provided. It must not be forgotten that amongst other things, he gave to Solomon the plans and designs of the whole building. The plan of Sanctuary and of the holy vessels had been given by Moses. But the manner in which the parts of the building were brought together and adjusted proved not only that the general plan of elevation had been prepared, but the most exact working plans, so that each stone and piece of timber without the sound of axe, hammer or any iron tool fitted into the place for which it had been prepared.

It is rather remarkable that with the exception of one name of distinguished eminence, no certain light is thrown on this subject in the Scriptures. The names of the civil and military chiefs, and of the officers of the household from the highest to the lowest are recorded—being Jews—but the foreigners, with one exception, are not named. Who then were the Architects, who were thus suddenly provided for the erection of a succession of public buildings which required twenty years to complete, and in a country where hitherto there had been no rest allowed for the cultivation of the peaceful arts? The Architects I have before mentioned as having spread themselves in Asia are known in profane history as Dionysian Architects, who emigrated from Greece to Asia Minor about the time of Saul. The arts had at that time been cultivated in Greece about 500 years, and the class referred to were men of science who carried with them wherever they went the Mysteries of Dionysius or Bacchus, supposed to have been a corruption of other Mysteries which had been introduced into Greece from Egypt. In addition to the services of this or of some such class of scientific men, Solomon added the force of 153,600 men from his own dominions, and an unenumerated auxiliary force obtained by treaty with the King of Tyre, who were engaged in cutting and rafting timber from Lebanon to Joppa. The King of Tyre also sent to Solomon at his request a man of most extraordinary genius and skill, whom he describes as "Hiram of our fathers, a cunning man endowed with understanding. The son of a woman of the daughters of Dan, and his father was a man of Tyre, skilful to work in gold and in silver, in brass, in iron, in stone and in timber, in purple, in blue, and in fine linen, and in crimson; also to grave any manner of graving, and to find out any device which may be put to him with thy cunning men, and with the cunning men of David thy father." Here I understand the distinction to be particularly noted, between the men of genius amongst the servants of Solomon, and those whom David his father had introduced into the country for the sake of their science, and this HIRAM is recommended by the Tyrian King as equal to any of them, and able and worthy to conduct any part of the work which Solomon might entrust to him.

I am aware that these details are somewhat tedious and that they may not be in themselves particularly interesting, but I have considered them essential to my argument and could not well abridge them. In relation to the progress of the work I can add nothing to the Scripture history, which is in every body's hands, without encroaching on the traditions of our order.—The craftsmen were organized and the work went on, and it was during the erection of the Temple that King Solomon instituted the Mysteries of Masonry.—There was a lively sense of religious duty throughout the land, and a zeal to make proselytes, which, indeed prevailed long after the people had become exceedingly corrupt and the spirit of their religion was almost extinct. But at a time when the King and the whole nation were full of enthusiasm, in the cause of their religious faith and worship, it is not to be doubted that all means were used to enlighten the strangers who were engaged in the erection of the house of the Lord, and it would be unreasonable to believe, that, contrary to the natural and invincible power of truth upon the minds of intelligent men, they should have been employed seven years upon that great work, hearing daily the evidences of the dealings of God with his people and not abandon their false and idolatrous worship and believe with their whole hearts in the ever living and true God. To seal the work of conversion from Paganism to the simple faith of the Israelite, a bond of fraternity was instituted and a series of rites and ceremonies established, founded upon the science of Geometry and Architecture in which the great and fundamental principles of religion and moral duty were to be taught to whoever was found worthy wheresoever that fraternity might wander on the face of the whole earth, in the practice of their profession. The rites and ceremonies then established, with their practical results remain unchanged in any essential particular to the present day in charge of our fraternity, and are as they ever have been the great bond of union and friendship amongst enlightened men of every clime, and of every political opinion, and religious creed, in which that fundamental principle of religion is recognised, there is but one true and living GOD, who made all things, and to whom all men are accountable.

THE MURDER OF DARNLEY.

When Mary left him, Darnley called Crawford to him, and informing him fully of all that had passed at the interview, bade him communicate it to his father, the Earl of Lennox. He then asked him what he thought of the Queen's taking him to Craigmiller? She treats your Majesty, said Crawford, too like a prisoner. Why should you not be taken to one of your own houses in Edinburg? It struck me much the same way, answered Darnley, and I have fears enough, but may God judge between us, I have her promise only to trust to; but I have put myself in her hands, and I shall go with her though she should murder me. It is from Crawford's evidence, taken on oath, which was afterwards produced, and still exists, endorsed by Cecil, that we learn these minute particulars, nor have I been able to discover any sufficient ground to doubt its truth. Soon after this interview, the Queen carried her husband, by slow journeys, from Glasgow to Edinburg, where she arrived on the last day of January. It had been at first intended, as we have seen, that Darnley should have taken up his residence at Craigmiller, but this purpose was changed, and as the Palace of Holyrood was judged from its low situation to be unhealthy, and little fitted for an invalid, the King was brought to a suburb called the Kirk of Field, a more remote and airy site, occupied by the town residence of the Duke of Chagtelherault, and other buildings and gardens. On their arrival here the royal attendants were about to proceed to the Dukes lodging, as it was called, but on alighting, Mary informed them that the King's apartments were to be in an adjoining house, which stood beside the town wall, not far from a ruinous Dominican monastery, called Black Friars. To this place she led Darnley, and making every allowance for the rudeness of the domestic accommodations of these times, it appears to have been an insecure and confined mansion. Its proprietor was Robert Balfour, a brother of Sir James Balfour, whom we have already known as a deviser of a bond for the murder, which was drawn up at Craigmiller, and then a dependent of Bothwell's. This Earl, whose influence was now nearly supreme at Court, had recently returned from Liddesdale; and when he understood that Mary and the King were on the road from Glasgow, he met them with his attendants, a short way from the capital, and accompanied the party to the Kirk of Field. At this moment the reconciliation between the Queen and her husband appeared to be complete. She assiduously superintended every little detail which could add to his comfort. She treated him not only with attention but tenderness, passed much of the day in his society, and had a chamber prepared for herself immediately below his, where she slept.

On Sunday, the 9th of February, Bastian, a foreigner belonging to the household of the Queen, was to be married at Holyrood. The bride was of her favorite women, and Mary, to honor their union, had promised them a masque. The greatest part of that day she passed with the king. They appeared to be on the most affectionate terms, and she declared her intention of remaining all night at the Kirk of Field. It was at this moment, when Darnley and the Queen were engaged in conversation, that Mary of Talloo, Hepburn of Bolton, and other ruffians, whom Bothwell had hired for the purpose, secretly entered the chamber which was under the King's and deposited on the floor a large quantity of gun powder in bags. They then laid a train, which was connected with a "lunt," or slow match, and placed every thing in readiness for its being lighted. Some of them now hurried away, but two of the conspirators remained on the watch, and in the meantime Mary, who still sat with her husband in the upper chamber, recollected her promise of giving the masque at Bastian's wedding and taking a farewell of Darnley, embraced him and left the house with her suite. Soon after the king retired to his bed-chamber. Since his illness there appeared to be a great change in him. He had become more thoughtful, and sorrow and thought had brought with it repentance of his former courses. He lamented there were few near him whom he could trust, and at times he would say, that he should be slain, complaining that he was hardly dealt with, but from these thoughts he had sought refuge in religion; and it was remarked that on this night, his last in this world, he had repeated the 55th Psalm, which he would often read and sing. After his devotion he went to bed and fell asleep, Taylor, his page, being beside him in the same apartment. This was the moment seized by the murderers, who still lurked in the lower room, to complete their dreadful purpose, but their miserable victim was awakened by the noise of their false keys in the lock of his apartment, and rushing down in his shirt and pelisse, endeavored to make his escape, but he was intercepted and strangled after a desperate resistance, his cries for mercy being heard by some women in the nearest house: the page was also strangled and their bodies carried into a small orchard, without the garden wall, where they were found, the king in his shirt only, and the pelisse by his side. Amid the conflicting stories of the ruffians who were executed, it is difficult to arrive at the whole truth. But no doubt rested on the part acted by Bothwell, the arch-conspirator. He had quitted the king's apartment with the Queen, and joined the festivities in the palace, from which about midnight he stole away, changed his rich dress, and rejoined the murderers who waited for him at the Kirk of Field. His arrival was the signal to complete their purpose; the match was lighted but burnt too slow for their breathless impatience, and they were stealing forward to examine it, when it took effect. A loud noise, like the bursting of a thundercloud, awoke the sleeping city—the king's house was torn in pieces and cast into the air, and the assassins, hurrying from the spot, under the cover of darkness, regained the palace.—Tyler's Scotland.

MISCELLANY.

MARRIAGE OF THE QUEEN REGENT OF SPAIN.

Two months after death of Ferdinand VII. the Queen Regent became acquainted with the garde du corps Munoz, who came to the palace with his comrade Nicolas Franco, who carried on an intrigue with Donna Teresa Valcarel, the milliner, and confidential favorite of the Queen. Munoz was the son of a shop-keeper at Tarazona, and had narrowly escaped being dismissed from his regiment in 1832, on suspicion of being a Carlist. Christina did not dare at once to disclose her passions for Munoz, but planned a romantic journey for that purpose. She resolved to take advantage of the week that Munoz was on duty at the palace, and to visit her country house at Quita Pesares. On the 17th December 1833, during a most severe season, she sat out at day-light, but was obliged to return her carriage having broken down in the mountains, in consequence of the snow, which rendered the road impassible. That night she sent laborers to clean the road, and on the morning of the 18th, she set out again to the great astonishment of her household, none of the ladies in waiting having been permitted to accompany her. She was accompanied by Don Francisco Palafox, Aide-de-Camp General of the Guard, her Gentleman Usher Carbonelle, and Munoz.—When the Queen arrived at Quita Pesares, she walked in the gardens with Palafox and Munoz, but she sent Palafox to execute a commission, and remained alone with the latter. This no doubt, was the opportunity sought for making the declaration, as appears from what followed. The same day the Queen returned to Madrid, and the favor enjoyed by the garde du corps Munoz, became manifest to every one. He was appointed Gentleman of the Interior, an office created by the late king, and which did not appear necessary for a Queen. The favorite was presented with a house magnificently furnished, and a splendid equipage, by the Queen's orders. In a few days after he was seen to wear the diamond ornaments of Ferdinand VII, and an apartment in the palace was allotted to him. He died with the Queen; he accompanied her every where and attended her alone in her carriage. They even went together to review the National Guard at the Prado. This increased the scandal which was already public, and allusion was made to it in the public journals. The Chronique of the 4th of February, 1834, the 40th day of the royal amours, inserted the following paragraph: "Yesterday her Majesty took an airing in an open char a-banc, driven by one of her servants. The Duke of Alagon, Captain of the Guards, attended her." This paragraph was read with avidity by her attendants at the Palace, because the servant alluded to was Munoz.

The Queen demanded satisfaction for this insult, and having a cringing minister, like Martinez de la Rosa, and the chief of police, like Latra, journal was despotically suppressed, and the two editors exiled. The Queen's love for her new favorite was reproved by religion, and after some days, she signified her intention to Munoz to marry him. Munoz thought it was a dream, but when he found how fortune smiled on him he set about realizing the Queen's wish. He had but few acquaintances, but it happened that an obscure priest from his town happened to be at that moment at Madrid. Munoz applied to him, and offered to procure him advancement if he would marry him to the Queen, who could not trust any of the clergymen of the royal chapel. How to enable him to procure, a license was then the difficulty. The patriarch refused to grant one and so did the Bishop of Cuenca.—The Queen then applied to Cardinal Tiberi, who granted the license on receiving an autograph letter from the Royal bride. At 7 o'clock in the morning of 28th of December, ten days after they became acquainted, the marriage of Donna Maria Christina de Bourbon, with Don Fernand Munoz, was celebrated by the priest Don Marcos Antonio Gonzales, and in the presence of the witnesses Don Minguet Lopez Acabado, and the Marquis of Hereros. The Queen opened the Cortes on the 24th of June. On the 16th of November, 1834, she was delivered of an infant, which was baptized Gertrude Magna Victoria, and her recovery was so rapid that in nine days after, she reviewed the 2d squadron of the Guards, which was going to fight in Navarre for her eldest daughter. The same night the infant was conveyed from the palace by the physician and placed under the care of trusty servants at Segovia. The year following the same acts and the same scenes were repeated.

On the 17th of May, 1835, a royal ordinance was issued, dispensing with the ceremony of kissing hands through condescension, it was said, for those persons who were presented at court. At the palace it was understood to mean something else. The Queen and Munoz went every evening to the country house at Quita Pesares, and at the same time the infant was brought from Segovia. This daily interview, and the expensive train of Victoria's nurse, rendered the royal maternity so notorious that the very children used to call Victoria the Queen's daughter. The same autumn the Queen gave birth to a male infant, which was conveyed with its sister to Paris. During the events which took place at La Granja, in 1836, Munoz was, with difficulty, saved from the hands of the populace, by concealing him in some private cellars.—Since that time Munoz has not been seen in public with the Queen. Such constant intimacy could not be concealed, and the ministers thought it their duty to address the Queen on the subject, but Garelley and Zareo del Valle, who made some overtures on the reports circulated were quickly dismissed. The marriage of the Queen with Munoz has caused incredible injury to the Spanish nation. The innocent Isabella neither knows how to read or write, and the society which surrounded her was of the most improper description. The marriage of Ferdinand's widow once proved, it is evident that she is no longer competent to act as guardian to the Queen Isabella. The laws have declared that the mother who marries a second time cannot retain the guardianship of the children of her first husband.

FATE OF THE APOSTLES.

St. Mathew.—This apostle and evangelist is supposed to have suffered martyrdom, or was slain with a sword at the city of Etheopia.

St. Mark.—This evangelist was dragged through the streets of Alexandria, in Egypt, until he expired.

St. Luke.—This evangelist was hanged upon an Olive tree in Greece.

St. John.—This apostle and evangelist was put into a cauldron of boiling oil, at Rome, and escaped death. He afterwards died a natural death at Ephesus, Asia.

St. Peter.—This apostle was crucified at Rome, with his head downwards, by his own request, thinking himself unworthy to die in the same posture and manner as his blessed master.

St. James, the Great.—This apostle was beheaded at Jerusalem.

St. James, the less.—This apostle was thrown from a pinnacle, or wing of the temple, and beaten to death with a fuller's club.

St. Phillip.—This apostle was hanged up against a pillar at Hierapolis, a city of Phrygia.

St. Bartholemew.—This apostle was flayed alive by the command of a barbarous king.

St. Paul.—This apostle was beheaded at Rome, by the tyrant Nero.—Frederic Visitor.

THE SILK WORM.—How does the moth of the silk worm get out of the cocoon? This question has been frequently asked, and some have supposed that the little miller, as it is sometimes called, eats its way out; but it is utterly without truth, having no other mouth than a very slender bill, like that of other butterflies. Naturalists now tell us, that immediately at the mouth of the insect there is a small sack, into which it secretes one drop of very sharp and corrosive acid. At the time for the escape of the little animal, this sack bursts, and the acid destroys the fibre of all the silk which it touches, and thus makes a hole, through which the moth creeps into the open air. Is this arrangement the effect of mere chance?—New Orleans Crescent.

MARRIAGE BROKERS.—In Genoa there are marriage brokers, who have pocket books filled with names of the marriageable girls of the different classes, with notes of their figures, personal attractions, fortunes, &c. These brokers go about endeavoring to arrange connections; and when they succeed, they get a commission of two or three per cent, upon the portion.—Marriage at Genoa is quite a matter of calculation, generally settled by the parents or relations, who often draw up the contract before the parties have seen one another; and it is only when every thing else is arranged, and a few days previous to the marriage ceremony, that the future husband is introduced to his intended partner for life. Should he find fault with her manners or appearance, he may break off the match, on condition of his defraying the brokerage, and any other expenses incurred.

A NEW DRINK.—"Mr. Guzzlefunk, I have discovered a new drink for you. Suppose you try a little."

"Well, I don't care if I do [drinks.] It hasn't got a very bad taste to it; and if my memory serves me right, it is what they call water. I recollect drinking some of the stuff when I was a lad."—Louisville Journal.

Admission of Florida.—The Tallahassee Floridian of the 4th ult., says Florida will probably be admitted into the Union at the coming session of Congress.

STORIES OF THE IRISH PEASANTRY.

BY MRS. S. C. HALL.

"Mind not high things: but condescend to men of low estate."
ST. PAUL.

TOO EARLY WED!

"It's what I wanted to spake to yer honor about," said Sandy Donovan, who had entered my cousin's breakfast-room, and made her his best bow; "it's what I wanted, my lady, is the lend of a loan of two-and-sixpence, if it would be plasing to ye; and I'll work it out in any way convenient—either in going messages to the squire, or any where else in the three kingdoms at a moment's notice; or taking a hand at the knives, when Mither Langan, or Mike, or the footboy himself, has no mind to be dirting their hands wid their work and yer honor wanting them to be clane before the quality; or driving the cows home, if the ould cow-boy would be sick, or 'overtaken,' which will happen to any, let alone a boy of his years; or—but to be sure," added Sandy, after a pause, as if to give weight to some peculiarly onerous service he was about to proffer—"to be sure, yer honor nor the mather are never in trouble, that way, like yer neighbors—if you war, bedad! there isn't a boy in the barony would bate the bailiffs wid grater joy than myself!"—and Sandy's eyes brightened, and his hand grasped more firmly the handle of his good shillala: he looked what he really was, a fine handsome gay-hearted "boy" of about nineteen—certainly not twenty.

"Well, Sandy" replied my cousin, smiling. "I will lend you the half-crown and you shall repay it me, not in labor—for I require my servants to do their own work—but in money."

"Och, ma'am dear, that's hard upon me entirely. I'd rather work it out."

"But isn't your time your money? Cannot you sell that time to some other person, and discharge your debt out of the produce?"

"I'm no scholar, my lady," he replied, twisting his shoulders, "but I'd rather work it out."

"We will speak of that by and bye," said my cousin; "you must pay me twopence a week, and tell me what you want with the half-crown."

"Well, God bless you, my lady, I'm a made man: I'll pay it at the twopence, though I'd rather work it out, supposing even it came to the double."

My cousin smiled at me significantly, for we had often talked of the impossibility of making an Irishman consider time as a commodity of value; and then she asked him, "Well, Sandy, and now tell me what you want with it?"

Sandy Donovan twirled his hat between his thumbs looked down upon the carpet, and hemmed twice. I perceived at once the state of the case, for he blushed deeply. With the natural quickness of an Irishman, he saw I understood the matter; and turning to me, said, "if you please, my lady, tell the mistress, for I see you're insensed into it already."

"Sandy's in love!"

"I have known that for some time," answered my cousin, "and with the gate-keeper's daughter. But what has that to do with the half-crown?"

My cousin is one of those amiable, excellent persons who born, though not brought up in the country, loving it also with the warmth of Irish love, can no more comprehend an Irishman's nature, than can those who having paid a visit of two weeks to Dublin, and the county Wicklow, return with a self-satisfied conviction that they are fully acquainted with the habits, manners, and feelings of the Irish nation.

"Is it what has it to do with the half-crown, my lady?" repeated poor Sandy, to my infinite amusement; "why, thin, just every thing in life sure; it's to help pay Father Garratty for marrying us, my lady! We've made up the money all to that, mistress dear, and we didn't, that's I didn't, know what to do at all about it, until I thought I'd make bould with you, madam, that can feel for us."

"Me feel for you!" exclaimed my cousin indignantly; "how could you fancy that?"

"Just, ma'am, the remembrance of your own young days, that to be sure you don't look past yet, long life to you, and the mather's too, when, as I have heard tell, you thought the great battle of Waterloo put betwixt you both for ever, and he kilt at it, though he's so hearty now; and sure if the want of the half-crown put betwixt me and Lucy Hackett, it would be as bad to us as the battle of Waterloo."

I never asked my cousin which of the two topics Sandy touched upon had softened her most—the sly compliment to her youthful looks, or the allusion to the "great battle" where her beloved husband had played a distinguished part. Certainly her after-observation had lost all asperity.

"Well, but, Sandy, what provision have you made for this new state of matrimony?"

"Provision is it my lady?" answered Sandy, with another turn of his hat; "we've lots of love, mistress dear; it'll hold out till the grave shuts over us, I'll go bail for that."

"But, Sandy, you can't live on love?"

"It's cruel, poor living without it—that I know, ma'am, any way," he replied right readily.

"But there will be two to feed instead of one at your father's; for Lucy cannot long continue at the lodge."

"Nor doesn't want, ma'am—I've built her a cabin off the corner of my father's three acres, and there's a few sticks in it already. She's no great eater, and the pratees are cheap enough, thank God!"

"But by and bye, you will have more than two to feed."

"Plase God," was Sandy's quiet reply.

"Sandy," I said, "I am sure your choice is a good one; Lucy is a pretty, cheerful, industrious little girl, not yet eighteen, I think—too young to take the heavy cares of peasant life upon her. I will not say she will change, because that is what Irish women seldom do; but I must say you are laying the foundation of certain misery, both for herself and yourself, by not waiting until you have something begin life with."

"Ah, thin, ma'am dear, it's a shame for ye to be evenin' sorrow to a bridegroom."

"You even it, as you call it, to yourself, Sandy; look there!" I pointed from the window to a beggar woman who was coming up the lawn, followed by a troop of children. "Look there! how would you like to bring the light-hearted fond girl you love to a fate like that? And yet such are the effects of very early marriages, combined with, or rather the first step to imprudence. You are both young; labor in your several vocations for five or six years; you have much to love and labor for; and at the end of that period, by God's blessing on your industry, you'll have something to begin with—enough to furnish a cabin comfortably, and a short purse to defray first expenses."

"But, ma'am dear, sure we can work as well together, and get the comfortable cabin and the short purse aither."

"No—you will not have the same motives; circumstances will bend you down. If Lucy becomes the mother of children at so early an age, her exertions will be cramped."

"She'd work the better," interrupted Sandy.

"She would be, as all Irish women are, the most affectionate mother in the world; but, marrying so young, old age will come upon her prematurely. Her eyes will grow dim, and her hair turn grey before her time; her bodily strength must fail; and what woman can knit or spin, or sew for hire, with a tribe of little half-starved children round her feet? It is not too late to change your resolution. I will see Lucy; I will reason with her; I know she will wait for you. Work on singly a little longer. She will be your reward; and, believe me, such a prudential course will render your future life prosperous and happy."

"What can a young man save out of tinpence or a shilling a-day, my lady?" said Sandy.

"What could he spare at that rate for the support of a wife, what for the support of a family of children?"

"Bedad!" answered Sandy, twisting his shoulders, his invariable practice when in a hobble, "Bedad! I don't know; only they all does the same, and sure we'll be no worse off than our neighbors."

"But Lucy, poor pretty Lucy, who has been more tenderly brought up than her neighbours; surely,

Sandy, you would not wish to bring her into trouble?"

"Poverty I may bring her to:—God help us ma'am there's none of us made up against that; but I'll work my fingers to the bone to keep her from trouble. I'll own she's too good for me; though that's not her own thought. But I'll say this: sorra a boy in the town land will make a better husband, let the other be who he may. Sure, ma'am, there's nothing in the poverty you think of, to frighten us. We've been looking at it ever since we were born more or less. We get used to it, in these parts."

"You bring it on ourselves. Nothing keeps down either young man or woman so much as a tribe of infants before there is any thing to give them."

"Bedad, so it does," replied the young man, with the most perfect composure; "but how can we help it?—the craythurs ax nothing but pratees and salt, and grow up fine men and women on it, that flog the world for beauty."

In fact, in no shape could we place poverty so as to render her aspect more hideous than he knew it to be; but his naturally gay spirit rose against the idea that either Lucy or he was doomed to encounter it; or if they were, he laid his thoughts upon the favorite phrase of those who are not able to help themselves, "We'll get over it by the help of God!" or, "We'll not be worse off than our neighbors," or, "Something'll turn up for good." Sometimes he would parry my argument by wit, sometimes by laughter—always respectful, yet merry laughter; and so, seeing he was determined upon an early marriage, and consequent poverty, I resolved to appeal to Lucy.

"She's a great fool," said her grandmother at the lodge, who had brought her up; "but if the worst come to the worst, she'll be no worse off than her neighbors." Here was a pretty argument in favor of misery, by one who was old enough to have known better. "She'll sup sorrow for it I daresay, but we all have our taste of it one way or other." Lucy was all smiles and tears. Sandy and she had learnt out of the same "Read-a-made-easy" at school; they had gone to their "duty" together. She had been promised to him, and no thought of any one else had ever come across her heart. She was willing to wait for him till the day of her death, only, may be, for any thing she could tell, it would be the same thing in five years as it was then—there was nothing to make it better—and the ould loved each other the more who spent their sunny days together. I knew full well there is comparatively little misery caused among the lower classes in Ireland by the want of connubial affection. Cottage trouble has its sweet consoling drop of love in the bottom of every cup of sorrow. Lucy seemed prepared for both. She did not attempt to deny that she loved Sandy, it "was so natural to love him; she never had a brother, and he had been more than a brother to her since she was the height of a rose bush." I could not look on the young beauty—so fair, so truthful; so earnest, so bright—without a feeling of deep grief, for I could not but anticipate what was to follow. She had not even the ambition which characterises the young English bride in the same sphere of life; she knew that poverty would be her dower, but she had made up her mind to encounter it with him she loved. "Her uncle," she said, "had promised them half an acre, or may be more, by and bye, and then they'd do 'bravely.'" "Why not wait for it?" "And sure we must wait for it," she replied, with great naviete, "for he won't give it to us now." In her quiet modest way, Lucy, was as firm as Sandy. "You perceive," said my cousin, "persons who seek to intimidate them by pointing out the miseries of poverty, fail; they see it so often that they yield to rather than withstand it, or sometimes rather than avoid it, if the means of avoiding it disturbs their preconceived opinions."

"They are always acting from impulse rather than reason; they run into danger, and then ask you how they might have kept out of it," said I, sadly provoked with those foolish young persons.

"It is easy to see how it will end," observed my cousin.

"Can't you give them a little land to begin on?"

"My dear friend, if we were to give land to all the silly youths who marry without the prospect of even potato food from one day to another, we should not have an acre left for ourselves. These early marriages are sources of the great evils of Ireland, and can never be prevented, as long as the peasantry have no ambition to elevate themselves in the scale of society by means of better clothes, and better dwellings than they generally possess. A man who is satisfied that his wife should beg while he reaps the English harvests, and that his children should go barefoot, cannot raise himself."

"But he is not so satisfied," I said; "necessity compels it."

"A necessity induced," observed my quiet cousin, "BY BEING TOO EARLY WED." She was quite right. I have heard of cases where absolute boys and girls have been wedded parents; and it is no uncommon thing to meet a grandfather in the very prime of life. I would not be thought an advocate for restraining, except to very reasonable bounds, the greatest blessing which the Almighty bestows upon his creatures—the power to be happy by making another happy. But I would have my humble fellow-countrymen and country women more duly reflect before they adopt a course upon which nearly all, if not all the comfort, and I may add integrity of their after lives must depend. If marriage has its consolations in adversity, and its endearments in prosperity, courtship also hath both, besides a greater proportion of that which is the strongest and truest stimulus to exertion—HOPES! It excites also to economy, prudence, and sobriety, by a continual manifestation of their utility in bringing nearer the consummation of a dearly cherished purpose; money will be saved, when an object is directly to be achieved by saving; labor will be undertaken with cheerfulness, when its recompense is clearly and distinctly seen; and, in short, the future will be perpetually in the eye, in the mind, and in the heart. On the other hand, poverty—too often the parent of sin—is always an effectual barrier against social improvement; prudence is shut out, when its beneficial influence is only remotely anticipated; and those who find it difficult to procure the necessities, never think of searching out the comforts, of life. My design, however, is to exhibit and illustrate evils less by precept than example; many will listen to a story who slumber over a sermon; and a picture may be made to speak more eloquently than words.

Five years had elapsed between the scene I have endeavored to describe, and my once again visiting my native land; and greatly rejoiced was I once more to feel its bright green grass beneath my footsteps, to hear the music of its birds and rivers, and meet the welcome of bright eyes and warm hearts of many who had known me in childhood. During even so short a period, England had been galloping onwards to perfection; Ireland, I saw, had been creeping—and that is something—towards it also. Schools had been established, where education had never before been heard of; gardens had expanded around many cottages; the Sabbath day was more respected and hallowed than of old; and the dress both of men and women was neater and in better order. I certainly fancied beggars were on the increase, but this must have been only fancy. The truth was, I came from a land where they are comparatively unknown, and had almost forgotten how crowded my poor country always was with poverty-stricken creatures, who are unable to provide for themselves the commonest food or the coarsest apparel. Dublin is a solitary-looking city.—The magnificence of its noble buildings badly accords with the emptiness of the broad streets. There is an air of desolation in its high ways, a loneliness in its most public places;

"'Tis Greece, but living Greece no more."

It was a fine moonlight evening and we had spent it with some friends residing in that immense square called Stephen's Green. We were walking homewards; and whatever cheerfulness we had imbibed under the hospitable roof of our host was effectually dispersed by the shivering and half-starved creatures who asked our charity with an importunity which only their civility prevented from being offensive. One slight creature—a child clinging to her cloak, another slung at her back, and one resting on her bosom—had followed us nearly to the corner of Grafton-st. not begging with her tongue, but appealing to our feelings by many outward tokens of misery.

"If you want charity," said I, "why do you not ask it?"

"We are all dying for want of food," was the reply;

and the voice, though I did not immediately remember to whom it belonged, thrilled through me like a strain of long forgotten music.

"I have not tasted food all day," she continued leaning against a projecting shop shutter, "for wet my lips except with water; have mercy on me, for I am very young, and not used to begging."

"I believe you," I replied, for I had by that time recognised her voice; "I believe you; your name is Lucy Donovan." Poor, poor Lucy! She threw the hood back from her wasted features; she would have fallen on her knees at my feet, if I had not prevented her; her soft hair was matted across her brows; tears coursed each other down her cheeks; her nose was pinched by starvation; her lips, blue and trembling, could hardly give forth her thoughts—her prayers, I should rather say—for she appeared for a time to have forgotten her misery in the joy occasioned by the sight of a friend.

"To think, my lady, of my seeing you here!—and I conning over in my own mind yours, and the mistress's warning about, being too early married, it was the ruin of us all out sure enough; the childer came so fast, and nothing to give 'em. This is little Sandy, ma'am, the moral of his father; only you can't see him, the moonbeams are so pale. And the one at my back little Thomas, after my poor father. Ain't I thankful that he never lived to see me in this trouble! And this little hungry girl is Anty, after my grandmother; sure I'm glad she's in heaven, too. Ah, ma'am, honey, a young living heart must suffer a dale of sorrow before it blesses the grave for closing over, and the red worm for destroying, the things it loved more than life."

"Come to me to-morrow morning, Lucy," I said, "and we will see what can be done for you." I pressed a small donation and my address into her hand.

"I can't be out in daylight," she whispered; "I'll come at night—I've no clothes—nothing but the cloak left."

My English readers may believe this tale: it is no fiction; it is perfectly true; true, without an atom of exaggeration. The young mother had parted with every article of clothing she possessed in the world, except the thin blue-hooded cloak, in which she enshrouded her misery and starvation; under its feeble protection she begged at night. I mentioned the circumstance to the lady at whose house we were residing. She assured me it was a fact of no uncommon occurrence.

The next night Lucy came with her children. We had provided something for her in the way of clothes. "Won't you put on these shoes, Lucy?" "I thank you, my lady," she replied, while one of her old smiles brightened up her face; "I'll take them since ye're so good; but it's a bad fashion to be tendering my feet up with shoes, they're used to the stones now, poor things. And so best—"

Where is Sandy, Lucy?—I cannot believe he has deserted you."

God bless you for that right thought my lady.—He has not; he was forced to leave me, but that wasn't deserting me. You see, ma'am, afther we married we got on very well for a bit; and the earnest true-hearted love we ever and always had for each other, held out wonderful; and I was not over strong, and poor Sandy took to working after hours, which every body knew he need not have done had he been single. But, any way, that brought on the fever. The fever, my lady, and this little Sandy, came together, before, indeed," she added, with her usual simplicity, "we were ready for either—to say ready; and then, between nursing the husband and nursing the child, when I got up I had my hands full, and we both so young, and no experience. To be sure the poor neighbors helped us. They gave us a share of all they had, even to a handful of meal or a stone of potatoes; and the hardest word they ever spoke was, 'God direct you, ye poor young craythurs; ye married too soon.'—Your cousin, ma'am, is a fine lady, and a good lady, but she put me ever and always in mind of how much better I might have been off had I remained single, which was true enough; and while my poor husband lay so bad entirely, the bitter taste of my folly was never off my lips. But when it pleased God, he grew better; and when I saw him once more able to raise his head to the sun, and notice the baby, I forgot a dale of the bitterness, and thought it might pass away altogether. But it never did. If a young bird gets a hurt, my lady, in the nest, it never rightly recovers it. It was so with us. We began poor—we bargained for that; but the sickness that's born of poverty came on the top of it, and they both together crushed us. Well, ma'am dear, the gentleman where he worked when he got up again, took great pleasure in foreign parts, and could not afford to pay so many laborers, and Sandy was discharged. It's a poor case, ma'am when the money scraped up in one country is taken clane away to spend in another. Sandy could have made out life alone, but another poor little babe had a mind to come into the world; so I could do nothing to help him. My grandmother (heaven be her bed!) was called from us, and she left me what she had to leave. Your cousin, my lady, said it would have been a fine thing to have had it if we were beginning life, but, coming in the middle of our trouble, when we war over and over in debt, it did us but little good, and melted away, like salt in rain, before we knew where it was. I've no blame to give to any: the neighbors war wonderful kind. My husband's father did all he could; but what could he do. My husband was the eldest of eleven, who had to be reared on three acres of land, one of which was not good enough for goose grazing. I could have got plenty of knitting, and spinning, and sewing, and straw-bonnet making, but my hands war tied with the two childer; and it pleased God to take the second in small pox. It was a heart trouble to us then; and I thought the father would have broken his heart after it. The neighbors said it was well for us it was called, but somehow it's lonesome to want a baby's smile, or laugh, or even its cry when you are used to it, and have little else to comfort you;" and, despite her misery, the mother's eyes filled with tears, and little Sandy saw them, and he lifted up his dirty face to kiss her; the never exhausted mine of Irish affection was already at work in the boy's heart. "We struggled on, and this babe was born. We had been put above the world, in regard of debt, by my grandmother's death; and one morning Sandy said, 'It's no use slaving on and starving as we're doing, Lucy, I had an offer yesterday when I was driving Ah Leary's creels; and if you've the heart to hear it, I'll tell it ye.' And I clenched my hands, and set my teeth, as if it were death I expected for I guessed that his mind was set on foreign parts. But I didn't gainsay him, though I was right. He promised to send me word, and money to bring me and the childer out to him, and I waited at home; and three months after he went, this last craythur was born."

"To add to your trouble,"

"No," she answered, pressing it to her bosom; "it helped me to put the trouble over; it has the very eyes and smile of my poor Sandy."

"How foolish," I thought, "it is to attempt to sound the depth of woman's love! What fine feelings there were beneath that cloak—crushed by circumstances that must ever crush those who without any provision, too early wed!" "At last," she continued, "I grew ashamed to stay longer in my own place; I couldn't beg there—I could not go there, from door to door, or stop those I met to ask for food or half-pence. I locked up the door of the cabin, put the key in the thatch, lest word with a neighboring woman that they could send to his uncle near Dublin any letter that came from him, and begged my way here. The poor always helped me on my journey, and I was easier moving from place to place—it seemed as though I was getting nearer Sandy; but I've had no letter; those more used to this life than me, get more than I do—I pray instead of beg. Bit by bit, I lost every screed of clothes. But my worst trouble is, that my early marriage has brought these darlins into a world of trouble, from which I have no power to deliver them; and though I have loved to look at them, yet, often, my dear lady, when I have seen them staggering with hunger, I could have knelt in the cold snow, and cursed my folly. Wicked thoughts have come into my head then, and I have had no peace until I prayed to God to cool my poor burning brow, and clane the badness from my heart. I have one hope still—he may die—but he never will forget us. If we can live over the present time, a letter may come; but the weakness is upon my heart when I think either of fresh joy or more sorrow. I walked the length of Stephen's Green after yer to-morrow last night, but the dryness of my parched throat hindered me from speaking. Since yer ladyship spoke to me last night, I've had fresh hope, but, somehow, I'm afeard to hope for afther it trouble comes stronger. I've not been able to go afther a letter to his uncle's; I've been ashamed; but, plase God, there's no need of that now, the Lord reward ye all! though it's more than we deserve. Who knows—there may be comfort for us yet." She smiled, but there was a ghastliness in the smile that made me shudder; it was the smile of a corse, rather than of a living woman.—The poor infants devoured the food we gave them; and when they were, satisfied, she ate but not till then; nothing could exceed her gratitude; the past seemed almost forgotten, after her story was told—a story of simple suffering, with no strong incident to rivet the attention, no powerful event to work upon the imagination—nothing but a tale of Irish misery, brought on, not by misconduct, but a want of that carefulness, that "long headedness," which makes the Irish peasant a beggar, and the simple possession of which lays the foundation of Scotch and English independence. My story, if so it may be called, is not finished.

Lucy had been worn to a skeleton by anxiety and starvation. I saw she could not live; our succor came too late; she was dying—dying at the very age when, if she had followed our advice, she might have married in sure anticipation of happiness, and with a reasonable prospect of prosperity. I went to see her; for little Sandy had told me, with tearful eyes, "that though mammy had plenty to eat, and new milk to drink, she was too sick to come out." She was lingering in that hectic fever which scorches up, by slow degrees, the moisture of existence; the baby, too, was dying. "I am sure," said she, "there is a letter from Sandy at his uncle's." I found out the place; she was right. How she screamed, and how her skeleton fingers quivered, when she saw it! "I knew if he was in life, he would not forget us," she said.

The poor fellow was full of hope, and though his feelings were roughly expressed, they were there warm from his affectionate but imprudent heart; the next letter was to bring money—but a little, ye some; and the one after would bring them all out to him. And she heard all this; and at first, while I read the flush was bright on her cheek, and then it faded; and she called little Sandy, and said, "You hear—it is from your own daddy, my boy; and then I thought a slight convulsion moved her features. She grasped the poor soiled paper, the record of his affection; pressed it to her lips; another convulsion; her fingers stiffened round it—SHE WAS DEAD!

The Present Pope of Rome.—The title of the present pope is Gregory XVI; his name, Mauro Cappellari. He was born in the year 1765, in the Venetian States. Leo XII. was succeeded by Pius VII, who after a reign of eight months, was succeeded in 1830, by Cappellari, under the title of Gregory XVI. His present age is seventy-five, but his appearance indicates great vigor of constitution.

Oxalic Acid.—It may be important to mention, especially in this suicide-living age, that two ounces of magnesia, mixed with about a quart of water, or the same quantity of common whiting, thrown into the stomach, by any means, (stomach pump being the readiest and most preferable on such occasions,) will effectually neutralize and render inert this most active poison.

LITERARY.

BIOGRAPHICAL ANNUAL.—Edited by R. W. Griswold—This book which is promised to the public in the course of a few days, we conceive will be right welcome. It is to contain memorials of Van Rensselaer, Dunlop, Buel, Flint, Van Schaick, Thatcher, and in short all the eminent dead of the last two years. Besides the numerous contributions of its editor there will be others from the pens of Dean Bryant, Tuckerman, Bloodgood, Greely, Inman, &c. &c. The universal interest that this book is calculated to convey, warrants us in anticipating for it an extensive sale.

ENSENORE.—A poem of considerable interest—well designed, and what is better—is truly American in subject. It is the production of P. H. Myers.

LECTURES.—This bids fair to be a very intellectual winter for Albany. Besides the usual course of lectures at the Hall of the Young Men's Association, Dr. Armsby, at the Medical College, will deliver a popular course on Anatomy. Dr. Potter delivers the introductory before the young Men, on Tuesday evening next.

The Prize of $50, offered for an appropriate Address to be delivered at the opening of the new Amphitheatre, has been awarded to A. B. Street, Esq.

MCDONALD CLARKE.—More familiarly known as the "Crazy Poet," threatens annoying the world by the publication of a volume of his hypes. But however eccentric this moon-struck genius may generally appear, we have sometimes thought there was "method in his madness." For instance, when Lang of editorial memory, accused Col. Stone of being witless as Clarke, the poet thus pertinently replied:

Ed to Johnny Lang, by the way of a laugh,
When he brings me in his petulant brawl,
That some people think it is better by half—
To have brains that are zig-zag than no brains at all.

GEN. MACOMB.—has been seriously ill. By the last advices, he was recovering, and would soon be enabled to attend his official duties.

BOUNDARY LINE.—It appears, that the Boundary Line between this country and the Republic of Texas, embraces a considerable tract of country heretofore supposed to belong to us, which will be given to Texas. This is the opinion of the Commissioners.

COWHIDING.—This summary, if not, dignified process of settling a dispute, has become of late years so fashionable, that we think the legislature will be doing the public great injustice by longer withholding their countenance from it. A recent application of that efficient medicine, at an affray in N. York, between a lawyer and the son of an Alderman, would of course have terminated in a radical cure of both parties, had it not been for the neutralizing interposition of the law.

CONGRESS.—meets on Monday next, and will set 86 days, and then we shall have—a new administration. If "Old Tip," will give us "better times," and forgive us for voting against him, we shall be satisfied, and we promise not to bother him for those "certain moveables, which whilom took the fancy of a Mr. Buckingham, whose respectable descendants, we believe are pretty numerously scattered 'o'er our realm." We are informed, that there will be a family gathering at Washington, during the month of March, should the weather prove propitious.

TRIFLING WITH JUSTICE.—A few days ago numerous petitions were circulating in this and several adjacent places, for the purpose of procuring the pardon of LEDDING, then confined in our jail, but who was yesterday executed for the malignant murder of his wife. There is a mawkish feeling pervading the public mind in relation to the punishment of capital crime. Sympathy, wrongly bestowed, too often thwarts the ends of justice. A day or two since, we saw one of the petitions presented to a man of high moral instincts. He at first resolutely refused, showing in modest terms, the punishment the prisoner was about to receive was not only in strict accordance with the laws, but was also not more than adequate to his guilt. However the petitioner finding every other argument fruitless, at last requested our friend's signature, as a personal favor, and we are sorry to say, it was given. Thus law, humanity and justice, are all to be set aside for the personal gratification of a friend.

One point that the petition urged, was the criminal's being the father of a large family. This circumstance undoubtedly calls for our commiseration. Nevertheless, we would enquire what comfort the life of a man could offer to children, whose mother he had deliberately murdered? Again what benefit could the public expect from the longer continuance of the life of such a man? Was he likely to make a useful happy and safe citizen? If such crime is to be tolerated, we shall next expect to hear of the passage of laws, bestowing upon all those having families, the privilege of committing murder.

Just as our paper was going to press, we have learned, that Leding has been respited for 14 days. We know nothing of the reasons for so doing, which may be very proper; and we hope that such explanation will be given as will be satisfactory to the public mind, which is becoming restless in these matters.

TO OUR BRETHREN.—The 27th of December is fast approaching, when the Lodges of this State, and we believe in some others, will elect their officers for the ensuing year, and many of them observe the festival of our patron saint. Will the brethren bear in mind that we shall be happy not only to publish such elections, when completed, but also to give publicity to any observance of the occasion. This kind of fraternal intercourse, has a good effect, and we hope our brethren will assist us in carrying it out.

IMPORTANT DISCOVERY.—It is said that buckwheat cakes can be turned without "greasing the griddle." So says several of our exchange papers, and all the news papers tell the truth, since the election. We live in a wonderful age! The next generation, will no doubt discover a method of frying dough-nuts and roly-cooks without the aid of hot lard. By the by, while we are in the domestic way, we will just say, that some of our Sausage makers, here have brought their art to that perfection, that two pounds of them would scarcely make a grease spot perceptible, on the floor of the most tidy housewife. This is a commendable improvement on the antiquated notions of our fathers, and is particularly adapted to such breakfast rooms, as have no carpets.

One of the Comanche Indians in Texas, recently died in Texas, at the advanced age of 118 years.

The population of St. Louis, according to the last census, is 24,585.

THE EDITOR'S APPEAL.

It has been the misfortune of the Proprietor of this paper to sustain a loss proportionably greater than any of the sufferers. It is now four years since we undertook the doubtful experiment of exhibiting to the world a mute editor. A man deprived of two important channels of intellectual interchange. A man with a wife in like circumstances, whom former ages had elevated but a little above the brutes. A man who could look around and see thousands in a like condition, without any attempt to arouse them from their lethargic degradation. This was undertaken by the proprietor of this paper. He had, by the kindness of many friends, obtained printing materials sufficient to establish a small paper, and by industry, with economy, was enabled to enlarge it to a size equal to most country papers. We had also provided Job Type blanks, &c. (articles indispensable in a country office), and was on our journey to New York for our winter supply of paper when the astounding news was communicated in the city that the Radii office was in ashes with its contents, while the family only escaped with the few clothes they were enabled to snatch from the flames, at a few moment's warning.

Thus, in a moment, while the proprietor of the Radii supposed all was security for the present and hope for the future, we were left without a place to rest our heads, or prospects of gaining a sustenance during the approaching inclement season.

Notwithstanding, we do not despair, we are surrounded by kind friends, in whom we place the greatest trust.

We are protected by a kind Providence whose dispensations are always just, and it is our duty to bear with cheerfulness, and return thanks that these afflictions are no more. Our lives are safe, and with a continuance of health we hope yet to be enabled to obtain a share of worldly comforts.

LEVIS S. BACKUS.

Canajoharie, Nov. 27th, 1840.

Too soon by three years.—The Cincinnati Gazette of Saturday notices the nomination of Winfield Scott in a New Jersey paper, and of Henry Clay in a Mississippi paper, an addition to others, and remarks:—Gentlemen, friends, brethren, do let us have a little rest. We move a straight jacket for any man who shall commence urging the claims of any one to the succession, for at least two years." We second this motion.—Ohio State Journal.

SHOCKING ACCIDENT.—The Berks and Schuylkill Journal says:—On Thursday of last week, as Mr. E. Miller, of Chunu, was passing a threshing machine in full operation, he carelessly threw in a tuft of straw—the teeth caught the tips of his glove, and drew in his arm to within two inches of his elbow, absolutely grinding it to powder. The arm was amputated by Drs. Witman and Hilsman, above the elbow, and the patient is doing well.

Nasal Polypus.—The Western Journal of Medicine and Surgery states that Dr. Brice of Newark, Ohio, for more than thirty years a respectable practitioner of that place, has permanently cured three cases of polypus of the nostril by the root of the sanguinaria canadensis, or blood root. A decoction is made and applied to the part.

A new subscription of $100,000 places the construction of the Housatonic rail road beyond a doubt. It is expected the whole route will be completed in one year after this time, when the Berkshire road will undoubtedly be finished.

M'LOUD ARRESTED AGAIN.—An intelligent individual from Black Rock, says M'LOUD, supposed to be one of the murderers of the inoffensive and defenceless sleepers on board the steamboat Caroline, again ventured on this side of the Niagara, a few days since, and has been arrested, examined, new testimony obtained, and he is now imprisoned in Lockport jail. He denies being the person implicated, but declares that if he was, he should glory in it. The captain of the packet which arrived on Saturday, confirms that part of the statement which relates to M'LOUD's confinement in jail.—Rochester Democrat.

POETRY.

A U T U M N .

In the dim, thick forest,
There breathes a mournful sound;
It is the sigh of rustling leaves,
Fast showering to the ground!
The maple yields his crimson robe,
The oak his yellow crown,
And the tall beech leans drooping,
To drop his wreath of brown;
And all the rich-draped thickets cast
Their colored glories to the blast.

The orchards to old Autumn's court
Their mellow tributes send;
The round, green melon, and the grapes
That o'er the river bend;
The sweet pear with transparent cheek,
The peach of scarlet hue,
The glowing pippins, streaked with gold,
And plums of heavenly blue:
Rich baskets of the oily nut
Shaken from the branching tree;
Sweet honey in its waxen comb,
The treasure of the bee;
Bowls from the gushing cider-press,
And from the new-milked kine,
From the ripe barley's yellow seed,
And from the clustering vine:
Corn of the harvest, red and sweet,
Sheaves of the rich, juicy wheat,
Are all in lavish bounty poured
O'er Autumn's ever-generous board.

How gay the kindling blush of Morn!
How soft the bloom of Eve is spread!
How bright the cheerful blaze of Noon
O'er all the purple hills is shed!
At morn, across the grass-shorn plain
The pealy hour-frost glitters bright,
And o'er the winding river's course
The curling vapor hovers white:
And when the silvery harvest moon
Rolls on its boundless path serene,
And when the spirit-stars smile forth,
To sanctify the lovely scene,
A joyful pleasure thrills the air,
And woods and waves the rapture share,
And many a hoied vow is made
To Beauty in the moon-lit glade.

Sweet Autumn! 'Sabbath of the Year!'
I love the golden day,
The blooming hectic of thy cheek,
How lovely in decay!
And when the chill November breeze
In hollow sobs complains,
And thou dost droop among the hills,
And mourn along the plains;
Till in the forest's lonesome lanes
Thou sinkest on the heaped-up leaves,
Like a tired pilgrim, old and wan,
Who o'er his weary journey grieves:
Then melancholy thoughts will come,
To see thee dropping to the tomb!

As fades the closing year,
The birds their tuneful anthems end.
And fast toward a sunnier clime
Their winnowing pinions tend.
The sweet-voiced robin comes no more,
With plaintive whistle, to the door,
But joins the timid flock, and flies
To greener fields and gentler skies:
And the blue-jay, with wild lament,
Forsakes his withering leafy tent,
And the shy sea-birds by the shore
Their swift unerring flight pursue.
The cape-brace and the screaming loon,
The dusky coot, and wild curlew;
The sea-brant and the black shell-drake,
And wood-duck from the lonely lake,
The gull, the gannet, and the goose,
Their pinions to the south-winds loose,
Nor pause, save when, alarmed, they shun
The fowler's float, and smoking gun.

A K I S S .

BY WASHINGTON B. TYLER.

A kiss! oh, 'tis a magic spell
That wildly thrills the breast,
And bids it with emotion swell,
When lip to lip is pressed.
'Tis friendship's pledge—affection's seal,
And though a transient bliss,
Yet still the coldest heart must feel
The rapture of a kiss.

A kiss! 'tis love's own tender breath—
Fond language of the heart.—
The last communion held in death,
When friends forever part.
When gloomy cares disturb the breast,
No charm can soothe like this:
The mind is sweetly lulled to rest
Beneath a magic kiss.

A kiss! Yes, 'tis dear delight,
Whose memory often cheers,
And shines through clouds serenely bright
Re-calling by-gone years.
Who hath not felt the bosom beat
With an ecstatic bliss,
As loving souls together meet
In transport's glowing kiss?

THE DUEL.

A SERIOUS BALLAD.

In Brentford town, of old renown,
There lived a Mister Bray,
Who fell in the love with Lucy Bell,
And so did Mr. Clay.

To see her ride from Hammersmith,
By all it was allowed,
Such fair outlets are seldom seen,
Such angels on a cloud.

Said Mr. Bray to Mr. Clay,
You choose to rival me:
And court Miss Bell, but there your court
No thoroughfare shall be.

Unless you now give up your suit,
You may repent your love;
I, who have shot a pigeon-match,
Can shoot a turtle dove.

So pray, before you woo her more,
Consider what you do;
If you pop aught to Lucy Bell,
I'll pop it into you.

Said Mr. Clay to Mr. Bray,
Your threats I quite explode;
One who has been a volunteer,
Knows how to prime and load.

And so I say to you, unless
Your passion quiet keeps,
I, who have shot and hit bulls' eye,
May chance to hit a sheep's.

Now gold is oft for silver changed,
And that for copper red;
But these two went away to give
Each other change for lead.

But first they a friend a piece,
This pleasant thought to give—
When they were dead they thus should have
Two seconds still to live.

To measure out the ground not long
The seconds then forbore,
And having taken one rash step,
Then took a dozen more.

They next prepared each pistol-pan
Against the deadly strife,
By putting in the prime of death
Against the prime of life.

Now all was ready for the foes,
But, when they took their stands,

Fear made them tremble so, they found
They both were shaking hands.

Said Mr. C. to Mr. B.
Here one of us may fall,
And, like St. Paul's Cathedral now,
Be doomed to have a ball.

I do confess I did attach
Misconduct to your name;
If I withdraw the charge, will then
Your ramrod do the same?

Said Mr. B. I do agree,
But thick of honor's courts;
If we go off without a shot,
There will be strange reports.

But look, the morning now is bright,
Though cloudy it begun;
Why can't we aim above, as if
We had called out the sun?

So up into the harmless air,
Their bullets they did send,
And may all other duels have
That upshot in the end.

THE HUNTER.

Give me the bending heavens above
The prairies broad below,
A merry glance from her I love,
My rifle and my bow.
I crave no silver for my pouch,
No wine-cup mantling high,
Nor brodered vest, nor downy couch,
On which the care-worn sigh:
With conscience clear, and steadfast mind,
My cares I whistle to the wind.

If I am hungry, I can wing
The wild-bird as he flies;
Or thirsty, yonder crystal spring
My sparkling draught supplies.
The deer must yield his dappled coat
My vigorous limbs to don:
The eagle his bright plume to float
My fearless brow upon.
I am content—canst thou say more,
With pride, and pomp, and treasured store?

JUST SEVENTEEN.

Just seventeen! the sunlight throws
Its beauty on thee now;
And pleasure dance amid the beams
That burn upon thy brow.
Bright friendships cluster in thy way
Like grapes upon the vine;
O that they ever might remain,
And o'er thy pathway shine.

Just seventeen! The bowers are green
That woo thee to their shades;
And in the distance, flowers of joy,
Bedeck the blooming glades.
Hope's brilliant meteor shines afar,
And bids thee haste to share
The glory of maturer years,
That thy fair form may wear.

Just seventeen! The tempter's wiles
Thy glowing path bestrew,
And fashion's false delusive star,
Thy happy heart may woo.
And in the gilded halls of pride,
Lured by its treacherous light,
Thou'lt find too soon, in folly's race,
That pain succeeds delight.

Just seventeen! True wisdom waits,
To place thee near her throne,
Where gems of purest brilliancy
Have ever richly shone.
Then go, and at her princely feet,
Seek for that robe of white,
Which wearing, thou mayst surely win,
A throne of endless light.

ORATION

ON THE

Origin, Design, and Duties of Free-Masonry; pronounced at the Second Street Presbyterian Church, in the city of Troy, on the 24th of June, 1840.

By the R. W. JAMES HERRING,

To the Architects at Jerusalem, how great and important was the change that had been wrought in their character and duties! In Judea when the works of the Grand Master were completed there could be no further employment, but wherever there was wealth and wherever a taste for splendid edifices existed, there their science and the reputation they had acquired at Jerusalem would secure them employment. But whosoever they went they must dwell amongst Pagans and Idolators with whom they could no longer mingle. Their worship in future must be in secret, and the brotherhood, the friends and companions of each other, admitting amongst them only such persons as were of tried integrity and seekers after knowledge and truth. These were the accepted Masons. Such was the state of society in the primitive days of our order. The manner in which the private business of the early Lodges was conducted is kept in remembrance amongst the traditions of the Fraternity.

Of the progress Eastward of the new institution after the public works at Jerusalem, the Palace of the forest of Lebanon, Palmyra, Balbec and Gezer were finished, we have very little positive information: ancient history is filled with accounts of fierce and cruel wars, as constituting the chief employment of men and the glory of nations, while they scarcely alluded to the arts of peace. The first distinct trace we have of the fraternity, West of the Holy Land, is in Rome, about forty years after its foundation, and about seven hundred and eight years before the Christian era. Numa, the second King, gave them privileges as corporations, under the name of Collegia frabrorum; it is said (by Plutarch) that he instituted for them proper meetings, and certain religious rites. It is more probable that Numa was himself, as a philosopher and a seeker after truth, an accepted brother of the order, and granted them the freedom which they claimed. Moreover, according to the laws of the twelve tables, the Collegia had the right to make their own laws, provided there was nothing therein contrary to the public laws. It is much more rational to believe that that King derived many of his wise regulations from that source, than from Pythagoras, to whom some early writers, quoted by Plutarch, attributed them, because the one is probable and the other impossible, as Pythagoras did not flourish until 400 years afterwards.

Numa's retirement to groves and lawns and solitary and sacred places where he held frequent conversation with the Muses, we can very readily comprehend, and with the more certainty when we take a view of some of his institutions. He taught the Romans to venerate one of those Muses, whom he called Tucita, the silent. He forbade them to represent the Deity in the form of either Man or beast, "because the First Cause was not an object of sense, nor liable to passion, but invisible, incorruptible and discernable only by the mind." Temples and other sacred domes were erected, "but no figures were placed in them," says Plutarch, "because they were persuaded that it is impious to represent things divine by what is perishable, and that we have no conception of God, but by the understanding." To Numa is attributed the institution of that high order of priests, called Pontifices, over which he is said to have presided himself. He is recorded to have been the first who built Temples to Fides, or Faith and he taught the Romans to swear by faith, as the greatest of oaths. This was intended to make them pay as much regard to their word as to a contract in writing; and Polbius gives them the honorable testimony that they kept their word most inviolably, without being obliged to it by bail or witness. He attempted also to reform the Calendar, which he executed with some degree of skill, though not with absolute exactness. Now, to the fraternity, the origin of these new regulations of Numa, I am satisfied, must be as plain as the light of day; and it is a pleasant task thus to trace the influence of our Order in times so remote and barbarous. From that time down to the present, the course of our institution in Europe can be followed without interruption. I shall briefly trace it. From the Roman term Collegia, or College, a society of men set apart for learning or religion, is derived our English term Lodge, which I shall hereafter use. The lodges of the earliest times were formed after the model of a family, with a Master at their head, selected for his superior skill, discretion and piety, to whom all deference was paid, (the French Masons still preserve, the respectful appellation of this officer, whom they term venerable.) and the body maintained within themselves not only the character of societies of architects, but of civil and religious communities. Having, as I have shown, obtained a privileged footing in Western Europe, they increased rapidly, and dispersed through the neighboring provinces, and co-operated most powerfully in the propagation of the sciences, arts &c. They maintained their distinctive character to the end of the Roman empire. The early Roman Emperors limited their privileges as much as possible, but the latter governments favored them so much the more. In the corpus juris Romani are contained lists of the mechanic arts, existing free from taxation in the third and fourth centuries, among which are architects, builders, painters, sculptors, workers in marble, masons, stone cutters and carpenters. There was no town of any importance, no province ever so distant where Lodges did not exist to the downfall of the empire, with their peculiar constitutions and their ancient compact and religious character. These bodies were called upon by imperial orders to come from all parts of the empire to assist in the building of large cities, palaces and churches. In the most flourishing periods of the Roman empire there were Lodges attached to each Roman legion. They existed in Britain, in Spain, France, on the Rhine and Danube, but with the decline of the empire they did not decline, but continued to flourish in France, Spain Italy, and the Greek empire. From these countries the christian Saxon rulers of Britain induced them to visit Eng. to build their castles, abbeys and churches. Christianity now prevailed in Europe, except in the south of Spain, and in the high northern latitudes, and there can be no doubt but that the Masons, being devoted to the arts of peace, and prepared by their previous religious knowledge, had early embraced the christian faith, but in this there was nothing to separate them in their intercourse with their brethren, dispersed in other lands, because the foundation of their religious faith was undisturbed. When, therefore, Alfred and Athelstan invited these foreign artists to England, (that they did so there is no historical fact better authenticated,) they, belonging to different nations, and at the same time to sects differing in all probability from each other, and from the orthodoxy of the people among whom they were to sojourn, could not be induced to go there without receiving from the king and the Pope letters of protection, and liberty to exercise jurisdiction over their own bodies and the right of settling their own wages. These being granted, they united under the constitutions which had been transmitted from the ancient Roman Lodges. They chose some distinguished prince or prelate who had been regularly initiated and accepted as their patron or Grand Master, and wherever they were dispersed in England, they held an annual assembly of the whole craft to adjust all differences, and to regulate the affairs of the society. At one of these assemblies held at York, in the year 926, under the Grand Master Edwin, brother to king Athelstane, all the writings and records extant in Greek, Latin, French and other languages, or copies of them were brought together, and a constitution with charges and regulations was formed for the government of the English Lodges, which is still in use by them and by the American Lodges. The great power after this period possessed by the Popes, was at this time struggling into existence, and every means was seized to give effect to their claims, by the introduction of external decoration by the priesthood, gaudy ceremonies, and at length by splendid monasteries and magnificent cathedrals. To encourage the Freemasons in the exercise of their professions and to attach them to the service of the church, the most important privileges were conferred, and in addition to those which the fraternity had always claimed, all persons who were not members, were prohibited from engaging in the erection of religious edifices. In after ages, however, when Masons were more numerous, and the demand for religious structures was less urgent than before, the Bishops of Rome deprived the fraternity of the privileges they had granted, and used their utmost power to destroy their associations by an unrelenting persecution, which in fact, has never ceased; for both temporal and spiritual tyrants have ever been in terror of freedom of thought and the union of enlightened men. The privileges of the fraternity, however were of sufficient duration to enable them to erect many of the most splendid cathedrals and abbeys of England, Scotland and other parts of Europe, many of which, though now in ruins, still bear testimony to the skill and cultivated taste of the fraternity in the age, which in reference to literature, the arts and human liberty, was dark indeed.

On the continent of Europe persecution accomplished its object to a great degree. The Lodges were generally broken up, and the craftsman dispersed but the institution was never destroyed. The present occasion will not afford the time necessary to trace the order through that very important period of its history when it became the parent of those religious and military orders by whose valor a christian kingdom was established around the sepulchre of Christ. I must, therefore, pass that subject, upon which volumes have been written without exhausting it, with the single remark, that chivalry engrafted on masonry produced the orders of St. John and the Templars, and that although those orders have been in their time the objects of persecution, they have ever retained their connexion with the parent institution, and that although no person can be admitted to those orders without passing through Masonic rites, they are limited to professors of the christian faith. During the crusades, Masonry continued to flourish in Britain and Scotland where, though sometimes subjected to legislative enactments, it has ever sustained itself with honor and without reproach. In 1459 it again began to appear openly in Germany at the erection of the cathedral, of Strasburg, and has since been protected by many of the most enlightened monarchs of Europe. At the present time, Lodges are established in all parts of the world where commerce and civilization have found their way, and where there are no Lodges, there are probably few places where members of the fraternity are not established, and ready to discharge the duties of hospitality and fraternity to the worthy and enlightened stranger.

In one respect the institution has undergone a change. It no longer embodies within itself the sci nce of Architecture, nor is it at the present day to be regarded as a society of practical Architects. Sir Christopher Wren, who erected the cathedral of St. Pauls in London, and planned and built upwards of fifty other churches there, was the last of the practical Architects, who presided over the English Lodges, as Grand Master. He died in 1723 at the age of 91.—The change which has come over our institution in this respect has been gradually approaching from its commencement. As I have shown, it never was intended to be confined to Architects, or operative Masons. The mysteries of Masonry, designed to convey the most important religious instruction, and to illustrate the most impressive lessons of duty to God and to Man, by means of the Architects, whose business would of necessity carry them into all lands, was the first and greatest object of the founder, SOLOMON.—The accepted masons were generally residents, while the Free Masons, or Architects, with their craftsmen and apprentices, were travellers. How the business of Architecture has passed from the hands of a peculiar class needs no illustration to those, who are acquainted with the gradual progress of society in literature and the arts. I will only remind my hearers of two facts; both of which illustrate the difference between what was and what is. There was a time when a criminal convicted of a capital offence according to English law, might have what was called the benefit of clergy, and be saved from death if he knew how to write. There was a time when no craftsman could practice his profession in the incorporated cities, without the freedom of the city, but now when the corporation of New York or Boston present the freedom of their city in a gold box to some distinguished stranger, it is merely a compliment and honor, and confers no special privilege, beyond what is enjoyed by every citizen of the land. So with Architecture, the advancement of the world in knowledge and liberty has left it in common with a lather arts and sciences free to the study and practice of all who choose it, but for all the purposes for which the institution of Free Masonry was originally designed, it holds its place amongst men, and exercises an influence over the moral character and actions of its members, undiminished by the lapse of centuries, but which is facilitated and aided by the progress of civilization, by the diffusion of knowledge and virtuous principles by other institutions.

Free Masonry entertains no jealousy, and encourages no rivalry of any other institution of religion, science, or benevolence. It harmonizes with all such, but it stands alone. Based upon the principles of order, exemplified by the Grand Architect of the universe

"When yonderspheres sublime"

Peal'd their first notes to sound the march of time;"

claiming as of right the highest antiquity of all human institutions, borne up by the undivided evidence of its benefits to mankind by the voice of the wise, and good, and great, of the old world and the new, its course is ever onward, and its duties well defined. As the sun in the firmament hath its appointed course, and sheddeth down upon all nations and people of the earth its light, and vivifying influence; so hath Masonry, its place and power, to give light, and harmony among all nations, and people, and kindreds and tongues. Undisturbed by geographical divisions, neither seas, rivers, nor mountains limit its influence, nor can diversity of languages impede it, nor can the strife of nations impair its lawful use, nor the multitude of creeds and modes of worship disturb its unity. And why?—Because none of these enter into its constitution. All disputes and discussions concerning religion, politics, nations or families are prohibited.—Masons are bound by their tenure to obey the moral law, and to worship and adore the Most High. They are admonished to "remember that man is the master piece of the creation, because God himself animated him with his breath, and to be sensible of the immortality, of the soul, and to separate from this heavenly, imperishable being, all that is foreign to it." They are strictly charged by the old constitutions, incorporated in the constitution of the Grand Lodge of this State, to be peaceable citizens, and cheerfully to conform to the laws of the country in which they reside; never to be concerned in plots or conspiracies against government, but to respect the civil magistrate, and patiently submit to the decisions of the constituted authorities. But their duties to each other are less important. The manual of the Grand Lodge of Lower Canada thus instructs the fraternity; "Every Free Mason, without considering to what sect of religion he belongs, where he was born, or what rank he holds, is thy brother, and has a claim upon thy assistance. Honor in human society the adopted gradations of rank; in our assemblies we acknowledge only the preference of virtue to vice. Be not ashamed before the world of the honest man whom thou hast acknowledged as a brother. Haste to his assistance, offer thy hand to lift up the fallen; and let not the sun set before thou art reconciled with thy brother, if thou hast had any difference with him."

This, my brethren and friends is but a brief and imperfect sketch of the origin, design, history and duties of Free Masonry, collected from sacred and profane history, and the published constitutions of the order. How far my facts and inductions are verified by the traditions, rites, customs and ceremonies of the Institution, the fraternity only can judge, and they are most deeply interested in the inquiry. Every member of the community, however, where Masonry exists is more or less interested in the inquiry into its objects and tendency, since it is not an institution which lies concealed in a corner, but it is known to spread throughout all other lands. To the ignorant scoffer who neither seeks after truth on this or any other subject, nor has capacity to understand it though written in sunbeams, I can neither argument nor explanation, but to the intelligent and honest inquirer, whose judgement has been misled, and whose ears have been abused for years, by false reports, and open slanders, and the torture of facts to suit the purposes of the knave or the fanatic, something more than the example of patience and silent endurance is most certainly due. To such, if any there be in this assembly, would I address this appeal to their candor and common sense. To the professors of religion would I appeal. Let them examine the evidences of our modern practices, and they will find that our ancient brethren went forth from Jerusalem as pioneers of heaven, "like the voice of one crying in the wilderness prepare ye the way of the Lord." And I would ask, when now they send forth their missionaries to foreign lands would they deprive them of the best means of securing a fraternal welcome, and hospitable rites in the land of the stranger, or can they believe that his being a Mason would impair his usefulness or chill the fervor of his piety. Do not believe it my friends. The conscience of the Mason is untrammelled, and by the rules of our institution every brother is free to worship God according to the customs of his fathers, or the persuasions of his own heart.

To the civil magistrates, and to the quiet and peaceable citizen I would appeal, to judge of our institution by its written laws, and by the solemn testimony of its tens of thousands of witnesses in past centuries and at the present day, that Masonry promotes good order and the public weal, and that "although some Masons are not so good as other men, they are probably better than they would have been had they not been masons." Spots have been seen in the sun and we have not been offended thereby, but have sought rather for the cause of the phenomenon, and if a Mason has sometimes broken the laws of his country he should be taken as an example of the perversity of human nature, as a violator of the laws of God, his country and his friends, and one who would not be controlled by either divine or human laws.

To you my brethren, how serious and solemn are the various considerations which must flow from the view which has been taken the design and importance of our Institution. How wonderfully has it been preserved, how vast its influence in bringing to perfection some branches of science; in the dissemination of Divine truth; in teaching the doctrine of man's accountability to God, the immortality of the soul; and the great duties of brotherly love, and charity. How solemn is the reflection, that at this day we are "stewards of the Mysteries of God," and that upon us rests in some degree the responsibility of teaching those Mysteries to the edification of the children of light, who stand in the outer courts of the house of the Lord, and ask for instruction. Ah! my brethren, you who have taken upon you the heavy responsibilities of Masters, and High Priests, and Commanders, have you duly considered that you are the teachers and guides of men with immortal souls? That you are for the time the patriarchs and fathers of the bodies over which you are appointed to preside, and when your children ask for bread will you give them a stone? Are you content with the communication of the ritual of the order, without the illustrations which give it life and utility? Are you content to be called Master, Master, while you put off the performance of the highest duties of a Master to a more convenient time? I trust this is not the case. But, my brethren, let not ambition tempt you to seek for high offices in the fraternity, for the sake of the honor. He who faithfully perform his duties as a Master, must apply himself to intense study; he must read, mark, learn and inwardly digest the written and unwritten statutes and ordinances of the order, that have descended from remote antiquity; he must give his days to reflection, and when he lays his head upon his pillow and the world is shut out, he must call home his thoughts to the solemn subject which he has engaged to teach. Such are my views of the duties of the Master of a Lodge and of the presiding officer of any other Masonic body.

To you my brethren, who are not officers, I can address but a few words of exhortation on this occasion. Remember my brethren, that it is not the external qualities of a man which Masonry regards, therefore, be not satisfied with the privilege of wearing the external garb of Masonry without the correspondence of an internal decoration. The white apron and gloves are but emblems of purity and innocence, and from him who has assumed the cross will be expected devotion and obedience. Your duties, my brethren, increase as you advance in masonry; and not only your brethren know this fact, but the world knows it, therefore, "let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven."

MISCELLANY.

FOUR HOURS OF PERIL AND TERROR.

Rescue from the Brink of the Cataract.

[From the Rochester Democrat, Nov. 8.]

We have heard of many "awful situations" and "Providential rescues" but never of a situation more truly awful than that which we are here about to describe, nor of a rescue in all respects more strikingly providential.

Mr. Kidd, one of the hands employed in the flouring mills of Avery & Turner, just above the Middle Falls of the Genesee, in the north part of this city, (Carthage) after dark, a few evenings since, took the skiff belonging to the mill, and without communicating his designs to any one, attempted to cross the river.—For the purpose of improving the water-power at that point, a dam has been thrown across a few feet above the middle cataract, and at low water the current for some distance above the dam is slight. When the water is high, however, a strong current sets over the dam through its whole length, and then none but a person accustomed to manage a boat, can push one across. The river was very high on the evening in question. To add to the difficulty, Mr. Kidd had little experience in the use of oars, and when about half way across he lost command of the boat, and found to his horror that he was rapidly drifting with the current which he could not doubt, would sweep him with his light skiff over the dam.

The dam, as we have remarked, is a few feet above the Middle Falls, the perpendicular descent of which is twenty-five feet. A few rods farther down are the Lower Falls, with a perpendicular descent of eighty-four feet. Between the dam and the middle falls, as well as between the two cataracts, the current is exceedingly rapid and rough. Once over the dam, therefore, his destruction is sealed; for even should his frail bark survive the plunge over the dam and the descent of the middle falls, and live through the intervening rapids and rocks to the brink of the lower falls, it could not, nor could the strongest vessel that ever floated, survive the awful plunge, eighty-four feet down the tremendous cataract.

Mr. Kidd was perfectly acquainted with the localities, and fully aware of the awful perils of his situation. In the darkness of the night, there was no eye save the eye of him to whom the midnight is as noonday, that could see, and no hand save his that could save him; and a speedy and terrible death seemed inevitable. But that eye did see, and that hand was stretched out to save, and guided his little vessel to a point of the dam somewhat higher than the rest; where, after shooting nearly half way over it, it grated, and finally stuck fast.

But the terrors of his situation were even now but slightly alleviated. The river had been rising for some days, and he had reason to suppose was still rising. His boat, rocked by the current which was sweeping under and around it, assuring him how evenly balanced it was on a pivot; how slight an additional force would be sufficient to destroy his equipoise, and how small a rise of water would be sufficient to lift it off. A wave raised by a gust of wind even, or the gust of wind itself might throw it from its balance, and consign it and him to the terrible destruction over which they were suspended as by a single hair! Before and behind and around him were the mad waters of the swollen Genesee, plunging by successive leaps among the crags and down the cataracts into the dark, yawning chasm below the lower falls, over-hung with their clouds of spray which even then fell upon him, and sending up their stunning and terrific roar, as if spreading the pall and sounding the requiem of their intended victim! How small appears his chance of escape! But

and its fountains were not congealed in the bosom of him who then most needed its most genial influence, even by the terrors that surrounded him for the four hours during which his final rescue was delayed.

He commenced shouting for help, and though no voice answered him from the shore, and though the roar of the waters almost drowned his own, he continued it, resting at intervals to gather strength to give more energy to his shouts, for about three hours; at the end of which, the Master Miller taking his rounds outside the mill, about 10 o'clock, to see that all was safe before retiring for the night, heard one of his cries. He supposed that it was from some person on the opposite side of the river, and was at first disposed to disregard it. He heard the voice again, and thinking that it sounded like a cry of distress, determined to cross over and afford what relief might be in his power. He ran down for his boat, and finding it gone, and the cries being continued, he returned to the mill, and rallied the hands. It was then found that Mr. Kidd was missing, and the truth respecting him was at once conjectured. On going down to the bank of the river, one of the party after a while discovered a dark spot on the edge of the dam, and no doubt now remained respecting Kidd's situation.

To rescue him from it, was now the object. Some time was spent in trying to construct a raft; but as an attempt to bring him off by a craft so unmanageable, would be attended with vastly more danger to those making it, than chances of deliverance to him, the project was abandoned.

One of the party now volunteered an attempt which his courage made successful. With a long pole in his hands, and with a long rope made fast by one end to his body, which his comrades were to pay out as the phrase is, as he advanced, and with which he was to be drawn back, if necessary, he bravely ventured into the water. Making his way slowly and cautiously, along the inner slope of the dam, he at length reached the boat still suspended and swinging with its half doomed passenger where it was first so providentially moored: and by means of rope and oars, the whole were safely brought ashore, and Mr. Kidd was restored as it were to life, after enduring the mental sufferings, the perils and terrors of his awful situation, more painful if possible than death itself, for about four hours. Some idea of his intense sufferings during that time, may be derived from the fact that he has been sick in consequence of them ever since. He is doubtless thankful to have escaped even with a fit of sickness.

We have not learned the name of the brave and generous man through whose agency his rescue was accomplished.

THE MILL.—On the invitation of a gentleman connected with the Mill, we on Thursday visited that establishment, and were highly pleased with all we witnessed. The high state of mechanics, which the complex machinery give evidence of, the extreme cleanliness of the building, and the well-arranged order with which the whole process of coining is carried on is truly admirable. There are at present some twenty-five men employed there, every one noiselessly fulfilling his province.

In the smelting department there are six furnaces—two of them were on Thursday in operation. The men employed in this department wear large stuffed gloves on their hands, resembling "boxing gloves." One man, through the aid of long tongs, raises the crucible out of the furnace, and pours the liquid metal in a cast iron mould—a second man opens this mould, pushes it over to a third, and throws the ingot just cast into a receptacle for it; a third man fastens up the mould opened by No. 2, and places it in a position to be ready to receive an ingot in proper time. Dr. Riddle presides over this department, and it is said he has introduced into it many beneficial reforms.

The ingots are next assayed and then taken to the rolling room; here they are again placed in the furnace, where a certain heat is infused into them preparatory to their being rolled. The rolling is performed by the application of machinery, and consists in rolling out the ingots, whether silver or gold, to a consistency of a required breadth and thickness, resembling in shape iron hoghead hoops. These are next conveyed to the adjusting room, where they are adjusted, so that when cut out in circular pieces for eagles, half eagles, half dollars, quarters, dimes, or half dimes, they will be found of proper weight. This being done, these silver or gold slabs are, by other machinery, cut into exact circular sizes of the designed coins. They are next brought to the mill where the edge is raised on them. This mill is another evidence of the perfection of machinery. The round pieces are put into a kind of hopper, where they are placed over one another in a pile, and drawn out one by one; the edge is raised by their coming in contact with a piece of grooved metal as they go round, and which they drop down. They are finally taken to the coining room, where, by machinery also, they are one after another drawn under the stamping press, where they receive the necessary impression, and come out good and current money of the United States, to which the most scrupulous Bentonian could not object.

The whole of the machinery is worked by a powerful and splendidly finished steam engine, placed in the centre of that part of the building where the coining, which we have endeavored imperfectly to describe, is carried on.—N. O. Picayune.

Quantity of Food consumed by a Man.—The difference between eight ounces and a half of boiled meat and ten ounces appears very trivial; but if the greater of the two quantities be persevered in regularly every day for the term of a man's adult life of half a century, it may excite a little surprise in the person who practises it to learn that he will have consumed a flock of sheep, consisting of about fifty-three head, in excess above what he ought to have made use of. In a life of sixty-five years, allowing eight ounces and a half per day for fifty years, two-thirds of that quantity for ten years, and three ounces a day for three years of childhood, the total animal food amounts to 350 sheep. If to this be added the excess above mentioned, the number of sheep, the cooked meat of which is devoured by one man during a life of sixty-five years, is about 400; along with five tons of potatoes, about the same of turnips or other vegetable, nine tons weight of common drink, and six tons weight of wine, at one pint per day for thirty years only: thus for dinner alone about thirty tons weight of solids and liquids must have passed through the stomach. Inordinate work will wear out any machinery before its time, especially if the work performed be of a peculiarly wearing character. Whether it is advisable to add the fifty-three unnecessary sheep to one's dinner, is a question which every reader will answer to himself as he thinks proper. The food of old Parr, who died at 153 years of age, consisted of cheese, coarse bread, milk, and small beer. Would it have made no difference in the duration of his life, if he had swallowed 1050 sheep, for about this number would have been his share at the usual rate, along with his twenty tons of wine? It may assist in drawing a conclusion, to recollect that when he was taken to London, and lived in splendor, "fed high, and drank plentifully of the best wines," he soon died; and his death was generally attributed to that cause for he had vigor of body "to have lived a while longer," as the reporter says.—Donovan's Domestic Economy.

Turkish Predilection for Cats.—The dog, the faithful friend of man, is everywhere in the land of Islamism a complete outcast; every thing he touches becomes impure; while the cat, the most ungrateful and least susceptible of attachment of all domestic animals, is the darling alike of the bearded warrior and the fair inmate of the harem; she eats and drinks from the same dish, and sleeps on the same couch both with old and young; and all this because she was the favorite plaything of Mahomet, who actually permitted his purring pet to deposit her nursery in his bosom.—Spencer's Travels in Circassia.

Gallantry.—A sailor who had spent nearly all his days on the blue waters and knew little of land gear, came ashore the other day, and in passing up a street saw a little woman going along with a large muff before her. He stepped up very politely, and offered to carry it, for her, as he was going the same way.

A Sanguinary Impostor.—A Paris paper mentions the case extraordinary impostor. He was brought before one of the police offices upon a charge of assumed epileptic debility, in order to extort money from the charitable, when he suddenly fell down on the floor, went into strong convulsions, blood gushed copiously from his mouth, and on his becoming tranquil from exhaustion, he was forced to be removed to the infirmary of his prison. There, on being closely watched, it was found that he had acquired the facility of retaining in his stomach a considerable quantity of blood, which he could at pleasure eject by the throat, and produce all the symptoms of an involuntary rupture of important blood vessels. His arms had usually supplied him with blood, the veins being all scarified with marks of innumerable bleedings; and he had at last resorted to his nose, an instrument being found concealed on his person for scarifying the interior of that organ, and which it appears he had made use of on the day in question, shortly before being taken into court. He has been brought up again, and condemned to one year's imprisonment.

MELANCHOLY ACCIDENT.—Mr. Reed Smith, of Athens county, Ohio, was suddenly killed on the 11th inst. by the accidental discharge of a rifle gun. He had recently purchased the rifle, and wishing to ascertain whether she was load, he placed the butt on the floor, and raising the hammer from the tube with his foot, imprudently put his mouth to the muzzle with the intention of blowing into the cylinder, as is supposed, when his foot slipped off the hammer, and the entire charge lodged in the brain. The accident occurred in the midst of his family.

VESSEL AND CREW.—The schooner Gleaner, of Ohio City, Capt Case, with a crew of three men, left Rochester, on the 28th Sept. with a cargo of corn for Kingston, U. C., since which time nothing has been heard of her. She has undoubtedly foundered and all the crew are lost.

A JOYFUL ENCOUNTER.—At a late hour yesterday evening, a very pleasant incident occurred on board of one of the ferry boats which ply on the East river.—Two jolly tars, who had just returned from a long whaling voyage, and who exhibited a due proportion of the light heartedness of "Jack-a-shore," were seated together near the cabin door, and one of them—who had, it seemed, been impressed at an early age into the British service, and had never revisited his native land—after relating some of the perils of the deep, thro' which he had safely passed, exclaimed, "Well, here I am, once more safe ashore, but there is no kind face to greet me; if I but saw my old mother, that is, if I have a mother now"—just at this moment, an elderly, decent looking old woman, who had been listening attentively to the sailor's narrative, stepped quickly forward, and seizing Jack's arm, gazed eagerly in his face, and loudly exclaiming: "It is—it is my son!" fell into the arms of the astonished tar. The delight of the joyous meeting we will not attempt to describe.—N. Y. Sun.

POPULAR TALES.

From the London Metropolitan.

FAIR ANNIE MACLEOD.

A TALE.

BY MRS. CRAWFORD.

Those attachments that take place in early life, contrary to the wishes of tender and not ambitious parents, seldom, if ever, end happily. The igni fatus of passion, which leads the young and trusting maid to the arms of her lover, vanishes when the cares of her own creating press upon the heart of the wife and mother.

In my native village, before I had entered upon that world which owes, like some descriptions of beauty, half its enchantment to the veil that shades it, I was acquainted with a young maiden, whose personal and mental attractions were of that cast which romance loves to portray.

Annie Macleod was the belle of our little hamlet.—She had a bright and loving eye; a cheek ever dimpling with the smiles of gladness; and a fairy foot, which was as elastic as the stem of the bonnie blue bell, her favorite flower. Annie had many lovers; but one, a stranger at Roslin, was the chosen of her heart. To him her hand was often given in the dance; and many were the inquiring glances at, and frequently the whispered surmise about him; by 'kerchiefed matron and snooded maid. Annie's was a first love: and, like every thing that is rare and beautiful, when seen for the first time, was irresistible. Just emerging from the girl into womanhood, with all the unweakened romance of nature playing round her day-dreams, and coloring the golden visions of her sleep, the manly beauty of the stranger's countenance, and the superior refinement of his speech and manners to the youth of that sequestered hamlet, came with all the power of enchantment to ensnare and bewilder her innocent mind.

Rumors about this favored stranger at length reached the ears of Annie's mother—unfortunately, she had no father. Questioned by her parent, her answers were in character with her youth and simplicity. She knew nothing of the stranger; but "was sure he was a gentleman, for he had offered, and really meant, to marry her." Mrs. Macleod, upon this information, acted without delay. She forbade Annie, on pain of her maternal displeasure, to see the stranger again, unless he, by his own conduct, proved himself to be worthy of her. But on a fine Sabbath morning, when going to kirk, dressed out in all her pretty bravery, and blooming as the rose-colored ribbons that tied her bonnet, Annie met the stranger at the place where they had so often held trysts together; and there Robin Bainbogle, as he crossed the rude bridge that leads over a wild ravine to Roslin Castle, saw, as he said, "the bonnie lassie for the last time, wi' a face like a dripping rose." Tears Annie might, and probably did shed—but that day she fled from her home.

Years passed away. The mother of the lost girl sank under this blow to her parental hopes. The young maidens, Annie's compeers in age and beauty, became wives and mothers; and the name of "fair Annie Macleod" was seldom mentioned but by sage matrons, to warn their daughters, or by chaste spinsters to draw comparisons to their own advantage.

It was on a dark and stormy night in November, 1792, that the pious and venerable pastor of ——— was sent for to attend a dying woman. Wrapped in his plaid, the kind man walked hurriedly along the common footway to a settlement of squalid cottages, such as vice and poverty usually inhabit. In one of these cottages, or rather huts, he found the object of his search.—Pale, emaciated, and sinking away, like the flickering light of an exhausted taper, lay the once beautiful—the once innocent and happy Annie Macleod. What had been her fate since she left her mother's roof 'twas easy to imagine, though the veil of secrecy rested upon the particulars of her history. Her senses were at times unsettled; and it was only during the short gleamings of a sounder mind, that she was able to recognize in the Rev. Dugald Anderson, the pastor of the sinless youth, and to recommend to him, with all the pathos of dying love, the pretty, unconscious child that slumbered at her side. That done, her heart, like the last string of a neglected lute, broke, and the spirit that had once so joyously revelled in its abode of loveliness, fled from the ruined tenement of beauty for ever.

"And these are the fruits of love!" said Anderson, bitterly, as he eyed the cold and stiffened features of Annie. "Oh! monstrous violation of that hallowed name!"

"Of a troth, 'tis a sair sight!" said an old woman, the owner of the hut; "and I count me the judgment o' the gude God winna sleep nor slumber on sic doings as the ruin o' this puir lassie."

"No," said Anderson, emphatically, "the justice of God may seem to slumber, but is awake. Accursed is the seducer of innocence; yea, the curse of broken hearts is upon him. It shall come home to his heart and to his spirit, till he lie down and die, in very weariness of life."

The pious pastor took home the little Alice to the Manse—and after the remains of her mother were decently interred in the village kirkyard, a simple headstone, inscribed with her name, told of the last resting-place of "fair Annie Macleod."

Some years subsequently to this melancholy event, the good pastor of ——— went out, as was his wont, to "meditate at even tide." As he stood leaning over the white wicket gate, that opened from his garden into the church-yard, thoughts of early days and early friends came trooping to his mind.

"No after friendships o'er can raise
The endowments of our early days;
And ne'er the heart such fondness prove,
As when it first began to love."

The last rays of the setting sun shone full upon the windows of the chapel, reflecting from them a thousand mimic glories. His eye glanced from the holy edifice to the simple tombs, partially lighted by the slanting sunbeams, as they quivered through the branches of the patriarchal trees, which here and there hung over the forgotten dead. Suddenly a man habited in a foreign garb advanced up the broad pathway leading from the village. Looking about him, he at last stood opposite a white headstone, over which a decayed yew threw its melancholy shadow. It was the headstone that marked the grave of the once joyous Annie. As if oppressed by some sudden emotion, he sank rather than leaned against the hollow trunk; but soon again returning to the grave, he knelt down, and burying his face with both hands, appeared to weep. The good pastor, interested in the scene, stood gazing unobserved at the stranger, who, after the lapse of a few seconds, rose up from his knees, and turned away as if to retrace his steps. Then again coming back he stooped down, and plucking something from the green sward, kissed it, hid it in his bosom, and with rapid step left the churchyard.

Anderson returned into the Manse, drew a chair to the hearth, sat down, took up a book, laid it down again, and walked out into the little court that fronted the village. A feeling of curiosity perhaps led him to glance his eye over the wicket gate, where stood the only alehouse in the hamlet, when he saw the stranger come out, and, crossing the road, stop at his own gate. To his inquiry if the Rev. Dugald Anderson was at home the good pastor, answered in the affirmative, courteously held back the gate for the stranger to enter; while the little bare-footed lassie who opened the door, seeing a visitor with her master, hustled onwards, and ushered them into the best parlor, carefully wiping with a corner of her blue-checked apron, the tall, spinster-looking elbow chair, and then withdrew to tell the young Andersons what "a bra' gallant the master had brought hame wi' him."

The stranger's appearance justified Jennie's encomiums. Though past the summer of his life the unextinguished fire of youth still lingered in his dark full eye; and his tall athletic person accorded well with the lofty bearing of his looks, and the refined courtesy of his manners.

"I believe," said he, addressing Anderson, "you have the care of a young girl, whose mother died some years since?"

"You mean the daughter of Annie Macleod?"

"The same; and it is to ascertain her situation in your family, that I have taken the liberty to wait upon you."

"Her situation in my family, my good sir," said the worthy man, "is that of a daughter to myself—a sister to my children. The calamity which robbed her so early of her mother was an inducement, but certainly not the only one, to my becoming her protector.—I was acquainted with her mother in the happier years of her life; and the friendship which I had felt for Annie Macleod revived in full force when duty conducted me to her death-bed. I there pledged myself to be a father to the fatherless; to keep her unspotted from the world—the pitiless world, as the dying mother called it, in the lucid intervals of her wandering mind."

"What!" said the stranger; "did sorrow overcome her reason?"

"Alas! yes; for many weeks before her death they told me that her senses were completely gone; and when I saw her in the last mortal struggle, the delirium of mind, was only partially broken in upon by flashes of reason."

The features of the stranger became convulsed, and he seemed to wrestle with some violent emotion.

"You were a friend—perhaps relative, of the unfortunate Annie?" rejoined Anderson.

"Yes—I was a friend;—that is, I—I—knew her," said the stranger.

"Then you will like to see my little charge;" and without waiting reply, the good pastor left the apartment; but almost immediately returned, holding by the hand a pretty fair-haired girl, with dark blue eyes, that seemed made for weeping. "This," said Anderson, leading her towards the stranger, "is Alice Macleod, or, as she calls herself, Birdalane."

The stranger drew her to him; and taking her hand, gazed long and earnestly in her blushing face. "Why do you call yourself Birdalane, my pretty child?"

"Because nurse called me so, when she used to cry over me, and say I had no mother and no father to love me, and give me pretty things, like Donald and Ellen Anderson."

The stranger's eye fell, and tears hung upon the dark lashes that swept his cheeks. He rose, and walked to the window; and Anderson heard the long-drawn sigh that seemed to burst from a heart laden with old remembrances. Presently turning to the pastor, he said "I am satisfied, good sir, fully satisfied, that this friendless one cannot be in better hands, to fulfil her mother's wish, and keep her 'unspotted from the world.'" Then presenting a sealed packet, he added, warmly grasping Anderson's hand, "Be still a father to that orphan girl, and God requite you tenfold in blessing upon your own!" He stooped down, kissed the wondering Alice and hastily left the apartment. Anderson went to the window, and in a few moments he saw a groom lead out two horses. The stranger mounted one, and putting spurs to his steed, Anderson soon lost sight of him in the windings of the road.

The worthy pastor, dismissing the little Alice to her playmates, prepared to open the packet. In an envelope, upon which was written—"A marriage portion for the daughter of Annie Macleod," was a draft for one thousand pounds; and on a paper folded round a small miniature the following words: "A likeness of Annie, such as she was when the writer first knew her. 'Tis now but the shadow of a shade. The beauty, gaiety, and innocence it would perpetuate, are gone, like the hopes of him, who still clings to the memory of what she was, with all the tenacious regret of an undying remorse."

Some time after this event, business called Anderson to Edinburgh. One day, while perambulating the streets on his various engagements, he saw the self-same figure which remained imprinted on his memory—the identical mysterious stranger, who had visited him at the Manse, issue from the castle gates, and descend with a slow step and melancholy air down the high street. Curiosity, or perhaps a better feeling, prompted Anderson to follow at a distance, and ascertain who he was. It was Lord ———.

"'Tis even as I thought," said the good pastor; "poor Annie fell a victim to the arts of Lord ———. Alas! he was too accomplished a seducer, for such artlessness as her's to cope with."

The sweet ties that bind the sons of virtue to their social fireside are too simple for the epicurean taste of the libertine: the tender interchange of wedded minds the endearing caress of legitimate love, are simple wild flowers, that wither in the hot-bed of sensuality a corrupt heart. Never can the proud joy, the refined pleasures of a faithful husband, be his.

Birdalane, means in Scotch the last, or only one of their race—one who has outlived all ties.

For high the bliss that waits on wedded love,
Best, purest emblem of the bliss above:
To draw new raptures from another's joy,
To share each pang, and half its sting destroy,
Of one fond heart to be the slave and lord,
Bless and be bless'd, adore and be ador'd —
To own the link of soul, the chain of mind,
Sublimest friendship, passion most refined,—
Passion, to life's evening hour still warm,
And friendship, brightest in the darkest stor.

To conclude. The little Alice never left the Manse, where she lived as her mother wished, "unspotted from the world." As she grew to womanhood, her simple beauty and artless manners won the affections of Donald Anderson, the son of her benefactor. They were married, and often when Alice looked upon the smiling cherubs that climbed her maternal knee, the silver-headed pastor, as he sat by the ingle in his elbow chair, would put an arch expression, and ask her where was little Birdalene now? while Alice, blushing, and laughing, would draw her little nestlers closer to her womanly bosom, and so answer the good man.

After a life of active charity, full of years and good deeds, the venerable pastor of — slept the sleep of peace, in that church where he had often roused others from a darker slumber than that of death. After his decease, and written in the neat old-fashioned hand of his father, Donald Anderson found amongst his papers a manuscript, dated many years back, containing the history of Annie Macleod; which with some slight alterations, and the omission of particular names, (for obvious reasons,) is now submitted to those readers, whose hearts will not permit their heads to criticise a simple and unadorned tale.

CHARACTER.

From the Picayune.

"A POCKET FULL OF ROCKS."

VR FUN AT THE HOT SPRINGS OF ARKANSAS.

Among the thousand and one cant terms and slang expressions used in the West and South-West, there is none that has obtained a greater celebrity than that which heads this article. It comes in play more frequently, is more significant than any other, and when we hear a man say, "Here I am in town, with a pocket full of rocks," we know to use another common but cant phrase, that he is 'on hand,' for almost any thing. If a man has money to settle a demand, his "pocket is full of rocks;" if he is willing to undertake a perilous enterprise, his "pocket is full of rocks;" should he express himself well to do in the world, equally ready for business or pleasure, he has a "pocket full of rocks," as the thing is perfectly understood. If to this he add "and no poor relations," then his credit is fully established. Having said this much to define the expressions we will now give the reader its origin.

Several summers since there was assembled at the Hot Springs of Arkansas, a large number of gentlemen from the different Southern and Western States. The utmost good fellowship and harmony prevailed among them until the arrival of two men, opposite to each other in manners and habits, in all save one thing—they both contrived to render themselves extremely annoying and disagreeable to the rest of the visitors.

One of them was a low, rowdyish native of the Emerald Isle, whom shall call O'Whack—a bullying fellow, always bragging of his knowledge of the art and mystery of knocking his fellow men down according to the latest and most approved methods—in other words a 'scientific' man. He was the sole owner and possessor of a race-nag, named Chain-lightning, and was always ready to make up a match where ever he was sure of win.

The other individual shall "hand down" with the cognomen of Major Bluster. So far as the title goes he was a 'sure enough' major, who had fought, and gallantly, too, in the war. He was a very small man, pugnacious in the extreme—always engaged in some fight, and completely out of his element unless he was in a quarrel. He wore a hickory bark coat—so called from its being colored with a decoction from the bark of that tree—which was very long, and had deep pockets in the sides. He was always bragging of his skill at flinging rocks, of which there were a plenty in the vicinity of the Springs, and he really could throw them with a force and accuracy which was astonishing. He, too, was the possessor of a race-nag named Pepper.

Strangers to each other, O'Whack and Bluster were not long in forming an acquaintance, such as it was, with the gentlemen of the village. By their intrusions they soon got the ill-will of every body, until at length a meeting was called and measures taken to rid the neighborhood of their presence. Bluster was a dangerous character, as he occupied a position which gave him the standing of a gentleman, but O'Whack they cared nothing about—he could be driven off at any time. A committee was finally formed whose business it was to wait upon the latter. They told him he must do one of the two things—either clear out the major, or clear out himself—there was no two ways about it, one or the other he must do. O'Whack chose the former, as a matter of course, and immediately set about the business.

Soon meeting with the Major on a beautiful green where all the visitors resorted, and which was divested of roots, stumps and rocks, he abruptly accosted him with,

"Look here, my little hop o' my thumb you must lave these diggins."

"Do what?" said the Major, blustering up to O'Whack, who was nearly four times his size.

"You must lave."

"You're joking."

"Am I?" retorted O'Whack. "Now, look here, my cock-sparrow, I tell ye, ye must clear yourself—away wid ye. I niver was more in earnest in me life. Jist go away peaceably and quietly like a gentleman, and don't put me to any throuble at all."

"You don't mean what you say?" said the Major, who was half mad, and at the same time at a loss to know what the fellow meant by such uncommon conduct.

"Don't mean it, do I?" continued O'Whack, "If you ain't off wid yourself immediately you'll see whether I mane it."

The major was now bailing over. "Perhaps you want to get me into a fight?" said he.

"Jist suit yourself, and I'm content," answered O'Whack.

Take that, then, said Bluster, as with the quickness of a cat, he gave his adversary a tremendous slap on the side of the face. This was all O'Whack wanted. Instantly throwing himself into an attitude, he squared away, and by a well directed blow, sent Bluster some ten feet flat upon his back. The little man was not in the least frightened, for he was up and at O'Whack again in a twinkling. The same result followed a second blow from the latter, and Bluster again measured his length upon the ground. He looked around, but there were no rocks to be seen, and he pitched at his adversary with his fists. A third, a fourth, and a fifth time, he was knocked down. Every soul in the vicinity was present, and all could not but admire the game of the major. After having been 'laid out' some ten or a dozen times by the superior 'science' and size of O'Whack, the Major finally came to the conclusion that he would 'lave' as first requested. He never cried 'enough,' however, but instead of 'coming up to the scratch' for another 'round,' he silently made his way to a sapling where Pepper was tied, jumped upon her in a twinkling, turned and gave his adversary one grin of defiance, his face looking like a huckle berry pudding all the while, put spurs to his nag, and was soon out of sight.

Sincere were the congratulations which passed among the gentlemen present, at the riddance of the pugnacious Major. O'Whack was allowed to swagger about, by special permission, for that afternoon only, they intended to give him his 'walking paper' the next morning. The great fight had taken place early in the afternoon, and as the sun gradually sank in the west, and was winding up his day's work, all thoughts that there was such an individual in existence as Major Bluster were banished from the minds of those who had seen his defeat and exit—the hero was forgotten. Some were amusing themselves with ball playing, others with pitching quaita, while the invalids were carelessly looking on, when suddenly the veritable Bluster himself, mounted upon Pepper was seen turning a corner of the road about two hundred yards distant, at a smart gallop. The pockets of his hickory bark coat were noticed to hang plumb by the side of Pepper, and nearly reached the ground and as he gradually neared the party, a fierce determination, mixed up with revenge, could be plainly seen upon his bruised and battered face. He suddenly pulled up at the identical sapling from whence he started, threw the bridle over a limb, pulled the right side of his hickory bark coat over Pepper, jumped off himself, and after coolly surveying the spectators of his terrible defeat exclaimed, with an air of great firmness and decision.

"Well gentlemen, here I am, in town, with a pocket full of rocks. Where is that overgrown bully I had the little skirmish with, a short time since? I want another turn with that chap, big as he is."

O'Whack was standing relating his exploits to a smaller party, some twenty yards distant. The sharp eye of Bluster immediately was full upon him.

"Look here, Mr. O'Whack, you may be great at knocking a man down on scientific principles but when it comes to flinging rocks, I'm thar myself. Now, you must clear." This was uttered by Bluster with great force and determination.

O'Whack looked at his opponent with contempt.

He had not the slightest idea of the force and accuracy with which the major could throw stones, as the Yankees expressed it, and acting upon this belief he retorted—

"Go to the devil wid your self: don't be after bothering me wid your nonsense."

"Clear—leave, I tell you," said the now exasperated major, "or I'll be into you like a thousand of brick, sure."

O'Whack made no motion towards starting.

"Will you leave the drive?" shouted Bluster.

O'Whack replied with an oath that he would not.

"Then take that!" said the major, accompanying the words with a rock, which he had pulled from his pocket, and which he flung at the head of O'Whack with a force which fairly made it hum. The latter stooped and dodged his head down, but Bluster had made his calculation for this movement, and the rock hitting him directly in the back of his thick skull pitched him directly on his face. Before the stunned and astonished O'Whack could gain his feet, Bluster had planted another directly in the same spot, and the 'scientific' man gave his mother another kiss. Every attempt at scrambling up, the major would balk by one of his pills applied to the same spot. Finding his game a losing one, and that he stood no chance of making any thing by it, O'Whack finally sung out 'enough,' was permitted to gain his feet and started for his nag. Bluster could not resist the temptation of hitting him once in the side as he was getting upon Chain Lightning, again in the back after he was mounted, and a third rock carried away his hat after he had started.—O'Whack never stopped to recover it, but was soon seen turning a corner of the road, going in quartering time, and has never made his appearance at the Hot Springs of Arkansas since.

Major Bluster maintained his ground—has since been "the big dog of the tanyard" there, and executed all the barking; and even to this day, catch him where you will, he is always In town with a pocket full of rocks."

WARNING TO NURSES.—The influence of passion in the mother or nurse on the system of the child is strikingly illustrated in a case mentioned in the excellent little work of Dr. Von Ammon, physician to the King of Saxony. "A Carpenter fell into a quarrel with a soldier billeted in his house, and was set upon by the latter with his drawn sword. The wife of the carpenter at first trembled from fear and terror, and then suddenly threw herself between the combatants, wrested the sword from the soldier's hand, broke it in pieces, and threw it away. During the tumult, some neighbors came in and separated the men. While in this state of strong excitement the mother took up the child from the cradle, where it lay playing in the most perfect health, never before having had a moment's illness; she gave it the breast, and in so doing sealed its fate. In a few minutes the infant left off sucking, became restless, panted, and sunk dead on its mother's bosom. The physician, who was instantly called in, found the child lying in the cradle, as if asleep, and with its features quite undisturbed; but all his resources were fruitless. The child was irrecoverably gone. It is seldom that so remarkable a case occurs in private life; but there are, unfortunately, by many in which perpetually recurring fits of ordinary bad temper, especially near or during the time of sucking, produce similar effects, in a slower and more gradual manner, but with almost equal certainty; and, if any thing can exert a salutary influence on mothers who are prone to the indulgence of passion, it must be the warning of such a case as that of the carpenter's wife. Combe on the Management of Infancy.

To those subscribers not residing in the vicinity of an Agent, we cannot urge too strongly the necessity of punctuality on their part. We have none of the advantages which usually belong to other newspapers—AN ADVERTISING PATRONAGE, and hence, an additional necessity for promptness on the part of our friends. We will still receive the $2 in payment for the year, although the time has passed, if it is done immediately. If Money can be sent through a post master, free of postage.

DR. POTTER'S LECTURE BEFORE THE YOUNG MEN'S ASSOCIATION.—This opening lecture to the season's course, was honored with a crowded house and most attentive audience. It was gratifying to see at the first introductory in the new and commodious Rooms so full an attendance. The young men were there in great numbers, and the middle-aged and the grey-haired and a large proportion of Ladies.

The lecturer in a happy manner seized upon the attention of his hearers, by presenting to them the condition of a savage as he must have appeared five thousand years ago in his wigwam upon the eastern hills of the valley, and then contrasting it with the present condition of man occupying the same situation, but in a mansion adorned with all that Architectural taste can furnish. This mighty change had been all wrought by the advancement of mind. After an half hour's contemplation of the present elevated position of man—his great powers, his high destinies and responsibilities, clothed in fine and appropriate language, he entered upon the duty, to which from his station among us, as well as his years, he felt himself particularly bound to invite attention. However in this we did not think the Dr. as felicitous as in the remarks which preceded. Counsel from the experienced to the young should beyond question be extended. Youth has quicksand to avoid and shining paths to find—the advanced in life have passed over the ground and know full well the difficulties that attend every step of the pilgrimage. In the discipline of mind there is great need of suggestion and gentle leading. But there is a way of doing this. No counsel is effective or at all to be valued unless it be so given as to secure its object. That the purest motives actuated the learned divine we know full well, nor do we believe that the end which he hoped to accomplish—that of arousing a spirit of thorough and systematic enquiry among the young men, and a disposition to improve to the utmost the great privileges they enjoy—that this end even in a degree was effected. It might perhaps be difficult to point out the specific defects of this portion of the lecture—those peculiarities that rendered it so without power; but there was a tameness, a want of enthusiasm, a destitution of glow and fire, which the nature of the subject is calculated to inspire. The mere mention that intellectual duty requires sacrifice and exertion of a certain character, produces no permanent result.—Men move because they are impelled. The feelings must be enkindled, or the impetus to action will be feeble.

FANNY ELSSLER—vs.—THE MONUMENT.—Altho' we are not to be numbered among those devoted admirers of the "divine Fanny," that have on sundry occasions, "bowed down and worshiped" her; yet we cannot help looking upon the miserable attempt at indignation which a certain portion of the Press is disposed to cast upon her $1000 presentation for the benefit of the Bunker Hill Monument, as extremely absurd, and entirely unworthy the high-minded republican spirit which the gentlemen are so open to profess. And if one part of this tirade has offended us more than another, it is that in which the President of the association, the veteran of the Courier, has participated, by making a seeming apology to the public for accepting the patriotic offering. It will be recollected that on several occasions the Committee for the monument had, without avail, made many appeals to public generosity for assistance in their undertaking, and that at the time which Fanny—with a liberality consistent with her means,—made the handsome donation, a Fair for its aid was being held in Boston by the ladies of New England. Now it seems to us, that at such a time, nothing could have been more appropriate and acceptable, than such a present from such a source.—But it is objected that the giver is a dancer, and therefore—following out the theory—she ought not be allowed the high satisfaction of participating in any noble object. "We do not pretend to say how far this may be expedient reasoning, but we are free to confess that with our present obtuse sense of things, we are unable to divine its magnanimity. May not a dancer be possessed of some of the generous sympathies common to nature? may she not, as well as others of her sex, acquire the same glow of patriotism—and, above all, may she not be able to understand and feel the torturing jest and idle sneer, which the heartless seem so ready to cast upon her best motives?

GRAMM'S MAGAZINE.—This is the union of the Casket and the Gentlemen's Magazine. We are not aware that Burton holds a controlling influence in the conducting of it—if he does, its readers will of course be prepared still to take his delightful mixtures of laughs and groans.

THE REMAINS OF GEN. MERCER, were on the 20th Nov. placed under a splendid monument at Laurel Hill, Philadelphia. This is a tribute to great worth, which is as commendable to those who engaged in it, as deserved by the man whom they honor. However, the intimate of Washington and the apostle of liberty, has in Culloden of his native country, and Princeton, of his adopted, monuments lofty as thought, and durable as time.

NICHOLS' AMPHITHEATRE, AMUSEMENTS, &c.—

This establishment opened on Monday evening last, to a large and fashionable audience, and has continued to be well sustained through the week. It certainly deserves encouragement; for "take it all in all," it is the most splendid affair in the country—as regards edifice, company, and richness of decoration. The "chivalric tournament," is the most gorgeous display of equestrianism, that we have ever witnessed, and is in strict historical accordance with the age of chivalry, so glowingly depicted in Scott's Kenilworth, and Ivanhoe. As Mr. Nichols, has expended upwards of $10,000 (as we are assured) in providing a respectable place of amusement for our citizens, it is to be hoped that he will realise his just expectations. All those objectionable features which we regret to say, has usually followed our theatres, is removed, and every assurance is given, that the utmost propriety and decorum, will on all occasions be observed. It is proper to note this fact, because the success and respectability of the establishment, will mainly rest on the countenance which the ladies give it. We are aware, that a diversity of opinion exists, in the minds of many in regard to the propriety of certain amusements, which has always appeared to us to be founded in a misapprehension of the fitness of things. It is not the enacting of a play in a "theatre," which constitutes immorality; for the noblest sentiments which ever emanated from the pen of genius, have, and are uttered in a "play house;" but it is the bad uses which follow in the train of a badly conducted theatre, which constitutes its immorality. Sociability and enjoyment are naturally engrafted in the composition of man; and we believe men oftener commit evil from necessity than from choice. Those good people who live in our world, and who are termed "respectable" and "moral," are often more accountable for the evils in society, than the dream of. The reason is, that in many cases, they adopt a certain standard of action and judgment, which poor old human nature can never come up to, and which must forever effectually close the door to their usefulness in society. Let the virtuous, and real, mix in our places of amusements, and give a character, to our public assemblies, and we should see a change for the better; and for the simple reason, that the vicious and profligate cannot in the future of things breathe the same atmosphere with the virtuous and good. Vice will ever shrink away from the withering frown of virtue. Who that has joined the middle age of man, but can look back thirty years ago at the then innocent enjoyments of youthful youthful pleasures; and can contrast that "prudent" age of harmlessness, with the present "intelligent" age of sin and loathsome depravity. Then, many a time and oft," has the good "dominie," frowned the "mazy dance," with his presence of approbation (dancing now is a forbidden sin) undecious of evil, while his flock looked up to his countenance with respect, and practised obedience. Then were few rowdies, few gin-shops, few loafers, and few "reformers." But it is not our intention to preach a sermon. The world will have places of amusement, and whether they are to be made respectable pests to society, is a serious question to be answered by the "moral" and "religious" of this and other communities. We have always been of the opinion, that our popular amusements needs as much of a philanthropic view, as some other very "philanthropic" efforts, from which we could never perceive that such benefit arose.—When we find ourselves mistaken, we will acknowledge our error.

LEDDINGS, the murderer of his wife, whose case we noticed last week, was respited at the solicitation of several of the clergymen of the city, on the ground that he was totally unfit to meet his awful fate. If report speaks true, of Leddings, we think the law will have to wait some time for that preparation which the law contemplates, and which has already been given him. The poor unfortunate wretch, will now cling to hope, and we have no notion that the 14 days respite will find him any better off, than the former day. The movements of the clergy in this matter, did honor to their hearts, and the governor in his interference, was no doubt prompted by considerations, which no executive would scarcely resist;—but still we think it wrong; because we believe any interference with Justice, to be impolitic. The sound views which the Governor took in Rathbun's case, should be an earnest in all cases. When the majesty of the law is violated, let the certainty of its execution follow. Then, will our laws become a "terror to evil doers." Every executive should set on the Throne of Justice, with the sternness and inflexibility of a Brutus, and in his official character, the "milk of human kindness" should never be allowed to flow through his veins.

We have received several Masonic favors, which shall be attended to in due time. We again repeat, that all Masonic intelligence, such as elections, addresses, festivals, &c. &c., will find a welcome with us.

PROFIT AND LOSS.—We received by this morning's mail, a letter, charged double postage, 50 cents, and enclosing a $2. note, 15 per cent discount, making the snug little tax of 80 cents. Now, we do not find fault with the quality of the money, for it was undoubtedly the best to be had, and a printer is to be put down as an ungrateful fellow, who will turn up his nose at a subscription only 15 per cent against him; but we do complain when we are taxed double postage; when if our friend had just handed the note to the post master, we should not have been minus 50cts. For the 69th time, we will just mention, that post masters are authorized by law, to enclose money to a printer free from postage.

A CHANGE.—The Plain Dealer, one of the dailies of this city, has changed its name and appearance; and comes to us under the title of the Evening Atlas. It makes its appearance on a new type, and its columns exhibit talent and industry. It is published by Vance & Wendell, very worthy young men, bating their localism, for which they are not to be despised, although we whigs, have beaten them so shamefully.—Nil desperandum. &c.

The works of Bolingbroke are about being issued in a handsome style, from the press of Cary and Hart. The same publishers are also about issuing the Biographies by Henry Roscoe. Both these works, will doubtless be in great demand.

THE CULTIVATOR.—This truly deservedly useful publication, devoted to the agricultural interests of the country, is about commencing another volume, the 8th. The editor says, "If an increase of subscription, beyond precedent, in the history of Agricultural Journals—if the almost unanimous voice of the public press in our favor—if the multitude of private yet flattering testimonials we have received, added to a circulation, amounting the first year to twenty two thousand, may be admitted as evidence then we have most certainly abundant reason to be gratified," &c. Terms $1. per annum. Six copies for $5.

CHINA.—Hunt's Magazine, for December says, that the territory of China comprises an area of one million eighty thousand square miles, and according to a late census, a population of three hundred and sixty millions; being 180 persons to a square mile, and three acres and a half only to each person.

POETRY.

PRIZE ADDRESS,

Delivered at the opening of Mr. S. Nichols' New Amphitheatre in this city, December 7, 1840.

[WRITTEN BY A. B. STREET, ESQ.]

To lift from Age Time's burthen for a while,
And light the brow of Manhood with a smile—
Repress the tear and hush the sorrowing sigh,
And bid mirth sparkle in the youthful eye;
With Pleasure's golden pinions plume the hours,
And muffle their quick feet with thornless flowers;
Display the wondrous strength and grace that Heaven
To this proud fabric of the soul has given—
The sway despotic, human reason wilds—
The tame submission brutish instinct yields;
These are our objects. Is a guerdon due?
Kindness and favor then, we ask of you.
Round the wide arena, now the fiery steed [speed:
Loos'd from his thralldom bounds with headlong

Free seems he as the tempest, yet a rein
Is o'er him stronger than the weightiest chain;
An eye and voice, whose slightest glance and sound
Plant him a breathing statue on the ground,
Eager and watchful: then their different sway
Shoots him again, an arrow on his way.
With a light leap as upward borne by wings,
To the fleet courser's back, his rider springs:
Around—around—the flying centaur skims
And to the sight in dizzy circles swims.
Now on his surging pedestal uncheck'd
Whirling along the rider stands erect; [bound,
Pois'd with stretch'd arms, now leans; with sudden
Now to the eye another change is found;
Then leaping o'er some barrier in his way,
Regains his platform like a bird its spray,
While the gay harlequin in motley drest
Draws the loud laugh with gambol quaint and jest.

Fancy flies back to those old classic days
Which witness'd GREECE, in glory's brightest blaze:
That purple clime, once Freedom's proudest dower,
Cradle of Arts, the Muses' greenest bower.
Again the AMPHITHEATRE displays
Its splendid pomp to ATHENS' crowded gaze;—
Tier upon tier of animated life
To view the struggling race—the wrestling strife—
The strong athlete grasps his sinewy foe
Muscle strains muscle—blow succeeds to blow—
The foaming courser whirls the chariot on
And the green laurel crowns the triumph won.

Thus do we strive your cheering smiles to gain
With anxious efforts: shall we strive in vain?
To cast bright drops in Life's dark chalice, ours;
To deck earth's desert with a few sweet flowers:
Yours be the meed that all our toil repays [praise.
Our gladdening laurel-wreath, the bounty of your

THE OUTLAW AND HIS LOVE

There is a German tradition that the daughter of one of the Rhineland lords fell in love with one of the gallant outlaws that then held their huntings and robberies alike in the remnants of the Hercynian Forest. The hunter in a fit of generosity, urged her to return to her father. The tradition farther states that the lady prevailed on her lover to accompany her to the castle, and the old Castellan, overcome by this penitent magnanimity, pardoned both.

Oh welcome! welcome here my sweet,
Gay wanderers we shall be;
In winter's frown and summer's heat,
At least we shall be free.

The running stream shall cool our wine,
Our fruits be on the bough;
And! many a high born heart may pine,
To be as we are now;

What care we sweet, for lordly halls,

When in the shade we lie,
These trees shall be our palace walls,
Our painted roof and sky.

What want we music when the birds,
On every hawthorn sing?
And when I hear thy honeyed words,
Earth has no happier king.

What care we for the revelry
That hides the bosom's pain?
Beneath the plume and purple eye
Have hearts been broke in twain.

Wild as the forest and the wind,
We'll have our fearless glee;
For me thou hast the world resigned,
I'll brave the world for thee!

Thine eye shall be my star at night,
Thy lip my morning rose;
Then come the tempest fierce or light,
I care not how it blows!

Yet go! an evil life I lead,
An evil death must die!
Thou must not tread the path I tread,
Nor lie where I must lie.

My name, my mad career, my fate,
No human tongue must tell!
Return thee, ere it be too late—
Farewell—one kiss—farewell!

RELIGION.

BY THE REV. W. H. BATHURST.

What is Religion? not an empty name—
Sound without sense—a torch without a flame;
It is a principle of life divine,
That makes the heart rejoice, the actions shine;
That gives high motives to the earthly soul,
And brings it under God's supreme control.
It is a union with the Power above,
Whose ways are holy, and whose name is Love;
The stirring of his Spirit in the heart,
That bids the will submit, and sin depart;
Lights the soul's darkness, heals its festering sores,
And the lost image of its God restores;
Imparts the power to love, the wish to pray,
And bids it wing to heaven its joyous way.

Great God! resolve our doubts, our souls possess,
And make us thine in truth and righteousness;
Teach us in Jesus' name to seek thy throne,
And may his blood for all our sins atone;
May we in him be wholly formed anew,
And with fresh zeal our heavenward course pursue.
Saved by his power, and quickened by his grace,
May we be fitted to behold thy face;
And find that true Religion can bestow
The only sure relief for every woe;
That it provides unfailing comfort here,
And deathless glory in a brighter sphere.

The last number of the Quarterly Review contains an admirable article interspersed with extracts, on the modern poetesses of England. The following is quoted as a favorable specimen of the powers of Mrs. Southy (formerly Miss Catharine Bowles):

THE PAUPER'S DEATH BED.

TREAD softly, bow the head,
In reverent silence bow,
No passing bell doth toll,
Yet an immortal soul
Is passing now.

Stranger! however great,
With lowly reverence bow;
There is one in that poor shed—
One by that paltry bed
Greater than thou.

Beneath that beggar's roof
Lo, Death doth keep his state!
Enter, no crowds attend—

Enter, no guards defend
This palace gate.

That pavement, damp and cold,
No smiling courtiers tread,
One silent woman stands,
Lifting with meagre hands,
A dying head.

No mingling voices sound:
An infant wail alone,
A sob suppressed—again
That short, deep gasp, and then
The parting groan.

Oh change! Oh wondrous change!
Burst are the prison bars:
This moment there, so low,
So agonized—and now
Beyond the stars!

Oh change! stupendous change!
There lies the soulless clod;
The sun eternal breaks—
The new immortal wakes—
Wakes with his God.

WINTER.

BY MRS. CATHARINE P. ESLING.

A sigh for the leafless trees,
A sigh for the lonely wood,
And a swift career to the passing breeze,
And its stormy breath so rude.

Thou art come like a warrior brave,
To a battle just begun;
And for trophies, thou hast brought the grave,
And a cold and chilling sun.

See the stricken leaves look down
From the topmost branch to thee,
And they wither at thy angry frown,
For it is their destiny.

Like a monarch in his might,
Or a conqueror in the field,
Thou hast put the routed ranks to flight,
And hast made the vassals yield.

And how proudly o'er the slain
Do thy giant footsteps tread;
But vaunt not thou, for thy tyrant reign
Is over the feeble dead.

Away on thy wings of pride,
Thou hoary and aged king,
For thy white locks may not long abide
Where thou now art journeying.

Then sigh for the leafless trees,
And sigh for the lonely wood,
And a swift career to the passing breeze,
With its stormy breath so rude.

SAMUEL'S WISH.

I want to marry—yes I do—
I want a little wife,
To comb my hair and wash my neck,
And be my all—my life.

Ven Adam lived in Paradise,
He didn't live content,
Till from his side a rib was took,
And into a woman bent.

Just think how Adam must have stared
Ven first he got awake,
To find himself a married man,
Without e'en wedding cake.

I'm werry bashful—yes, I am—
'Twould save me lots of trouble,
To go to bed a single man,
And wake up as a double.

ADAM'S SLEEP.

He laid him down and slept—and from his side
A woman in her magic beauty rose;
Dazzled and charm'd, he called that woman "bride"
And his last sleep became his last repose.

A DIALOGUE.

ON THE SUBJECT OF MASONRY.

The Author of the following dialogue owes it, perhaps, to the reader, to say why he has written and published it.

It is known that many pious laymen as well as ministers of the church have entertained opinionous prejudicial to the society of Feemasons; and while they have doubted its moral and christian tendency, have of course, cherished the idea that the union of professors of religion, but, more especially, ministers, with that society, was incompatible with the spirit of christianity, and, therefore, to be strongly discouraged.—Differently impressed, however, many pious laymen and many upright and zealous laborers in the “vineyard of the Lord” have, at various times, attached themselves to the Lodge. Viewing Masonry, if not actually christian in its character, an excellent and moral institution—as the hand maid of religion, as tending, under proper regulations, to advance the interests and happiness of the human family, they have acted from the dictates of conscience and the purest possible impulse. It is not known that in a single instance, they have had reason to regret the step.—On the contrary, the world has still hailed them as “burning and shining lights of the church militant;” while in the halls dedicated to Masonry, they are often seen adding, by the sacredness of their character, and the sanctity and dignity of their deportment, to the interest and solemnity natural to the occasion. Strange then—most strange that an opposition should be reared to an institution which great and good men, and eminent servants of God have delighted to countenance and maintain; an opposition, in some instances, amounting almost to the spirit of persecution and that by men who profess, as indeed they are, to be in acquaintance with its principles, its history, its tendency and design by the professed disciples of the mild Prince of Peace! Such unfortunately, is the fact. The writer of this little dialogue is not among the least remarkable instances: his heart has bled in secret at the unkind thoughts which have been entertained towards him by many of his beloved professing brethren in the church since he attached himself to the masonic fraternity.—But justly sustained as he hopes and believes by purity of intention and propriety of conduct, he derives comfort and satisfaction.

To endeavor to remove the offence of brethren, who entertain prejudices against Masonry, and those who belong to that order, is the main object of the writer. He has chosen the form of dialogue as the more familiar mode of communicating what he had to say.— He has studied simplicity in his manner, and endeavored to adapt his language to the apprehension of the plainest understanding. Error is often founded in honest misconception; in the christian world we are bound to believe it is always so. I, therefore flatter myself that I may be instrumental in removing the prejudices of many candid and dispassionate mind on the subject of Freemasonry.

DIALOGUE.

Dear Brother, do you not think it imperiously necessary that ministers of the holy sanctuary should be of the same mind, and walk by the same rule, and labor to maintain the true spirit of the gospel in all things among their brethren?

Mason. Most assuredly I do; and think it would be truly criminal in a minister to deviate voluntarily from that golden rule, by which the church of God should ever be governed and directed.

Minister. Your answer thus far is truly decisive and clear; but have we not deviated from this golden rule by uniting with the masonic fraternity? In doing this have you left the church of God and entered in close connexion with the world; or is this uniting the church and the world together?

Mason. If the constitution, principles, and design of Masonry stand in direct opposition to the gospel, I am certainly criminated. The very reverse of which is the fact; 1st, Because its constitution is morality; its principles faith, hope, and its design the improvement of human society, and universal benevolence to man. I would therefore say it is no deviation from that golden rule; for the gospel requires the same. 2nd, A departure from the church of God, is a rejection of the doctrine and government of Christ, and a voluntary failure in performing the duties of religion; which I trust, I have never done but feel a strong attachment to both. 3d. It cannot be uniting the church and world; nor is it forming that close connexion with the world that the scriptures forbid, for the following reasons: A minister joining Masons gives Masons no liberty to interfere with the discipline and government of the church; nor do they attempt to infringe the rights and privileges of church members; but a minister whose duty it is to seek the salvation of men, by joining the Masons, has every privilege of enforcing the laws of that moral institution, which it is his duty in faithfulness to perform: and the presumption is, he may be the honored instrument of winning them over to the church. To enter into close connexion with the world in a spiritual sense, is to unite with the world in forsaking and slighting the laws of religion, and engage with them in the perpetration of crimes. Masons, when in their Lodges, are not suffered with impunity to act immorally. The attendance of a minister at their meetings is always acceptable, and cannot fail to be productive of good, if he is a good man; and if he acts out the character of a minister, Masons will spurn him from the presence as an impostor. Why may it not be said, and it is not hopeful too, that a minister's lectures among Masons, if they be unconverted, may have a similar effect on them as did the visit of our dear Saviour to the house of Matthew, the publican, although he was called a bad man by the Pharisees, because he eat with sinners? Yet his visit to the house of Matthew resulted in his conversion, and after usefulness as an Apostle.

Min. If Masonry is this good moral institution why is it kept secret from the world !

Mas. It is not concealed as a secret from any who are worthy to receive it, if they apply in due form as laid down in the constitutions.

Min. What is requisite to constitute a person worthy of membership?

Mas. It must be a sober, honest, and discreet person, of whom real confidence can be confided.

Min. Are there none such among the females? If so, why are they deemed the benefits of this great and good institution?

Mas. There are no doubt as many unspotted characters among females as males. This is not the reason of their rejection as members; nor are they denied the benefits arising from this society. The ceremonies and secrecy of Masonry, are not the characteristics of its intrinsic value; but it is their benevolence, charity and good will to mankind, of which it was intended that females should largely share.

Min. But why are they not admitted into your body?

Mas. Why are not females permitted to occupy political and military stations, or rule in the church of God? yet they enjoy all the benefits arising from institutions political, military, and ecclesiastical, and are esteemed as our dear companions in the enjoyment of all their advantages, and equally so in Masonry.

Min. It is my opinion that the nature and what is essential to Masonry, is in direct opposition to the gospel of Christ: the one conceals and wraps you in darkness—the other calls you out of darkness into marvelous light.

Mas. If it is admitted that darkness and light cannot dwell together, to me it appears easy to confute the last idea suggested, by showing the likeness between the gospel and Masonic requisitions. Religion has for its foundation the bible. Masonry has the same. Religion requires reverence to God and love to man. Masonry requires the same. Religion calls us to relieve the wants of our distressed brethren, in which professors fail. Masonry requires the same, and steps forward and performs it. The Gospel requires its subjects to support her ministers. Masons never turn their empty away. Religion is abused when her subjects are left unopited to suffer, which is the case with many who are compelled to take up their residence with the poor of the parish. Masonry would be abused, if this was the fate of her members; but none of them are passed unpitied, and left on the parish; nor even their widows and orphans forsaken.—The Gospel forbids brother going to law with brother. Masonry also forbids the same. The gospel calls us to deal privately with an offending brother, and to avoid backbiting and evil speaking. This is also the positive injunction of Masonry. The gospel breathes a spirit of humane affection. Now, I ask how can this be in direct opposition to the gospel—how does this conceal and wrap me in darkness?

Min. My meaning in the above remark is, that the secrecy itself is darkness; for we are commanded to let our light shine, that others may see our good works, and glorify our Father which art in heaven. Now if that part called the secret is light, why conceal that much of the light from the world? How does this correspond with the Gospel?

Mas. The gospel has its secrets too; for, says David, the secret of the Lord is with them that fear him and he will show unto them his covenant; also says Solomon, a garden enclosed is my sister, &c. &c. which inculcates evangelical charity and a blessed and holy cement. The secret covenant of Masonry is that which forms their humane cement, without interrupting religion, and strongly inculcates natural charity and benevolence; the administration of which is letting our light shine before men, and acts as an handmaid to the Gospel, and binds us to perform our duty to brethren; which Gospel brethren although bound, fail to perform. Now, if acts of benevolence and charity really performed, no matter by whom, is agreeable to scripture, how can this stand, direct opposition to the Gospel—how does this engulf us in darkness?

Min. You enter into darkness, when you solemnly affirm that you will keep that secret which you know not, and cannot tell whether it be good or evil before you enter into the covenant of secrecy. Is not this presumption? Do you not place yourself in a situation of extreme difficulty, when called on by your brethren to investigate your cause.

Mas. My dear Brother, if you were a Mason, soon would the tone of your words be changed; but, as you are not, and, as it is my glory to remove your difficulties, permit me to tell you that no man is admitted as a Mason before he is duly informed that the Masonic covenant he is about to enter into is no way calculated or intended to hinder or interrupt the religion he owes to his God, or the duty he owes to his brethren, his neighbor, his family, himself, or his country. This knowledge he receives from the books—this knowledge he receives from brethren in the ministry and of the laity, who are truly pious. You have pronounced the secret evil in its nature, and darkness itself. Permit me to suppose a case, to illustrate this point with regard to the propriety of secrecy. Suppose one thousand men were to meet from different parts, and mutually agree to deposit 10 dollars each into one stock for the purpose of relieving the distress or indigence of either of the one thousand, and were to adopt some plan by which they would know each other from this world; that a distressed one of this thousand could be relieved by these funds—would this be sinful? Suppose some of these were Christians, and some not, would this be sinful? Suppose they, the thousand, were to agree to befriend each other in different respects would this be sinful? Suppose they were to enrol each man his name on a book, and agree to meet once a year, or once a month to appropriate these funds for charitable purposes, would this be uniting the church and world together? Could you venture to pronounce this an evil—that should break christian fellowship?

Min. I should not say this was an evil, or that a secret method of knowing each other in this case would be wrong, even if their meeting together was civil and moral.

Mas. Then, as a christian brother, I assure you that there is as little harm in the secrets of Masonry; for when they meet they meet not as a church, but as a charity society, combined together in natural friendship, and open and close their meetings by prayer.

Min. But I have another capital objection.

Mas. Name it brother.

Min. The members of the society are very disorderly; therefore I could not be willing to belong to that body as a member.

Mas. I will admit that there are disorderly members;—but it is not masonry which makes them so—it is sin.

Min. Why, then, do you associate with them, and exclude them from fellowship?

Mas. Many are dealt with, and excluded; and, I hope, all will be dealt with according to the constitution, and none be retained in fellowship, but orderly men.

Min. I would withdraw from them, even if the institution be good, and so remain until the society is purged from disorder; for we are commanded to withdraw from every brother that walks disorderly.

Mas. This last expression applies to the church, which institution is the best in the world, and Masonry next. But how is a member of either to act in this case? Is he to leave the society, or remain there and purge out the disorder? If the former, then we may both leave the church; for we have disorderly members in abundance; but neither the church nor Masonry should be condemned because there are bad men among them.

Min. Dear Brother, all your arguments may be good, and every statement true, yet you are criminated for wounding the weak consciences of your brethren, which the apostle forbids; for says, he, if eating meat offend my brother, I will eat no more meat.

Mas. I do think, if a brother's feelings are injured with me for joining the Masons, it is his duty to forbear condemning me until he condemn me by the scriptures. He ought to come to me as a brother, and know, first, if the motive that induced me was pure or impure; whether my conduct since is orderly; for surely the tree is to be known by its fruit. If I tell him my motive was to do good, he is bound by the ties of christianity to believe me, so long as I walk uprightly; nor do I think he has a right to interfere with the exercise of my private judgement in this or any other matter whatever, unless he can prove that my conduct in this act is derogatory to the Gospel; which he cannot possibly do unless he knows what Masonry is. Then I know he would not attempt it; for all that know the mystery and value of the institution, highly prize it.

Min. But how are you to avoid the offence given to your brethren, by eating meat in the case alluded to by the apostle? Do you not walk uncharitably towards them, and wound the weak conscience of him for whom Christ died, and, in this, sin against Christ?

Mas. If you will read the four last verses of the 8th Chapter 1 Corinthians, you will find that the apostle was then speaking of things offered to idols; which meat he, as a strong man in the faith, could eat without doing any injury to himself, though it was part of that offered to idols. If his eating, however, of this meat, give a weak brother liberty to eat improperly, then he by his example has caused his brother to offend: for the text does not read offend my brother, but cause my brother to offend; then, said he I will eat no more meat. To illustrate this expression, I will suppose a case: I am travelling, and need refreshment. I call at a tavern, take a glass of refreshment, where many are drinking to excess. I, as a sober man, would not sin, because I drank not to excess; but, perhaps, by this example, being a minister, some brother present might think he had liberty too to take a drink, as I had done; but he drinks too freely and therein offends. Now, for example, in future I will drink no more at such a place, lest I by example, cause some to offend, and wound the consciences of many; nor would Paul eat any more meat used in the idols' temple.

Min. We are compelled to believe that Masonry is the works of darkness and disorderly, from their meetings in the night, and sometimes making unusual noise in their Lodges, and it is a shame to speak of those things done by them in secret.

Mas. We hold our meetings in the day, as well as night; and never are we ashamed to meet a fellow-being day or night, from a consciousness of our innocence. Churches, assemblies of political men, and many other societies, meet in the night, and meet to do private business by private committees of the whole when the room is clear of all others, because the business is of a private nature. Here is no occasion ally; that of speaking, and sometimes loudly, the moving and arranging of seats, &c. &c. Can those passing by the room at such time pronounce these a disorderly people, because there is noise? If the temple built by masons, as it regards the materials and their preparation, was figurative of the church of God, have we not, as ministers in preparing materials for the building of this spiritual house, had noise among us? Yes, in abundance. Why not Masons, then, who are figurative of these spiritual builders, in preparing their materials as members of this building, make some noise? Their speaking and arranging their seats must produce some noise. Cannot all this be done in perfect innocence? I pledge you my christian veracity, that the process of Masonry is truly emblematic of regenerating of rearing up and completing the church of God, and, should you become a Mason, you will at once be smitten with the beauty and glory of the variety of emblems, all pointing at spiritual things, as it regards Christ and his church. This may have been passed too much unnoticed by some masonic brethren; but all regenerate Masons can enjoy the beautiful figure with great delight.—Of all people on earth, in an unconverted state, Masons will have the least excuse to render in the day of judgement, should they die without religion, after hearing the figures spiritualized by their pious brethren in the Lodges, which a minister at any time has the liberty to do.

Min. I do confess I know not what Masonry is, therefore I would not wish to judge any man; and, in fact, for my part, I should not be hurt in my own feelings with you as a Mason, but there are so many precious brethren whose feelings are injured. It has distressed me much. I fear it will injure your usefulness in the ministry.

Mas. My dear brother, if your feelings are not injured try to heal those who are wounded, by bringing to view the impropriety of judging and condemning that which they are not acquainted with. Judge us by our daily walk, and be not jealous of us without a cause. Do you not think it will grieve us when you cannot believe us? We tell you Masonry is not sinful, but a good thing. Cannot you believe us? I say us, because there are many Masons who are ministers and their labors blest as such. Why not love them, if they walk orderly; and be assured that a minister's usefulness is not injured by joining the Free Masons; for when he meets one, he finds a friend—his doors and heart are open to receive him. Masonic privileges give a minister access to a large body of people, who will patiently set and bear his instruction—who knows but he may be the instrument to win their souls to Jesus! Not long since I saw a pious minister initiated in the Masonic society. In passing through the process, his soul was filled with divine transport, tears flowed from his joyful eye, he embraced me, and hardly could forbear an exclamation of rapturous joy.

HUNT'S MERCHANTS' MAGAZINE for December, has the following on the commercial value of gems:

"The art of engraving the diamond was first discovered about the year 1500, by Ambrosius Caradossa, who prepared for Pope Julian II. the figure of a patriarch."

"The art of cutting the diamond with its own powder, was first discovered in 1746, by Lewis Van Bergen but it was not until the reign of Louis XII. that the mode of cutting the diamond in brilliants was invented."

A very extensive sale of Gems was made in London in 1837. The sale amounted to about 230,000 pounds. A pair of ear-rings, formerly the property of Queen Charlotte brought fifty-five thousand dollars. The celebrated Nassauck diamond was purchased at thirty-six thousand. The crown jewels of Queen Victoria are estimated 111,000 pound, or about half a million of dollars.

Among the principal diamonds which are known to exist in Europe, may be named one in the possession of the Grand Mogul, valued at four million of francs—or a little less than a million of dollars. The Empress Catharine possesses a diamond which was purchased of the Sultan of Persia for ninety thousand pounds.—and an annuity of four thousand. A single gem, belonging to the Austrian crown, is valued at one hundred and nine-thousand two hundred pounds, or about half a million of dollars. A diamond among the crown jewels of France was valued in 1791 at twelve millions of livres. The largest diamond known to exist in the world is in the possession of the King of Portugal, and is valued at the enormous sum of fifty seven millions of pounds sterling, or about two hundred and fifteen millions of dollars!

BIOGRAPHY.

GENERAL MERCER.

The following biographical notice of this meritorious officer is taken from the Encyclopedia Americana:

Hugh Mercer, a brigadier-general in the American revolutionary army, was a native of Scotland. He was liberally educated, studied medicine, and acted as a surgeon's assistant in the memorable battle of Culloden. He emigrated from his country not long after, to Pennsylvania, but removed to Virginia, where he settled and married. He was engaged with Washington in the Indian wars of 1775, &c.; and his children are in possession of a medal which was presented to him by the corporation of the city of Philadelphia, for his good conduct in the expedition against an Indian settlement, conducted by Col. Armstrong, in Sept. 1756. In one of the engagements with the Indians, Gen. Mercer was wounded in the right wrist, and being separated from his party, he found that there was danger of his being surrounded by hostile Indians, whose war whoop and yell indicated their near approach. Becoming faint with the loss of blood, he took refuge in the hollow trunk of a large tree. The Indians came to the spot where he was concealed, seated themselves about for rest and then disappeared. Mercer left his hiding place, and pursued his course through a trackless wild of about one hundred miles, until he reached fort Cumberland. On the way he subsisted on the body of a rattlesnake, which he met and killed. When the war broke out between the colonies and the mother country, he immediately joined the American standard, relinquishing an extensive medical practice. Under Washington, whose favor and confidence he enjoyed beyond most of his fellow officers he soon reached the rank of brigadier-general, and, in that command, distinguished himself, particularly in the battles of Trenton and Princeton, in the winter of 1776-7.

In the affair of Princeton, Gen. Mercer, who commanded the van of the American army, after exerting the utmost valor, and activity, had his horse killed under him; and, being thus dismounted, he was surrounded by some British soldiers, with whom, when they refused him quarter, he fought desperately, until he was completely overpowered. They stabbed him with their bayonets, inflicted several blows on his head with the butt end of their muskets, and left him for dead on the field of battle. He died in about a week after, from the wounds in his head, in the arms of Major George Lewis, the nephew of Gen. Washington, whom the uncle commissioned to watch over his expiring friend. The mangled corpse was removed from Princeton, under a military escort to Philadelphia, and exposed a day in the coffee house, with the design of exciting the indignation of the people. It was followed to the grave by at least 30,000 of the inhabitants. Gen. Mercer, though a lion in battle, was uncommonly placid, and almost diffident in private life. He was beloved and admired as an accomplished and benevolent gentleman: Gen. Wilkinson, in his Memoirs, observes—"In Gen. Mercer we lost at Princeton, a chief, who, for education, talents, disposition, integrity and patriotism, was second to no man, but the commander in chief, and was qualified to fill the highest trusts of the country." General Mercer was about 56 years of age when he thus perished.

The history of Mary Jemison, a name of some notoriety in our annals, is thus written in a letter from the Genesee Valley, N. Y., to the Commercial Advertiser:

The Gardow reservation, to which I have referred, and upon a section of which Gen. Brooks resides, was a tract of ten thousand acres which the Seneca Indians reserved in their sale to Robert Morris, in 1797, conferring it upon Mary Jemison, the celebrated "White Woman," who resided upon it till her decease, at a very advanced age, some ten or fifteen years ago. Mary Jemison, truly a remarkable woman. She was of Irish parentage, and was born at sea on their passage to America, 1742 or '43. Her parents settled on what was at that time the frontier of Pennsylvania. She had an uncle in the command of Washington, who fell at Braddock's defeat. In the spring of 1755, Mary, her parents, two brothers and several inmates of the house, were made prisoners by a party of half a dozen Seneca Indians and four Frenchmen. They were all hurried off into the woods, and the whole party murdered afterwards, Mary alone excepted. She was exposed to all the hardships and privations of a prisoner, until her arrival at Seneca town, where she was adopted into an Indian family, as a daughter, and henceforward treated with kindness—leading a roving life, and for a season meditating upon the means of escape. These being frustrated, she at length resigned herself entirely to the Indian life and customs. At a proper age, she was married to a Delaware Indian, whom she loved, and by whom she had one or two or more children. She visited Fort Pitt several times, and occasionally resided among the Shawnee Indians.

Her husband died, and she afterwards married a Seneca chief, living in the Genesee valley, at about the beginning of the war of the revolution. Her Seneca husband was man of blood, but was kind and affectionate to her. She retained her family name, Jemison, and also the English language, which she spoke fluently, until the day of her death. But although she had been religiously instructed by her parents, she embraced the religion of the Indians, and, in a word, became thoroughly Indianized—adopting, and becoming enamored of all their manners, habits and customs throughout. Her life was full of incident and wild adventure. The Indians ever entertained an exalted esteem for her, as was evinced by the Gardow tract—embracing a rich section, both of intervalle and upland, upon which she resided until her death. In obtaining this grant, or reservation, moreover, she showed all the cunning of her adopted people. Mr. Thomas Morris, who conducted the treaty for his father, has told me that when the request was made to him for a reservation for "The White Woman," he supposed that they meant only a farm of some two or three hundred acres, but that the woman herself, by artfully indicating certain bounds with which he was not exactly familiar, actually overreached them, and obtained the large tract already mentioned, including the whole of the Gardow flats, and the romantic walls of rock and hill within which they are sequestered.

During the war of the revolution her house was often the quarters of Col. Brant and Colonel John Butler, when making their inroads upon the frontiers of the colonies. She attended the treaty of Genesee Flats held by general Schuyler, 1775, and her life, taken down in writing from her own lips, in 1823, was full of incident and adventure. She would not throw off her Indian costume, even after the white population had completely surrounded her residence—but adhered to the Indian customs with the utmost tenacity to the last. She was rich, not only in land, but in herds and flocks, and had tenants who worked her lands. One of her sons was educated a physician, and obtained a surgeon's commission in the Navy, dying a few days ago on the Mediterranean station. In many respects Mary was a valuable woman—humane and benevolent—and doing great good among the people of her adoption.

MARCH OF INTELLECT.—A hired girl, not a hundred miles from this city, lately purchased a ticket in one of the numerous lottery offices here and next morning received for the same a very handsome sum. Thinking her fortune was made, she placed herself under the care of an accomplished lady, who taught her French, Music, &c. Being invited to an evening entertainment, and afraid lest she should commit an error at the tea-table, asked her governess what she would say when she was satisfied, she received for answer that she should say she had got a sufficiency. On the appointed evening she arrived at the house, was introduced to the assembled company, & the table being set she set down to tea. The lady of the house towards the end of her second cup pressing her to take another. She said "O, no ma'am," holding both hands on her cup, "I've got a slipperty slapperty."

MISCELLANY.

Singular Origin of a new sort of Potato.—The Maine Cultivator gives an account of a new kind of potato, which is apparently a chance production of nature, not springing from seed or tubers, but growing as an excrescence from another plant. The origin of the potato now in general use, and a most important addition to the food of man, is involved in doubt, but that production is believed to have been originally an excrescence growing upon a plant in South America. The attention of scientific minds to this new production might settle the question. The following is its history as given in the paper referred to:

"Can any of our naturalist contemporaries inform us whether the potato is an original tuber, or whether it is the production of a freak of nature? We are led to the following inquiry from the following fact, which is before us, and which we venture to communicate to the public.

"Year before last, Mr. John Smiley, a farmer in the northern part of Augusta, noticed upon some of the stalks of the gillflower, which the female members of his family had cultivated in a flower pot, some protuberances or excrescences like warts about the size of peas. They appeared perfectly formed and living substances resembling the seeds that project from the stalk of that bulbous flower known as the tiger lily. Every body is acquainted with the gillflower, as a very common annual plant resembling the pink in size and flower. Curiosity led him to preserve these excrescences—they were not the natural seeds—and plant them the following spring. One of his neighbors also took a portion of them and did the same. Two or three came up and attained maturity. The product was over half a peck of good sized and very handsome potatoes! These were preserved and planted the last spring. The grow vigorously, and the result was about three bushels of a new sort of real potatoes. The potato is of oblong form, smooth face, mostly white, mixed occasionally with purple. Mr. Hutchings of the Augusta House, has cooked some of them, and pronounced them superior. They may be a variety worth cultivating. But the mystery in our mind is, that they should have been the product of the gillflower. Was that the way potatoes first came?"

DUELS.—From the beginning of the reign of George III up to this time, that is, during his reign and those of George IV., William IV., and Victoria, there have been about 200 duels in England. Out of these, in three cases both of the parties were killed; and the balance, 80 were killed, 160 were wounded desperately, 60 slightly, and the remainder escaped uninjured. It is estimated that, in duels generally, about one fifth of those engaged are killed, and about one half more or less severely injured. Out of all these 200 duels, in which were engaged 400 principals and 400 seconds, 800 in all, there have grown but 20 prosecutions at law; which 20 prosecutions have resulted in 10 acquittals, 6 convictions of manslaughter, and four of murder in the first degree. Of the 4 persons convicted, 2 were hanged, 2 imprisoned. Some of the names standing highest in English history have been engaged in these duels just referred to; such as the Dukes of York, Norfolk and Richmond, Lords Shelburne, Macartney, Exmouth, Townsend, Talbot, Lauderdale, Lonsdale, Malden, Camelford, Paget, Castlereagh, Belgrave, Londonderry; the Duke of Wellington, Pitt, Fox, Sheridan, Canning, Tierney, Sir Francis Burdett, and many others. The English talk a good deal about the duels among our Congressmen in this country; if they would look at home they would see ten duels, in which members of the House of Lords or Commons were engaged, to one in this country, in which a member of Congress has been a party.—Norwich Journal.

CLARA: OR LOVE AND SUPERSTITION.

BY DON TRUERA TELESFORO D'Y COSIO.

Gil Perez was one of the most narrow-minded individuals. Having never received the advantage of an enlightened education, and his natural talents being on a very limited scale, he had imbibed all the vulgar prejudices of which a weak mind is susceptible. His days had been spent in making money, and reciting long prayers. Gil Perez was a furious devotee, who firmly believed every syllable that a friar chose to utter, and he was very lavish in dealing out damnation to any lukewarm christian who chanced to come in his way. His religious temperament had increased to a tenfold degree with the progress of years, until it settled at length into a sullen gloom, and a bitter feeling of enthusiasm. Perhaps he felt some compunctious visitings on the score of his wealth. It had been accumulated somewhat too rapidly, even considering it was in South America; but to silence any qualms of conscience, Gil Perez took those efficient means which the church, with no less charity than prudence, recommends to her offending children. Nothing tends so much to tranquilize a restless and guilty soul, as bestowing one's money on convents, and ordering some thousand masses (price 2s 6d. each) to be said every year. Gil Perez adopted this orthodox method of setting to work in order to gain repose. He associated with friars—made a new settlement in favor of convents upon every case of emergency—heard two masses in the morning, and recited interminable prayers in the evening. Yet, strange to say, despite of so many and so much praying—despite of the edifying company which he kept, and the great sums which he paid for the advantage, the poor man was never a jot the more tranquil, more happy, or more satisfied with himself and his fellow-creatures.

The wife of Gil Perez was also a devotee, although not quite so melancholly religious as her husband. She also believed in the efficacy of masses, long prayers, friars, beads, &c. &c.; but then she prudently conceived there were other ways of passing one's time in this vale of tears more consonant with common sense, than preserving a fixed, lugubrious expression of countenance, fasting, and the use of the discipline, sighing, groaning, preaching, croaking, railing against sinners, and abusing the day every hour of the day. Not but, that like a good devotee she loved scandal dearly, but then she was more varied in selecting the objects of animadversion. Young, handsome girls especially called forth her zeal. She had their welfare so much at heart, that she could not endure to see a beautiful specimen of her sex cross the street, on account of the great danger there is in the possession of charms. Fortunately Dona Josepha had never had this awful peril to encounter; her motives were therefore perfectly disinterested, she acted from mere love of charity, and she never felt so happy as when she saw a female pass by in all the security of age and ugliness.

Gil Perez was blessed with two nieces that would have made the happiness of a reasonable relative. The two girls were no less remarkable for the beauty of their persons than the superiority of their moral endowments. They were, however, of very different dispositions. Agnes, the elder, possessed a strong will, and a boldness of spirit that would shrink from no danger. Clara, her younger sister, was made up of all the softer attributes of her sex. Agnes was endowed with no ordinary talents: she had an inquiring mind, and was averse to yield her judgment to any power except that of conviction. Her temper too, was irritable, although she possessed one of the kindest and most generous hearts. Her sister, though not so rich in the stores of talent, was by no means deficient in intellect: she was less brilliant, less witty than Agnes; but the gentleness of her character was, in a great measure, responsible for any deficiency of mind which a careless observer might discover at first. From her infancy, Clara had been taught to bend blindly to the slightest sign of parental authority; she would never inquire into the justice or injustice of one act.

There was also a striking contrast between the style of beauty of the two sisters. That of Agnes was of a more intellectual character—Clara's was more remarkable for a soft and winning expression. Agnes appeared at once for admiration to the mind, and she never failed to command it—Clara won gradually and unobtrusively her way into the heart. The eyes of Agnes were full of brilliancy—the eyes of Clara were composed of softness and gentle tenderness. Agnes possessed an elegant and commanding figure, and her carriage was distinguished for its ease and dignity—Clara was not so striking, her frame was more delicate, and although all her movements were remarkable for feminine grace, yet they escaped observation at first, from the retiring modesty and shrinking nature of her disposition.

Unfortunately Agnes and Clara had been left orphans, unprovided for and unprotected, at a very early period of infancy, and they had fallen under the care of two fanatic devotees quite incompetent to appreciate the value of the gems intrusted to their guardianship. Don Gil, wrapped up in the gloom of his religious reveries, was not susceptible to that tenderness of heart which would have operated in a more enlightened mind. Dona Josepha, on her side, was a weak, credulous woman, who would not certainly put herself forward to harm her fellow-creatures; but who, at the same moment, was totally incapable of contributing the least share to their happiness or comfort. Besides, Agnes and Clara were in the possession of youth and great personal beauty, and this, in the opinion of the beata, was a misfortune amounting almost to sin. Had her nieces been deformed, aged, and disagreeable, they would have possessed far more valuable charms in the estimation of their aunt.

Every one is acquainted with the vast influence which the clergy exercise in Spain. Gil Perez was, as a matter of course, laboring under the yoke. He was the nominal master of his house, whilst the real power was engrossed by a friar of the order of barefooted Franciscans.

The ascendancy which Father Bastos had acquired over the mind of Don Gil, and the absolute sway which he exercised in the weak Indiano's house, was, to Agnes, a source of continual misery and indignation. She dwelt constantly on the vexatious subject, until a rooted hatred for the usurper was engendered in her heart. This hostile feeling was not long a secret to the friar, and his vindictive nature was roused, whilst his policy pointed to the danger of so powerful an enemy. The superior understanding of the young girl, and her decision of character, were serious obstacles towards that plan of absolute, despotic dominion which he had acquired in the Indiano's family. To remove this impediment was the scheme which, at present, occupied the friar's mind. It was indispensable to check the evil before it could produce a corresponding effect in any of the other members of the family. Like every holder of usurped power, Father Bastos trembled lest his slaves should awake to a sense of their degradation, and assert their freedom.

The scheming friar had already harbored the thought of bringing Don Gil to bequeath his fortune to the convent. There was nothing extraordinary in the plan, and the success with which such attempts are crowned in Spain emboldened him to proceed with buoyant hopes in his undertaking. He watched for one of Don Gil's most religious moods, and having worked on the superstitious fears of the weak man, after an edifying sermon, continued, "And yet, dear brother, what awaits the fulfilment of our religious duties, when the weak flesh is rebellious? Blind deference to the voice of the church—"

"Nay, Father Bastos, interrupted the gloomy Indiano, "no one in my family, I trust, pretends to dispute that power."

"Your eldest niece does. I am sorry to find her imbued with the spirit of the world. The dangers that surround her path are manifold and awful, and I dread to think what may be her future destiny."

Gil Perez felt duly alarmed at the words of his ghostly counsellor. Besides, he had observed in the conduct of Agnes certain tokens which awakened his anxiety. He fancied he observed in her a reluctance to long prayers. He never heard her speak a single word in praise either of convents or friars. Nay, she went once so far as to question the necessity of attending two masses a day. Now all these were fearful symptoms of a dislike to piety, nearly akin to irreligion. Father Bastos, on his side, readily availed himself of the occasion to work upon his jaundiced feelings and superstition, and he succeeded to the fullest extent.

The life led by the young girls, one may easily imagine, was one continued series of misery and annoyance. Dona Josepha was an indefatigable sentinel. Cerberus was a mere blind puppy to her in point of alertness. When they went to church (the only pastime allowed in the Indiano's family) the activity of his wife redoubled. Don Gil himself being deeply engrossed in working the salvation of his soul, had no time to observe the conduct of his nieces. Whilst he remained at church he was profoundly absorbed in devotion, and no event short of the altar tumbling down would drive his attention from his rosary and prayer-book.

Dona Josepha was not so selfish. Certainly she thought of her own salvation, but then she had an eye (nay, two) for that of other people. Her nieces were a source of the deepest interest and solicitude. Sensible as she felt of the unfortunate gifts which nature had bestowed upon them, it was her duty to keep always on the alert. Accordingly, with exemplary self-abnegation, instead of fixing her eyes on her prayer-book, she kept them steadfastly on the girls. This was certainly an extraordinary instance of charity. Nothing escaped the observation of the pious sentinel and when they returned home, the nieces, in addition to the church service, were obliged to undergo an interminable lecture from their zealous aunt. Woe to them, if by an unlucky chance, they had coughed, or sneezed, or uttered any sound, which might be construed into a desire to draw the attention of the men! Woe—woe, if they had lifted their eyes but for a single second from their prayer-books! for these grievous offences were visited with all the profuse eloquence of religious acrimony. Nay, it was not enough that they had not looked—to be looked at was, in the estimation of the pious aunt, almost as bad. Such an existence was a perfect martyrdom; and the teasing preaching, railing, was so great, that really the nieces deeply regretted at times the enviable situation of those females, who having neither youth nor beauty, were fortunately exempt from the infliction of their pious persecutor.

This system produced very different effects on the two sisters. In Agnes, it tended to embitter her feelings against her tormentors, and to suggest the idea of bursting from the thralldom in which she suffered. She was conscious of the insult offered to her understanding, no less than of the injustice and cruelty practised on her free will. Clara, from the mildness of her character, was averse to any display of opposition. She preferred to pine away her days in secret sorrow, rather than show the least symptom which might afford scandal to the neighbors. A being so soft, so kind, shrunk from the task of inflicting the least pain even on her tormentors, and she had accordingly chosen her destiny for life—calm resignation, silent tears, and, perhaps, an early grave!

Don Gil Perez and Father Bastos had already conversed copiously on the propriety of sending Agnes to a nunnery. Clara, who had hitherto been blindly submissive to all their whims and fancies, might ultimately follow the example of her elder sister. It was no difficult matter for the friar to persuade the credulous and hypochondriac Indiano that a nunnery was the only safe retreat for a girl of such strong passions and wayward will as Agnes had evinced. With regard to Dona Josepha, she of course, approved most cordially of a plan which was to render nugatory the baneful possession of that youth and beauty with which, most unfortunately, the life of Agnes was at present saddled. The only difficult point was to gain the consent of the girl herself, and this indeed they anticipated would not be easily obtained. But it is well known in Spain that when a family is firmly bent on sending a young girl to a nunnery, they are sure to succeed, unless, indeed, the girl is so perverse as to prefer breaking her heart, or going raving mad—a choice which sometimes girls have been known to make from a spirit of contradiction. This, however, is a far lesser calamity, in the estimation of a hot and zealous devotee, than the horror of seeing a daughter, a sister, or a niece, falling in love with a man, when they ought to preserve their affections for the exclusive use of heaven!

From the moment that Agnes evinced a decided opposition, the life of the poor girl became one interrupted series of trials and vexations. Nothing that could harass the mind, or torment the heart, was omitted, in order to oblige her to alter a resolution which she seemed determined to abandon only with her existence. She was teased and worried by the aunt in the most tantalizing manner; and when she had gone through this infliction, her uncle came forward with a lugubrious voice and aspect to add the benefit of his gloomy rebukes. Nor was the friar behindhand whenever the work of torturing was going on. The triumvirate were indefatigable in their task, till at the end of a month, they had fully succeeded, not in making a nun of Agnes, but in impairing her health, and embittering her temper. She fell ill; but this circumstance did not in the least tend to relax the cruelty of her religious executioners. They very coolly and solemnly announced that this was a judgment, and that the hand of God was visible in this malady, which was sent purposely at once to punish her disobedience and obstinacy, and to signify that the patient should take the holy vows of religion.

Agnes recovered, but her resolves had not suffered from the effects of her malady. Her mind, instead of losing any of its tone, had become more firm in consequence of the persecution she was obliged to endure. She was fully aware of the atrocious injustice perpetrated against her inclinations; and nothing, no, not even the fear of the most appalling death, could force her to break a resolution, which was, as it were interwoven with her existence. Dona Josepha neglected no means of wounding the pride of the poor victim. A series of petty, spiteful trials was systematically pursued in vain. But there was a source of pain to Agnes. She could courageously withstand the assaults of her oppressors, but was not equally proof against the tears of her sister. The aunt had been busily at work, and had partially succeeded in persuading the poor gentle girl that there was great criminality in the conduct of Agnes. Clara was made up of softness and placidity: her mind was not of that masculine order which prefers undergoing all sorts of trials, rather than submit to injustice. Her gentle nature shrank from the idea of opposition, whilst her imagination, already imbued with strict religious notions, was excellently adapted to receive the impressions which her fanatic relatives thought proper to convey.

Father Bastos perceived, in this morbid state of Clara, a rich mine, which might be explored with advantage, and he did not allow the opportunity to escape. The poor girl was convinced of the truth and justice of the friar's observations, but the only triumph which he and his colleagues gathered from the achievement was that of adding to the misery of Agnes, without in the least altering her resolves. Many a night when silence reigned, and Agnes was thankful that the trials of the day were over, another and a far more distressing one came to perplex her mind and afflict her heart. She, alas! was compelled to endure, not indeed reproaches, for to those the gentle soul of Clara was a total stranger;—but what are a hundred times more painful—the visible tokens of her distress and sorrow.

The mischief consequent on a system of oppression is not long in making its appearance. Agnes brooded constantly over her situation. Her independent spirit felt more indignant the more she reflected. But she was not discriminating enough, in the turmoil of embittered feelings, to distinguish the pure essence of religion from its abuse; and the aversion which she had justly conceived for Father Bastos, induced her to believe that every friar was selfish and tyrannical. By a chain of argument she next began to harbor doubts, until the line between right and wrong was scarcely discernible. This tone of mind was extremely dangerous, especially in a female of such decision of character. She was driven to an extreme point, and she secretly made a vow to dare her relatives—the world—opinion—all—all rather than submit to the odious sacrifice. This resolution, under certain restrictions, would have been strictly correct; but in the wild excitement of poor Agnes' heart, she would not disguise from herself, that she considered any means justifiable in rescuing her from the present oppression.

Don Gil Perez, from a series of rebukes and sermons, had now proceeded to more violent measures.—He peremptorily confined poor Agnes to her room where he suffered no one to visit her except the hated Father Bastos. This tribulation Agnes at first endured with fortitude; nay, she felt a sort of pride in being a martyr in the cause of her free will; and she took a pleasure in reflecting that all the artifices and devices of tyranny were not sufficient to enslave her mind.

The imprisonment of Agnes began at length to exhaust her patience; and she was ready to adopt the most desperate plan, rather than suffer herself to continue a toy in the hands of her ruthless tormentors.—This idea once admitted into her mind, the occasion was not long wanting of putting it into execution.—Agnes had observed a gentleman looking at her with peculiar interest as she was wont to return from church; for although the alertness of Dona Josepha offered an insurmountable obstacle to make such observations, what that is gratifying to the female vanity can escape the notice of a young girl? Agnes, however, had too strong a sense of propriety to afford the least encouragement to the stranger by returning his glances. She could feel no partiality for a person with whom she was totally unacquainted, and she never suffered a thought on the subject to disturb her repose. Had she been blessed with other relatives—had she not been unfortunate in her natural friends and protectors—the image of the stranger would probably have been the cause of mere mirth in the family. She would have felt no hesitation in speaking on the subject, and perhaps be the first to join in the laugh against the inamorato.

The case, however, was very different at present.—Agnes found herself perfectly isolated in this world.—Her relatives were her obstinate oppressors; and in her sister, instead of consolation, she could only find an addition to her woe and perplexity. In this absolute want of sympathizing friends, her mind was not extravagant in reverting towards an object, which under ordinary circumstances would never have occupied her meditations. The imagination loves to conjure up images of comfort, and there is scarcely an idea, however wild and extravagant, which passing through the medium of an overheated brain and a sorrowing heart does not assume, not merely a consolatory, but a reasonable form. Such was the situation of Agnes, when fate, to prolong the dangerous illusion, presented to her view the subject of her present thoughts.

As she chanced to cast a glance from the small window of her room, she perceived the stranger walking to and fro opposite the house. Her attention was drawn—she caught his eye—there could be no mistake. She occupied his thoughts—probably he knew of the hardships she endured: these and other wild thoughts darted with rapidity across the imagination of the fair prisoner, and they brought consolation to her heart.

The stranger was assiduous at his post on the following day, and he made signs as if he wished to convey a letter. This he contrived to throw into the room. Agnes was weak enough to receive and read it—From that moment her fate was sealed. Her admirer's letter ran thus:

"I am aware of the cruel treatment you are forced to endure. Allow me to rescue you from your dismal fate. Trust to my honor—the more so, for the sake of that passion which I have long felt for your person and which the knowledge of your wrongs and sufferings has served to augment.

GABRIEL FUENTES."

Agnes perused this note with a feeling of pleasure and hope. Her imagination dwelt on the subject with a fondness she would have been the first to condemn in another; nay, in her own self, had she not been so long the victim of oppression. Bold, daring, and extravagant as the resolution was, she made up her mind to quit her uncle's roof, and trust her destiny to the honor and affection of a man with whom she had not hitherto so much as exchanged a single word. But the proud spirit of Agnes, and the injustice of her relatives' behaviour towards her, had driven her mind to burst those shackles of female restraint, which form at once the ornament and protection of the sex. To carry her plan into effect, however, was no easy task. A woman's mind, always fruitful in resources in cases of emergency, did not desert Agnes in the present.—

She called dissimulation to her aid, and by feigning to listen with a more subdued spirit to the admonitions of Father Bastos, her uncle, in hopes that she was about to be converted, relaxed in his severity, and delivered his niece from her confinement.

Agnes continued the work of deceit with perfect success. She appeared almost reconciled to the proposition of her relatives. She demanded only a fortnight to reconsider the proposal. Her request was easily granted, and every day that passed, the chances of her taking the veil became more certain. The gentle Clara carressed her beloved sister in all the tenderness of her affection; but, to her surprise, Agnes, instead of the calm resignation which she evinced before the family, had only bitter tears and heavy sighs for the moments of privacy with her sister.

Matters were in this state, and the Indiano had already begun to arrange the preliminaries for the novitiate of his niece, when one day, to their utter surprise and consternation, the intended nun was missing. The whole house was carefully searched in vain. A note, however, was found addressed to Clara, in which her sister informed her that she had trusted her fate into the care of a husband. This word was a thunderbolt to Gil Perez, his wife, and Father Bastos. The uncle bestowed a heavy curse on the fugitive for her deception: Dona Josepha crossed herself fervently, and declared that the event did not excite any extraordinary surprise in her—she was prepared for such a catastrophe; the vanity of the girl, and the fatal beauty which she possessed, were well calculated to lead to this result. Father Bastos delivered a long harangue on the temptations of the flesh—the manoeuvres of Satan—the weakness of human nature &c. &c. concluding with foretelling the most appalling end to the fair sinner, and asserting that such crimes called for the deepest vengeance of Heaven. They were all three of accordance in one point—in feeling persuaded that Agnes had afforded an example of deception almost unparalleled and deserving the severest retribution. When they had preached, croaked, abused, denounced, prophesied, and anathematized to their heart's content, the three pious personages sat down to dinner with a very good appetite.

The system of deception followed by a young creature like Agnes would suggest melancholy thoughts, had that plan been acted upon under ordinary circumstances. But the mortifying trials which she had undergone—the prospect of new ones—and the persuasion that the only means of escaping a cruel destiny, was that of seeming to submit to it, may offer not a justification, but, at least an excuse for her imprudent and rash conduct. In the excitement of her feelings, to avoid one danger she had blindly precipitated herself into another. Had her better judgment been allowed to exercise its power with calmness and repose she would have shrunk from her headlong design.—She had been driven almost to despair; and the combined effects of indignation, sense of wrong, anger, and disgust, made themselves manifest in her flight with a man who was a total stranger, and of whose character she had no other report than the one she received from himself.

Don Gil Perez heard nothing from his fugitive niece, further than she was living in reduced circumstances with her husband Don Gabriel Fuentes, a poor officer—a man of good family, but of whose moral qualifications and personal merits little more was known than that he was a professed gambler. This intelligence did not in the least affect the morose Indiano. On the contrary, he felt a sort of satisfaction in the anticipated misery and trials which his niece was doomed to suffer from her rash union with such a character. With all the furious zeal of a fanatic, he thundered out that he perceived clearly the hand of God, in the various stages of the affair, and that it was certain Heaven had permitted the marriage of Agnes, as a just punishment for her guilty obstinacy in refusing to become a nun. This logic was satisfactory to Dona Josepha. Nor could the friar feel dissatisfied as he had succeeded in removing one impediment from the road to his schemes, if not by shutting Agnes in a nunnery at least by driving her from a home, to which, judging from the disposition of her relatives she could never expect to return.

Some months elapsed, and the name of Agnes was almost forgotten, except by poor Clara, on whom the rashness of her sister had made a painful impression.

But a new source of anxiety came soon to alarm the family, and more specially Father Bastos. This was the presence of a visitor at the Indiano's house—a nephew of Don Gil—a ward of the Indiano, who had been absent to complete his studies in the University of Alcalá. This young gentleman whose name was Theodosio, had been fondly attached to his cousins, whom he had known from their infancy. Clara, especially, was his favorite—she was a mere child of twelve years old when he had last seen her. But half a dozen years make a material difference in this period of woman's existence and he was agreeably surprised when he perceived the advantageous change which had taken place in his cousin's personal appearance, as well as in the development of her mental qualities. In fine, Clara preserved all the artless graces, all the winning manners of the girl, combined with the more refined and more intoxicating charms of approaching womanhood. The flowers of spring, and the first beauties of summer, were united in her person without distinction of season.

Youthful affection for his cousin was now exchanged for a more absorbing and manly feeling. In the society of Clara, Theodosio enjoyed a pleasure to which his heart had hitherto been a stranger. Among the females of his acquaintance he had never met one which approached so closely to his idea of female perfections. Angelic softness breathed in all her words and looks. In every trifling act, the kindness of her disposition showed itself, for Clara's supreme felicity was centered in the comfort and happiness of others; the society of such a being was not to be enjoyed with impunity, and Theodosio but too soon discovered that he was the slave of a passion, the more absorbing deep and lasting, because of the good foundations on which it was based. His bliss was complete, when his active eye perceived that his love was acknowledged and returned, despite of the efforts which female timidity and blushing restraint were making to keep the secret from him.

The first person who observed the affection existing between Theodosio and Clara was Father Bastos, and the discovery was to him annoying in the extreme. He had already settled it in his mind that the wealth of the Indiano, should go to enrich his convent, and to the founding of another, of which he himself felt the ambition of becoming superior—from this step to a bishopric, the distance he considered short; and wild dreams of ecclesiastical preferment and greatness revolved before the imagination of the ambitious friar. He lost no time in communicating his suspicions to Don Gil. The Indiano at first treated the matter with indifference, assuring his monitor, that the affection of Theodosio for Clara was that of an elder brother for a younger sister. When, however, he perceived that the friar's surmises were just, the fanatic man felt no less disappointment than vexation; he again foresaw the fountain-head of evil, and the image of Agnes returned vividly to his memory.

CURIOUS DEFINITION OF A KISS.—Extract from a Love Letter, written in the year 1679, translated from the German.

"What is a kiss? A kiss, is as it were; a seal expressing our sincere attachment, the pledge of future union; a dumb, but at the same time audible Language of the living heart; a present which at the same time that it is given, is taking from us, the impression of an ivory coral press; the striking of two flints against one another: a crimson balsam for a love-wounded heart; a sweet bite of the lip, an affectionate pinching of the mouth; a delicious dish which is eaten with scarlet spoons; a sweet meat which does not satisfy hunger; a trait which is planted and gathered at the same time; the quickest exchange of questions and answers of two lovers; the fourth degree of love.

A school boy being asked by his teacher how he should flog him, replied, "If you please, sir, I should like to have it upon the Italian system of penmanship, the heavy strokes upwards, and the down ones light."

A lawyer was once accused of disgracing the bar, by taking silver of a client. "I took silver," replied he, "because I could not get gold; but I took every farthing the fellow had in the world, and I hope you don't call that disgracing the profession."

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, DEC. 19, 1840.

TERMS OF THIS PAPER.—To subscribers residing out of the city, $2 in advance—$2.50 if within six months, and $3, if not paid until the expiration of the year. BACK NUMBERS at all times furnished.

OUR CITY.—In looking over our exchange list we find a table, purporting to give the population and increase 'of American cities;' and not being fortunate enough to discover our own little city amongst them and having been led to believe it is situated somewhere between the Rocky mountains and down East, we thought it fairly entitled to that classification. Lest her whereabouts might be lost to future Geographers and "Corner lot" Map manufacturers, for their especial benefit, we will endeavor to define its position. It is situated on Hendrick Hudson's River, opposite the villages of Bath and Greenbush, about six miles below the ancient city of Illium. It has men, women, and children to the number of 33,627, showing an increase of 9,418 within the last sixty months. It has Clinton's ditch emptying the "by waters" into it, and the Mohawk and Hudson Rail Road with its various arms a running out of it. A little something is done in the way of trade. Regular lines of Junks are established here, and occasionally take their departure from our dikes for Manhattan Island, with a little matter of some 5 or 6000 barrels of "superfine" with butter and other small trimmings to match, and return laden with the productions, of Sheffield, Birmingham, Manchester, Staffordshire, New Amsterdam, "Cape Cod, Nantucket and all along shore." Very considerable additions are furnished to our bartering commodities, by the occasional arrivals of the musquitoe fleet from the Montezuma marshes; at least so we are informed by the receiving-Col. Levi Chapman, and he disclaims any intention of "crowing" in the matter. We are aware that our city has transgressed many of the good old laws of "our vater landt," but think that with the many attractions offered by her in the "Swopping way," that she is at least entitled to the name of an "American City."

MEXICAN TREACHERY AND ITS REWARD.—On the defeat of the federal army at Morelos, in the month of March last, Canales, Melano, and Cardenas, made their escape into Texas, and were received by the people of that republic, with kindness and hospitality. After residing for some time in that country, these villains, by appealing to the sympathy and patriotism of the Texans, induced a large number of her citizens to assist them in a crusade against the Mexicans. On their arrival upon the bank of the Rio Grande, Canales and his associates, in order to make their peace with the Mexican authorities, opened a secret correspondence with them, by which many of these brave fellows, were sacrificed to an enemy, five times their own number. After the slaughter, the citizens, considering the contest at an end, opened their houses and shops, for the Mexicans, and the bulk of them got beastly drunk, and their commanders ordered a renewal of the slaughter. The battle commenced with about 100 Texans, and lasted nine hours. The Texans, were well protected from the fire of their assailants, and fortunately had an abundance of ammunition. During the battle the Texans sallied forth, and captured there field pieces, which they turned upon their enemies, and mowed them down like grass.—

More than four hundred of the Mexicans were destroyed, while this little spartan band only sustained a loss of four men. The Texans then retreated in good order, carrying with them considerable spoil, which they stood in much need.

"THE KEEPSAKE" AND THE "LEGENDS OF VENICE."—The Keepsake, as usual exceeds all its contemporary volumes in embellishment. The consciousness of superior female charms, and the half surprised pique evidently existing between the two male inhabitants of the picture of "the Rivals;" are entirely worthy of having Lami as a designer and the Keepsake as a casket. As for its editor, Lady Blessington, who among living writers—Bulwer always excepted—has no superior. "The Legends of Venice" makes this year its first appearance, and if the present is an earnest of its future excellence, it will always receive from the world of taste and letters a hearty welcome. The title well explains the book. Its object is to give a general appreciation of the palmy days of Venice.—By those who are in quest of a truly beautiful article of presentation—he it for a wife, sister or "sweetheart"—it will be only seen to be purchased.

Both of the above mentioned splendid volumes will be found among numerous other anniversary gifts, upon the table of our old friend, W. C. Little; who, by-the-by, has been a "long and strong" caterer for the intellectual palate of our good old dutch city, and richly deserves all the patronage his friends may bestow upon him.

ALLEN. the fiend in human form, who recently committed in New York the worse than brutal assault upon the person of Mrs. Rossama Harman, we are informed by the news-reports has been allowed his freedom upon $4000 bail. We do not know of what Justice Taylor could have been dreaming—as he certainly must have been, when he could permit money, of any amount, for a moment to take the place of so revolting a crime. It is difficult to conceive a punishment adequate to the enormity of Allen's offence; yet to the honor of Justice Taylor, and the disgrace of mankind, is he running at large, meditating in what way he shall be able to commit crimes, of a more enormous and, of course, a more glorious cast. Men of Allen's stamp apparently find so ready a friend in the "good easy" law, that it really does seem as if justice had abandoned us, and that the line, so often quoted to establish the dark misanthropy of Byron—

"Mammon finds his way where seraph's might despair"—has been proven a lamentable fact. Outrages, it matters not of how horrible a character, now meet with such sympathy, that in the eyes of the vicious they have become consecrated. The more obvious the circumstances of guilt appear, the more mercy the culprit seems to acquire.

A CARD.—The managers of the Ladies' Fair of the third Dutch Church, respectfully tender their unfeigned thanks in behalf of the Society which they represent, to the numerous friends which have so liberally contributed to promote the object of the fair by their donations, attendance and purchases of the articles provided for the occasion.

To those of our readers, particularly, who are professors of religion, we commend the "Masonic Dialogue," on our first page. It is an admirable exposition of the true principles of the order. Lend it a paper to a prejudiced brother.

COATES' PHYSIOLOGY FOR SCHOOLS.—This beautiful volume just issued from the press of Marshall, Williams and Butler of Philadelphia, comes to us in a most propitious moment as a text book in the all important, but too much neglected science of Physiology. Nothing have we ever found upon our shelves fitted to take the place we assign to it. The typographical execution and tasteful style of binding are calculated to give it a favorable reception, and secure to the publishers the reputation which justly belong to Philadelphia book-makers. Boston and N. York, through Marsh, Capon & Co. Lilly, Wait & Co. and the Harpers and a few other establishments have of late years rather taken the lead, but among them all we do not remember to have seen a work of this kind so well prepared for the place it was designed to occupy. Its wood cuts are exquisite representations of originals in Nature. But the book itself upon which we behold the impress of a mind intimately acquainted with the whole round of Physical science, is a treasure to every institute of learning.

The subject is opened in that familiar and ever playful manner, which can be indulged in by those giant minds which roam over the wide field of science with the freedom which a consciousness of being entirely at home, alone can give. There is an abandon which is peculiar to those whose minds grasp the whole length and breadth of a subject instinctively, and which possess the power of perceiving accurately the relations of all the different parts, and of presenting them in their proper order. The language and the thought of the first chapter seize the attention as by force, and the student partially acquainted with the ground, as he is conducted by the author, feels that he moves in the very atmosphere of poetry. The meaning of terms by chosen illustrations is reverted to the memory, and this almost without effort. An argument is entered upon embracing the distinctions, first, between those things which have life and those things which have not life, and then, the characteristics which determine plants from animals. He then presents the different systems of the animal constitution, in an arrangement peculiarly his own, proceeding from the lower and simpler orders to the more and more complicated. All ascertained functions of the several organs, which compose the fabric of the most perfect of animals, is displayed in the clearest language, neither so dense as to lose its attraction, nor yet so diffuse as to deprive the mind of that exercise which is so essential to proper discipline. Then follows human physiology proper, throughout which as well as in the preceding portions, a constant wish to render every remark of the utmost practical value, seems to have ruled the author. It is certainly one of the most admirable features of the work that it every where aims to do good.

We might be induced to take exceptions to the peculiar phrenological views of the author and also of his purely hypothetical distinction between animals and plants; but upon a work which possesses so great merit, and which plainly is the production of a thinking mind we cannot indulge the vein that might under other circumstances press beyond our control.

NAPOLEON.—The body of Napoleon has been disinterred, at St. Helena. At the time of his death, in 1821 it was embalmed by French chemists; and on opening the grave it was found in a complete state of preservation, the features being preserved. The vessel, having the remains on board sailed for France, on the 17th of October.

MR. SUYDAM, whose mysterious disappearance, we noticed last week, has been most barbarously murdered, and his body found under the floor of a dwelling house leased by him to a Peter Robinson of New Brunswick. It is supposed that Robinson decoyed him on the premises, under the plea of paying him some money, and then murdered him with a hammer or axe. The murderer is in custody.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—The beautiful lines, entitled "The loved and lost," written by a lady of this city upon the death of her child, are welcome, and shall appear in our next.

The Ground upon which Baltimore was first laid out, was originally purchased as a site for the town, at forty shillings per acre.

At a meeting of the Common Council on Tuesday evening, a resolution was adopted directing an application to be made to the Legislature to increase the number of wards in the city to ten.

The favors of our friend, W. S. S. have been received. He will find an answer to his enquiry by looking at the list of Agents, as published.

DESCRIPTION OF A GOOD WIFE.—She had not no ear for music, Sam, but she had a capital eye for dirt, and for poor folks, that's much better. No one never seed as much dirt in my house as a fly could not brush off with his wings. Boston gals may boast of their spinnets and their gytars, and their cytalian airs, and their cars for music, but give me the gal I say that has an eye for dirt, for she is the gal for my money."

POETRY.

From the Knickerbocker.
FOUNTAIN IN THE DESERT.

He opened the rock, and the water gushed out: they ran in the dry places like a river.—PSALMS.

He spake, and from the barren rock
 A crystal fountain burst;
 Streams through the arid desert ran,
 To slake the traveller's thirst;
 Oh! joyous shouts were borne to heaven,
 For that new type of mercy given.

They drank—the way-worn host of God,
 And every languid eye
 Looked bright again, as stars gleam out
 When shadows have passed by:
 How grateful to the burning brow,
 Was that cool fount's luxuriant flow!

Oh! deemed they not its worth beyond
 The costliest diadem:
 Could aught of finest gold compare,
 Or pearl, or lustrous gem,
 With those pure bubbles, as they broke
 All glist'ning from the desert rock!

Love burned anew, and notes of praise
 Arose to Abraham's God,
 While yet again their pilgrimage
 With cheerful feet they trod;
 Onward, a chosen, joyful band,
 They hasten'd to the promised land.

Behold! a better fount appears
 'Mid life's drear wilderness;
 Whence streams of living water flow,
 The thirsty soul to bless:
 Forth from a rock it issues free,
 And boundless as eternity.

The fevered spirit, sore oppressed
 With earthly woe and care;
 The weary, and the guilty too,
 May find refreshment there:
 Hope springs and blossoms like the rose,
 Where this celestial fountain flows.

And oh! can aught exceed its worth,
 Bright gems, or purest gold,
 Seem not the choicest things of earth,
 Its stores of wealth untold,
 Less than the fading hues of even,
 Compared with this best gift of Heaven!

Come nigh, ye pilgrims, faint and worn,
 For you a fount has burst;
 A Rock is open'd 'mid the waste!
 Come freely quench your thirst:
 Then as on eagles' wings arise,
 And soar for your immortal prize!

MY WIFE.

My chosen and my fairest!
 In sunshine and in gloom,
 Thy kindling eye shall cheer my path,
 Thy gentle smile illumine:
 And hand in hand we'll onward walk
 Amid life's busy crowd,
 While love shall cast a golden hue
 On every passing cloud.

I'll cherish thee, sweet one,
 So fondly from all ill,
 That time shall wind its silent way,
 But leave with thee no chill;
 And thus undimmed when years have flown,
 Affection's star shall shine,
 As when I breathed my earliest vow,
 And blushes spake thee mine.

My best beloved thus together
 We'll watch life's changing tide,

And gather all the fairest flowers
 That on the surface glide;
 And grief shall be an idle name,
 And sorrowing thoughts unknown,
 For love in darkest hours can frame
 A bright world of its own.

From the People's Friend.

TEARS.

The heart's sweet, balmy showers are they,
 When dark grief fills the soul;
 They come, they come, to chase away
 Our care, with sweet control!
 There's bliss in tears—'t is joy to weep,
 It hushes our burning cares to sleep.

See you poor mourner! death hath riven
 The dear chords of her heart;
 Yet tears spring forth like dews of heaven,
 And they can ease the heart;
 And she, though dark-eyed misery came,
 Can mock the spoiler's scathing flame.

There is a grief, that, ruthless, feeds
 On the heart's loneliness;
 And, nurtured there, its shooting seeds
 Bloom in that wilderness;
 But it is desolate, lone, and drear—
 Its sweet hopes gone—its roses sear.

Oh! it hath not a tear to pour
 On its own darkling gloom;
 One bursting, life redeeming shower
 Had rent the silent tomb,
 And bade the low-laid mourner rise,
 And cheer him in his once loved skies.

MARION.

NATURE.

BY A. B. STREET.

"Nature is Man's best teacher. She unfolds
 Her treasure to his search, unseals his eye,
 Illumes his mind, and purifies his heart.
 Her influence breathes in all the sighs and sounds
 Of her existence: she is Wisdom's self.
 Rest yields she to the 'weary' of the earth—
 Its 'heavy laden' she endows with strength.
 When sorrow presses on us—when the stings
 Of bitter disappointment pierce our soul—
 When our eye sickens at the sight of Man,
 Our ear turns, loathing, from his jarring voice,
 The shadowy forest and the quiet field
 Are then our comforters. A medicine
 Breathes in the wind that fans our fevered brow;
 The blessed sunshine yields a sweet delight;
 The bird's low warble thrills within our breast;
 The flower is eloquent with peace and joy,
 And better thoughts come o'er us. Lighter heart
 And purer feelings cheer our homeward way.
 We prize more deep the blessings that are ours,
 And rest a higher, holier trust in God.
 And when the splendid summer moonlight bathes
 Blinding the stars, Night's purple sky is rich,
 Transparent splendor, brightening all below,
 As tho', at God's command, Earth's angel-guard
 Had dropt his silver mantle from his form
 Upon her to protect the helpless sleep,
 Nature speaks soothing music, stealing through
 Each avenue to the heart, till all is peace.
 The stone is rolled from Pleasure's sepulchre,
 And forth she treads again in life and light;
 Our thoughts are lifted—passions swept away,
 And in our soul a holiness is shed—
 A mantle moonlight—solemn pure and sweet;
 The feverish throbbings leave our brow, and sleep
 Glides o'er our senses like a pleasant shade."

HUMAN LIFE—A BALLAD.

I stood by the towers of Ardeuville,
 And the bells rang out a joyous peal,
 Loudly and merrily rang they then,
 O'er field and valley, and sylvan glen:
 And each cheek looked bright as the blush of morn
 And each heart was glad, for an heiress was born.

I stood by those time-worn towers again,
 And prancing came forth a gallant train,
 There was a priest in his robes of white,
 And there was a maiden lovely and bright
 And a gallant Knight rode by her side,
 And the shouts of joy sounded far and wide,
 For the heiress was Randolph de Couray's bride.

And again by those portals proude did I stand,
 And again came forth a gallant band,
 And I saw the same priest, but sad was his pace,
 And I saw the same Knight: but he shrouded his face;

And I saw not that maiden in beauty's bloom,
 But a shroud and bier, and a sable plum,
 For the heiress was borne to her forefather's tomb.

And such is human life at best,
 A mother's—a lover—a green earth's breast,
 A wreath that is formed of flowrets three
 Primrose myrtle and rosemary;
 A hopeful, a joyful, a sorrowful stave,
 A voyage, a whelming wave,
 The cradle, the bed and the grave.

EXTRACTS from the proceedings of the Grand Lodge of the State of New Jersey, held at the Masonic Hall, in the city of Trenton, on Tuesday the 10th day of November, 5840.

The committee appointed at the last Annual Communication, to "investigate all matters of difference between the Grand Lodge of the State of New York, and St. John's Grand Lodge of the City of New-York, which might be submitted to their consideration," made the following Report, accompanied by sundry documents, marked No. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7 & 8. To the Most Worshipful Master, Wardens and Brethren of the Grand Lodge of the State of New Jersey:—The Committee appointed at the last Annual Communication of said Lodge to "investigate all matters of difference between the Grand Lodge of the State of New York, and St. John's Grand Lodge of said State, which might be submitted to their consideration."

RESPECTFULLY REPORT, That on the 18th day of February last, your Committee, through their Chairman, addressed a communication (marked No. 1. hereto annexed,) to the Grand Secretaries of each of the aforesaid Grand Lodges, respectively, enclosing the resolution of your Grand Lodge (marked No. 2,) of the 12th of November last, and also an extract of the proceedings of your Grand Lodge (marked No. 3,) of the 14th of November, 1837. That on the 20th of March last, your Committee received from the Grand Secretary of St. John's Grand Lodge of the State of New York, an extract of the proceedings of said lodge (marked No. 4.) in relation to said communication.—That on or about the first of May last, your Committee received from the Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge of the State of New York, a letter (marked No. 5,) conveying the views of the Grand Officers of said lodge marked No. 6,) in answer to said communication. That on the 4th day of November instant, your Committee received from the Grand Officers of St. John's Grand Lodge aforesaid, a communication signed by them, (marked No. 7.) and also: certificate (marked No. 8) relating to the matters in difference between the aforesaid Grand Lodges, with request that your Committee would lay the same before this Grand Lodge. That the Grand Officers of the Grand Lodge of the State of New York, having declined meeting your Committee as requested by them, your Committee have been unable to carry into effect the resolution under which they were appointed. The Grand Lodge will perceive that while St. John's Grand Lodge of the State of New York, and its officers, have been willing and desirous, to afford your Committee every facility in their power, to aid them in the discharge of their duties. the Officers of the Grand Lodge of the State of New York, have taken the responsibility upon themselves of refusing to meet your Committee without submitting to said Lodge the communication sent their Secretary as aforesaid, as there requested, and have moreover affected to consider the resolution of your Grand Lodge, appointing your Committee as an insulting proposition to them. Your Committee cannot, therefore, under existing circumstances, close this Report, without recommending that so much of the proceedings of your Grand Lodge, as agreed to in the Report of the Committee, made on the 14th November, 1837, be re-considered.

[Signed] D. BABBET,

SIMEON BALDWIN,

Dated 6th November, 1840.

The Report, and also the accompanying Documents, were read, disagreed to, and the Committee discharged.

Brother Kerwood offered the following preamble and resolutions, which were ordered to lie on the table:

Whereas this Grand Lodge was officially notified, in the year A. L. 5837, by the Grand Lodge of the State of New York, that persons under that jurisdiction had been expelled, and that the warrants of certain Lodges under that jurisdiction had been annulled; and was afterwards further notified, that the expelled Masons had formed in the City of N. York, a clandestine body called "St. John's Grand Lodge;" and whereas this Grand Lodge, at their annual meeting in November 5837, did unanimously agree to sustain the Grand Lodge of the State of New York and recommended that "no intercourse be held with the said expelled Masons, or with what they call their Grand Lodge" which sentiments were repeated in November 5838, in accordance with the decisions of all the Grand Lodges of the Union in which the subject had been examined; and whereas this Grand Lodge, in November 5839, refused to consider their former proceedings, yet did, at the earnest entreaty of the M. W. John S. Darcey, appoint a Committee for purposes entirely beyond the jurisdiction of this Grand Lodge; and the Grand Lodge of the State of New York having declined "to submit their lawful acts to the revision of any Committee"—Therefore,

Be it resolved, That this Committee be discharged.

Resolved, That the Grand Lodge of New Jersey regards the Grand Lodges of the several States and Territories of this Union which have been heretofore recognised as holding exclusive jurisdiction within the limits of those States and Territories, and will regard any attempt to violate this principle in this or any other State or Territory, as an innovation in the established regulations of the order, tending to its destruction.

Resolved, That the attempt which has been made in the City of New York, by certain expelled Masons, and their associates, to establish a Masonic jurisdiction there, has the unqualified reprobation of this Grand Lodge.

Resolved, That all intercourse between the Lodges or Masons of New Jersey, and the clandestine associations called "St. John's Grand Lodge of the State of New York," or any of its members, be and is hereby strictly forbidden.

The Grand Secretary offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That this Grand Lodge will adhere to the Report of the Committee on Foreign Correspondence, and to their recommendation as respects St. John's Grand Lodge, in the City of New York, and adopted by this Grand Lodge in the years 1837 and 1838.

Extracts from the Reports of the Committee on Foreign Correspondence in the years 1837 and 1838, referred to in the above Resolution, offered by the Grand Secretary:

In 1837, the Committee, after stating the difficulties that had arisen among the Brethren in New York, the formation of St. John's Grand Lodge, and the course pursued by the Grand Lodge of the State of New York in relation thereto, conclude by saying:—"Your Committee are of opinion that the Grand Lodge should be sustained in their proceedings; and would recommend that no intercourse be held with the expelled Masons, or with what they call their Grand Lodge."

In 1838, the Report concludes thus:—"The Grand Secretary has taken no notice of the Communication received from St. John's Grand Lodge, and has not sent them an extract of the proceedings of this Grand Lodge: which course, we trust, will be approved of by this Grand Lodge."

On motion made and seconded, it was unanimously

Resolved, That the R. W. Sylvester Spencer, of the city of New York, be re-appointed to represent this Grand Lodge in the Grand Lodge of the State of New York.

The Grand Lodge was then called from labor to refreshment; and, after a short time, was again called to labor.

Brother Kerwood offered the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the Grand Lodge of New Jersey regards the Grand Lodges of the several States and Territories of this Union, which have been heretofore recognized, as holding exclusive jurisdiction within the limits of those States and Territories; and will regard any attempt to violate this principle, in this, or any other State or Territory, as an innovation in the established regulations of the order.

THE LEGENDARY.

THE SMUGGLER.

Among the mountains on the frontiers of * * *, in Germany, is situated a lonely village, once inhabited by poor, but industrious and virtuous people; now, since it has been thrown into the corner of a kingdom, a nest of smugglers and thieves, where all the vices have taken up their abode, and where they are fostered by the lucrative though dangerous profession that is there pursued. Here, with all the pride of banditti boasting of their achievements, they related to me a circumstance, the thought of which makes me shudder.

"Come along," said a father one evening to his daughter, a girl of thirteen, who had just returned from the pastor of the village, who was giving her instructions, preparatory to confirmation, "put on your thick coat; we have something to get to night. Bid your mother good by, and beg her to lay her hand upon your head; for we cannot tell whether the Almighty will bring us safe through the business or not." They set out. The wind blew intensely cold over the hills, and howled among the trees; while low clouds, heavily laden with snow, sailed slowly over the gray heads of the naked rocks. They proceeded in silence along an unfrequented mountain-path, clambered like chamois along a yawning abyss, where a foaming torrent was struggling against the overpowering force of winter. "Lay hold of my belt," whispered the father as though apprehensive lest the very air should overbear him, "and hold fast—'tis not the most pleasant walking here." The girl trembled with cold and fear, and silently followed her rough conductor. "Stop!" he cried all at once, "do you hear nothing? Were not those men's voices?"

"No father, it is the wind howling through the pines."

"Stand still, then, and listen—that must be footsteps. I hear them quite plain."

"No father, it is the ice that is bursting in the abyss, and the waters, dashing against the rocks."

The old man, wrapped in a grey surtout, clapped his ear to the side of the rock to listen, and presently cried, "Come on!" The path became more difficult, and the rocks more abrupt.

"Should any misfortune befall me to night, my dear girl," said he, "tell your mother she must not give up the business; I have made a profitable concern of it, and I should not die content if I believed it would drop with my life. You are now old enough to lend a hand."

He then directed her to conceal herself in a small cavern in the rock. "You may eat your supper there," he observed, "for we are now upon the frontier; and up yonder you would only be in my way. I will whistle when I come back. When you hear that sign, look about you and bestir yourself."

With these words he continued his ascent, and the half-frozen girl crept sobbing into the snowy retreat to say a pater-noster. At a dizzy depth below her, the torrent roared monotonously—and before her, the wind whirled the snow in furious eddies from the rocks. She was alone in this dreary spot.

After a while the appointed signal was given, and she heard footsteps. Her father came with a pack, which he dragged after him.

"Here," said he, "pull it in! it is but light; you will have no difficulty. 'Tis worth a good round sum, though."

The pack was despoised in the cavern, and the smuggler went back again. The girl, mean while, crouched behind the pack, and rubbed her frozen limbs to warm and keep herself awake. Some time again elapsed; again a whistle was given as before, and the father returned with another load. He bade her take up the first, and made her go on before him.

"Father, I hear dogs barking! don't you?"

"No, no, child it is only the wheezing of my old lungs."

"There again! I fancy I hear something behind us."

"Go along, girl, and hold your tongue!"

"There is something moving behind us, father, down yonder, don't you see?"

"Good God! The sharpshooters! We are lost if we cannot reach the ravine!"

A dog came up and threatened to seize the man, when clinging without the hope of safety to the rock, he hurled his pack at the animal, which tumbled, howling, together with a mass of snow, down the precipice. "Give it me," he cried, taking the lighter load from the girl, grasping his hand firmly, and drawing her with accelerated steps down the rocky path.—Fright deprived her of the use of her limbs, and he dragged her along like a dead thing. Destruction pressed closer and closer upon their heels. Voices repeatedly cried "Halt!" No answer was returned, and the report of a piece was reverberated a hundred-fold by the echoes of the mountains. The ball struck the rock and dropped at their feet.

"Merciful God!" ejaculated the girl, "I cannot go any farther. Leave me here, father; they will not murder me."

"But you will betray me, girl."

"No, no, no; leave me here, and make your escape."

"You will betray me, and bring your father to the gallows. Come along!"

Filled with despair, he raised her from the ground, and wound with his two-fold burthen round a ledge of rock. It was to no purpose. The sharpshooters appeared above and below, and the anxiety of the smuggler increased every instant. The girl had sunk down as if inanimate, and all the efforts of the affrighted father to arouse her were unavailing. Again was heard the cry of "Halt!" again the balls whizzed past, and the ministers of the law kept approaching nearer and nearer. Life or death depended on a single moment. He bent over his child, and caught her in his arms. "So help me God in my utmost need!" he ejaculated aloud, and threw her down the abyss. The body dashed against the projecting crags in the descent, and rolled into the torrent beneath.

The pursuers stood aghast at the atrocious deed, and overpowered with horror dropped their weapons. The smuggler escaped with his pack, and has since often visited the same spot on a similar errand.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

ORIGIN OF SILK IN EUROPE.

The use made of silk at the present day, from the imperial robe to the shawl which wraps the menial, forms a surprising contrast with its rarity and costliness, when it was first employed for clothing, and its origin and progress in the history of commerce, it is an interesting inquiry. The account of its introduction into Europe may perhaps amuse the curious.

From a nation of robbers, Rome became a nation of warriors, and, altho' they despised commerce, they were well pleased to adorn themselves, their villas, and palaces, with the rich and beautiful fabrics of China, India, and Persia.

The Median Drapery, the name by which silks were known, was one of the most expensive, and most admired, of all the oriental luxuries, which their conquest had procured for them. The wife of the Emperor Aurelian besought him to purchase her only one robe, of a purple color; but he refused, because it would cost more than twice its weight in gold.

Garments made of the precious stuff were in great request among the opulent Romans, and curiosity was awake to know what it was, and how it was manufactured.

It is amusing to observe the exercise of imagination which it excited among the fashionables of Rome and Constantinople. Some thought it was mysteriously wrought of beautiful flowers; others that it was made by combing the leaves and bark of a curious tree, some believed it was a sort of wool, and others that it was down, spun on the branches of trees by insects.

The country of this wonderful production was said to be surrounded by high hills, inhabited by a gentle people, blessed with a fertile soil and a delicious climate, "where they passed their happy days in tranquility, amidst shady groves which were fanned by gentle breezes, and produced fleeces of wool; that being sprinkled with water, they combed off the dazzling thread, and made the Median Drapery." It was further said, that "these people spake never a word," but kept their wares until a sufficient price was offered, when the exchange was made in silence.

Silk does not appear to have been known to Homer or to Herodotus. The first mention that is made of it is by Aristotle, who says that "Pamphila a woman of Cos, received a web from the far regions of the west; and unravelled, re-spun, and reweave it into a delicate and brilliant clothing for women."

The manufacture of silk goods had long been carried on in Tyre, and other Phœnician cities who derived the raw material from India and China. But at the date of the Christian Era, the Indians became carriers themselves, and stopping in Persia for a market, threw a monopoly in the hands of the Persians, who supplied remoter nations at their own price. The Roman conquests and exactions had kept the commercial world perpetually changing. Tyre, Sydon, and Carthage, the great theatres of ancient commerce, had been overthrown; but although Carthage could never revive, the former cities rose from their ashes to a degree of activity. They continued the manufactories of goods for clothing; and the Romans, who escaped the destroying sword of Attila, deplored the loss of the beautiful silks of China, more than of their slaughtered legions.

The luxurious and ambitious Justinian, waged a vain war with the Persians, in the hope of recovering from the eastern Empire, some of their Asiatic possessions. Meanwhile he sent ambassadors to the King of Axuma, in Africa, beseeching him for the sake of their communion in religion, to direct his subjects to buy silks from China, and from India, for the use of the Emperor, and thus prevent his gold from going into the hands of his enemies, the Persians. By the enormous duties and taxes which he had levied on the Egyptians, and the other countries, and cities, which had supplied the western world, he had exhausted, or destroyed them so as to leave no alternative for the luxurious Romans of Constantinople, but to live without the Median drapery, or comply with the exorbitant demands of their Persian enemies. From this distress which would have provoked the scorn and the laughter of their ancestors, they were most unexpectedly relieved.

Two Persian monks, inspired by zeal and curiosity travelled to Tzintza, and Serinda, (China and India,) and acquired the secret which had been kept in those countries for ages. Instead of communicating their knowledge to their own countrymen, they proceeded, on their return, to Constantinople, and imparted the secret to the emperor. Great was his astonishment to learn, that it was produced by a species of worm, and that the monks had purloined, and brought off a quantity of the eggs, in the hollow of a cane, by means of which they might be propagated in his dominions. They were rewarded with vast sums of money; and the precious insects, with manufactories placed under the care and direction of the monks soon became flourishing, and satisfied the requirements of the effeminate Romans.

The silk weavers of Tyre, and Berytus, were compelled to work in the imperial manufactories, and the silk worms thus brought by stealth from Eastern Asia, were the origin of that vast branch of commerce, which spread by imperceptible legrees over Europe; and will, probably, at no distant day be as active in our country as in its native regions in the remotest East.

Clean Hands.—Mr. C—L—, playing at whist the other evening, with an intimate friend who seemed (as far as his hands were concerned) to hold the Mahometan doctrine of ablution in supreme contempt, said to him, with a countenance "more in sorrow than in anger," "My good fellow, if dirt were trumps, what a hand you would have!"

THE AVENGER OF BLOOD.

A REMINISCENCE OF A SCENE ON BOARD A SHIP OF WAR.

BY USHER PARSONS, M. D.

'T WAS in a dark, tempestuous night, that the frigate Guerriere ploughed her way through the Gulf of Finland, rolling and plunging at the sport of every billow, as it dashed its spray over her deck. The incessant creaking and groaning of the ship's joints at every surge, were occasionally interrupted by the hoarse sound of the officer's trumpet, or the shrill pipe of the boatswain, and the tramp of men running with the halyards.

'Steward,' said the caterer of the ward-room, as he entered it from deck, 'invite down all the officers of the mess about the galley, and all others that can be spared from duty. Tell them it is Saturday night;—and mind ye, have ready the large can of whiskey-punch, piping hot, and materials for replenishing it.'

The social board was soon surrounded, each mess-mate steadying himself in his chair, as the ship rolled from side to side, by embracing a leg of the table between his knees. The customary toast for Saturday evenings, 'To sweet-hearts and wives,' was drunk with the usual sigh of fond recollection; and then followed the enlivening song and mirthful story.

'There is some fun,' said the sailing master, 'in that pilot who joined us at Copenhagen. If we could but get the Russian down from deck, he would make sport enough for us, in his broken English.'

'We'll have him then,' replied the first lieutenant: 'Steward, ask the pilot to join us; and, look ye, have less noise in that gun-room when you return.' The ward-room servants, who occupied the adjoining apartment, had evidently followed our example in circulating the Saturday evening glass.

Presently, the rough, weather-beaten pilot appeared at the table, and turning his huge mustaches right and left, to open a way for the glass, he soon made up in speed what he lacked in time; and readily overtook us in the convivial race; nor did he fail to confirm the sailing-master's opinion of his mirth-moving powers. Little did he dream of the transition his feelings were soon to undergo. But I anticipate.

It is very common on board war-vessels, on pleasant evenings, for officers to stand within listening distance of the men about the fore-castle, to over-hear, as it were unobserved, the songs and jests of the jolly sons of Neptune. In like manner, the noise from the servants' room had drawn the purser from the table to listen to their sport. After a time, he returned to the company, with an expression of countenance that betokened astonishment at something he had overheard.

'Gentlemen,' said he, in a low tone, 'one of our servants is a pirate!'

'Pirate!' exclaimed several of the company.

'Yes,' answered the purser, 'a Barbarian pirate, who was convicted, and subsequently pardoned by President Monroe; and he is now giving an account of his atrocities to the other servants.'

'By Saint Nevski!' exclaimed the Russian pilot, 'dat is no vay de Emperor treats de pirates. He would send dem to Siberia, to be knoused and den hanged.'

'Let us,' resumed the purser, 'have the rascal out here, and make him describe some of his piracies.'

To this proposition all agreed; and John Smith, for such was his name, real or fictitious, was called forth, to entertain us with a story from real life. All eyes were arrested by the expression of his countenance, as he approached the table, and each one would have been slow to suspect him of pravity, so demure and innocent were his looks.

The first lieutenant began his interrogatories in a calm and serious manner, in a grave tone of voice, remarking that he wished to know some of the particulars of the piracies committed by him and others, for which he was tried and condemned. With a look of astonishment at our knowing anything of his career, John hesitated to utter a word in reply.

'Go on!' said the lieutenant 'go on!' we know you have been pardoned, and therefore you have nothing to fear from us. Let us hear the whole story.'

John began, as might be supposed, with a disclaimer of his own guilt, in the outset; alleging his ignorance of the designs of the band with whom he enlisted, until it was too late to extricate himself. He then recounted several of their piratical adventures, some of which were detected, and led to their capture and trial. By this time he had become easy and communicative, and desirous to gratify our expected curiosity and interest of his stories. 'But there was one act,' continued he, 'that never came to light, which was worse than all the rest.'

'Let us have it, John,' rejoined all the company; 'out with it!'

'Well,' continued John, 'it so happened we fell in with a Russian ship, bound to Mexico, and boarded her. The captain, who was a brave fellow, resisted our search for money. We thereupon knocked out his brains with a handspike, and (oh it makes me shudder to think of it!) we then killed every man on board; and after plundering all we could carry away, we scuttled the ship, and set fire to her.'

'Vot Russian ship vas dat?' interrupted the pilot, impatient to learn whether he had ever any knowledge of her, or her commander.

'It was Sir,' replied John, 'the ship Orloff, Captain Nicholas Potowsky.'

'Mine Got!' exclaimed the pilot, with clenched hands, and a quivering lip, 'it vas my brodder! Villian! murderer!—it vas my brodder Nicholas! You shall be put in irons, and hanged, ven dis ship arrives at Cronstads! I vill see de captain dis very night.—O Nicholas! You vas not drowned den, ship and all as ve always supposed!'

The pilot now rose from the table to seek the captain, but was unable to pass the sentinel stationed at the cabin door. Meantime, John Smith was hurried down into the coal-pit, in a dark corner of the vessel and was there confined out of sight, during the pilot's stay on board, which however was short, as we soon landed at Cronstads. It was reported that he applied to the authorities there to take John out of the ship, but was told that the Guerrier, being a national armed vessel, nothing of the kind could be done. John therefore escaped due punishment, till we arrived at the next port, which was in Sicily, where, expecting another trial for his life, he immediately deserted, and was never more heard of.

The striking incidents of this narrative, the reader will perceive, are the perpetration of a murder in the Gulf of Mexico, and its first disclosure in the Gulf of Finland, nearly on the opposite side of the globe; and then the brother of the victim, by the murderer himself. The whole savors so much of fiction, that the writer thinks it well to state that he was surgeon of the ship at the time, and knows the material facts to be as he has here related them.

VARIETY.

WHOLESALE LEGISLATION. At a General Court in Boston, 1639, "an order was made to abolish that vain custom of drinking to one another, and that upon these and other grounds.

1st. It was a thing of no good use.

2d. It was conducive to drunkenness, and occasion of quarrelling and blood shed.

3d. It occasioned a waste of much wine and beer.

4th. It was troublesome to many, especially the master and mistress of the feast, who were forced thereby to drink more often than they would.

Yet divers even goodly persons were loth to part with this idle ceremony, who, when disputation was tendered, they had no argument to maintain it—such power hath custom.

Character of a good fellow.—How many there are who give up every pretention to the character of a good man, for the name of a Good Fellow! and what is a good fellow? Why, a graceless young man, who is addicted to every vice, until by debauchery and extravagance, which he does not really enjoy, he brings the gray hairs of his parents with sorrow to the grave. This a good fellow! Sometimes in visiting the hospitable mansion of a friend, he corrupts the son, or debauches the daughter; and he is a good fellow! He perhaps marries,—but to become fretful and penurious at home, and thoughtlessly profuse abroad; he dissipates that which should support his family, returning but to insult and distress them; yet he is generous over a bottle, and must be a good fellow! At last his money runs short, and he would borrow of his friend: few lend, and those few he forgets to pay; till every one avoids him, and he is no longer a welcome visitor, even to mine hostess; for then he is no longer a good fellow!

The celebrated physician Malouin, at Paris, had such a veneration for his profession, that he declared himself convinced that Molier's death was a just judgment on him for his want of respect to the science of Medicine. Being once a witness of the anxious punctuality with which a patient took a most nauseous medicine, he said to him with great solemnity, "Sir you are worthy to be sick."

Hints to the Married and Single.—False modesty or real bashfulness keeps many a man living a bachelor, when if his tongue did not stick to the rook of his mouth at times, he could pop the question to the girl of his heart, be accepted, married, and a happy husband. They manage these things well in London where if a gentleman wants a wife, he wears a ring on the first finger of the left hand; if he be engaged, he wears it on the second finger; if married on the third; and on the fourth if he never intends to get married. When a lady is not engaged, she wears a hoop or diamond on her first finger; if engaged on the second; if married on the third; and on the fourth, if she intends to be a maid. When a gentleman presents a fan, a flower or trinkets to a lady with the left hand, this on his part, is an overture of regard; should she receive it with the left hand, it is considered as an acceptance of his esteem, but if with the right hand, it is a refusal of the offer.

Size of the Globe.—Were we to take our station on the top of a mountain, and survey the surrounding landscape, we should perceive an extent of view stretching 40 miles in every direction, forming a circle of 80 miles in diameter, 250 in circumference, and comprising an area of 5,000 square miles. But such an object forms no more than 40,000th part of the globe; so that before we can acquire an adequate conception of its magnitude, we must conceive 40,000 landscapes of a similar extent to pass in review before us; and were a scene of the magnitude now stated to pass before us every hour till all the diversified scenery of earth were brought under our view, and were twelve hours a day allotted for the observation, it would require nine years and forty-eight days before the whole surface of the globe, could be contemplated.—Dick's Philosophy.

Errors of the Press.—It is amusing to a man who has been the printer's hack for years, to witness the sensitiveness of young writers and beginners, at errors of the Press. They attach to them an importance which no man experienced would think for a moment of giving to them. An article for a newspaper is generally forgotten on the next day after reading; and if it is not so forgotten, and the error is consequence can be readily corrected on the day following. But to write for immortality in a newspaper—or even to expect remembrance for a fortnight from any such memorial, is as John Neal has wittily observed, to engrave your own name on a pumpkin.

DRINK—DRANK—DRUNK.—An exchange paper, whose title we hesitate to give, in speaking of a meeting of the friends of a gentleman, and the toasts given upon the occasion, remarked as follows:

"On the health of Mr. McMichael. Being drunk, he replied in a speech of great comprehensiveness, precision, and excellence!"

It will thus be seen the accidental introduction of a period in the above paragraph, has caused a point that would be capital were it not that a letter of the latter title has usurped a place in B-ing, where an inferior one should be.

CLARA: OR LOVE AND SUPERSTITION.

BY DON TRUEBA TELESFORO D'F COSIO.

Don Theodosio was a young man of quick fancy and an inquiring mind—his natural talents were good, and a strong love for study had tended to their full development and maturity. He had always a wish to travel, and, much against the inclination of his uncle, he had spent the last eighteen months in visiting foreign courts. Upon his return to his own country, his ideas were enlarged, and his views of men and things more imbued with that spirit of philosophy, which the commerce of the world bestows on an observant mind. He felt a thorough contempt for the feeble intellect of his relative, while the tyrannic temper which had led to the rash step taken by his cousin Agnes, filled him with disgust and abhorrence.—The feelings with which Don Gil regarded his nephew, were ten times more decided and hostile. He considered him as little better than a heretic. The freedom of his speech, the boldness of the maxims which he feared not to propound, and the little respect which he paid to the holy words of Father Bastos, were enough to produce that rancorous and bitter feeling which fanaticism seldom fails to confer on its zealous votaries.

It was, therefore, with a kind of horror that he discovered the partiality existing between his obnoxious nephew and Clara. The friar was not backward in heightening the terrors which his weak mind had conjured up. Theodosio was represented as a man totally devoid of religion, since he scrupled not to doubt many things, which no true son of the Christian church should ever call in question. The notions of the young man on the subject of convents, particularly shocked the sensibility of the friar. Dona Josepha on her side, was literally thrown into fits, at the idea of harboring a heretic beneath her roof—and her alarm, of course, was terribly augmented, when the heinous-crime of Clara's loving such an object came to her knowledge. She wondered how a Christian girl could be so wicked, and, at the same time, she did not the opportunity escape of launching against that pernicious beauty which had produced the admiration of Theodosio.

Meantime the affection of the young people had developed itself into a deep absorbing feeling, which now became beyond the power of tyrannic control to check. One day Theodosio ventured to open his heart on the subject that engrossed all his thoughts. Clara, who already loved her cousin, with all the warmth and sincerity of a first and pure female affection, was thrown into confusion when her cousin revealed the state of his heart. He took her hand, which trembled in his, and to the kind and fervent vows which he made she gave no answer, but the visible agitation under which she labored, told the lover, if any proof were yet wanting, that his affections were fully returned. This was a moment of bliss supreme, for there is not in nature aught so intoxicating as the first avowal of true love. How much is the value of such happiness enhanced when the object is a young, pure, artless girl, of the possession of whose heart an angel-spirit might feel proud!

This beautiful dream of felicity—this powerful charm of nature was soon dissolved by the sudden appearance of the Indiano. He fixed an austere look on his young relatives—the crimson flew to Clara's cheek—and this only served to augment the devotee's displeasure and suspicion. He no longer could harbor a doubt concerning the true position of things and he felt a bitter annoyance at what he considered little short of a sin in the young people. Let us return to Agnes.

The condition of poor Agnes was at the present period most distressing. She had at length discovered the error of her imprudent conduct. Instead of a kind protector, a loving friend, she had found in her husband a worthless being, equally devoid of heart and principle. His whole soul was engrossed with gambling pursuits in which vice, as well as other excesses he consumed the greater part of his existence. But what produced the keenest agony in the mind of Agnes, was the conviction that she had never truly possessed his affection; his marriage having been prompted more by sordid interest than affection; and this, the most painful discovery that a deluded woman can make, had already produced a melancholy effect in the health of the unfortunate Agnes.

Gabriel Fuentes was well acquainted with the Indiano's vast wealth, and he had settled it within his own mind to possess himself of a considerable portion of it. He imagined that Agnes and Clara would inherit their uncle's fortune, and he forthwith determined to make up to the former. Fuentes was a character any thing but what would have pleased a man of the devotee's strict religion, and he would scout the remotest notion of an alliance with a notorious profligate, even if no attack had been premeditated against his pocket. This obstacle, however did not make our enterprising adventurer give himself up to despair.—He was thoroughly acquainted with all the avenues to the female heart, and extremely conversant with all the little arts which have so high a value in the estimation of young girls, and which are so available in ensnaring their affections. The personal appearance of Don Gabriel was pre-possessing—his manner and deportment elegant, and he was a practised master in the science of tender looks. Having once secured the object of his scheme, he felt no apprehension with regard to the result. He argued on the old notion, that parents sooner or later will relent, and forgive the fault of young transgressors. Thus he flattered himself with the idea that, at a future period, a portion of the Indiano's fortune would fall into his power.

How distant was the poor deluded Agnes from suspecting the real nature of her admirer's thoughts!—Whilst she imagined that he was actuated by a noble spirit, and by the stimulus of admiration, to rescue her from her painful condition—whilst she invested her husband with all the charms of a generous heart and manly character, the deceitful man was coolly and calmly planning the most selfish and sordid schemes. Alas! how many girls live in this pleasing delusion, and only awake to the painful reality when the evil is beyond the power of redress.

The two first months of their union, Agnes and her partner lived with sufficient comfort and happiness—the charms of the wife, her youth, talents, and warmth of heart, were enough to captivate, for a short time, even the worn-out taste of a professed libertine. But these halcyon days were soon to expire. Don Gabriel got at length tired with the life he had embraced—he again flew to the gaming table—the want of money to satisfy his ruling passion excited vexation and disappointment. He applied to the Indiano. His first letter remained unanswered—his second shared the same fate—the third was written by Agnes, in all the agony of grief: it failed to soften the heart of the old man. Instead of the means of supporting life the indignant uncle sent her a long sermon, in which he detailed the heinous sins of which she had been guilty—the enormity of her ingratitude towards her kind relations, and the unreasonableness of her application to persons whom she had so deeply offended. He concluded his epistle by exhorting her to penance, and telling her to trust in the mercy of God; to discard every hope of ever receiving a farthing from her uncle.

This letter threw Don Gabriel into a fit of rage and disappointment. From this moment the indifference which he had already begun to exhibit towards his helpless wife, was converted into unequivocal contempt and aversion. He no longer took any care to conceal the detestable feelings of his heart, and the sordid character of his mind. He bitterly upbraided the wretched Agnes with his misfortune, and cursed the moment he first saw her fatal person. This addition of misery produced a wild and fearful sensation on the almost broken heart of the poor victim; but the measure of woe was not yet complete. It was in the midst of accumulated sorrow, in the midst of poverty and remorse—abandoned by her relatives—hated by her husband, and forgotten by all that poor Agnes became a mother! In the infant born to her, she might have experienced some alleviation to her affliction and sorrow, had not the birth of the child redoubled the bitter feelings of her husband;

Appalling poverty—utter destitution came now to weigh on the wretched and ill-assorted couple—the transition from habitual vice to the commission of crime is almost perceptible. Don Gabriel, after a midnight broil, and instigated by despair, had associated with some profligates, and taken a part in a desperate robbery. The act came to the knowledge of the police, and an active pursuit of the delinquents commenced. What was the horror of the wretched Agnes, when she beheld her door broken open in the silence of night, and the agents of justice rush into her very chamber in search of a public malefactor—a robber! Still more—what were her feelings when, in the person of the detested criminal, she was compelled to recognize her husband! Hitherto her pride had supported the unfortunate woman in nearly all the stages of bitter sorrow, disappointment, and wretchedness, but, the last stroke of fate—the brand of disgrace and shame, was beyond the power of fortitude. Poor Agnes uttered a piercing cry, and fell senseless on her bed by the side of her sleeping babe.

The circumstances attendant on the robbery were of so flagrant a nature, that Fuentes, after being ignominiously expelled from the regiment to which he belonged, was despite of the powerful interest made for a commutation of punishment, condemned to banishment to the prisons of Ceuta—the principal depot for the Spanish convicts. Agnes had been left by her worthless husband in a state, not only of utter destitution, but encumbered with debts which it was completely out of her power to discharge. The landlord of the humble dwelling which she occupied was the first to urge his claims. He had waited a long time for his rent, and perceiving no prospect of ever obtaining his due, he came to the cruel resolution of expelling the ill-fated Agnes from the premises. He allowed her few days to arrange her affairs, and the term having expired, insensible to her prayers, and unmoved by the horrid picture of her distress, he proceeded to put his plan in execution.

Agnes had disposed of every article of the least value, to provide for the first necessities of life. Her trinkets, and even her dresses, had gradually disappeared, and when the dreadful instant of her expulsion arrived, she had no object to carry away with her—nothing but the mournful weight of an infant, doomed to the severest gripe of misfortune. She took the poor child into her arms, and summoning her pride and energy of character for this most appalling of her trials, she quitted the house a poor, wretched roofless wanderer, uncertain whither to direct her steps, ignorant of what might be her destiny, and almost indifferent and callous to any further prospective woe.

The shadows of evening were descending, when the ill-fated Agnes quitted her dwelling; a drizzling rain had begun to fall, the day was cold, chill, and dreary, fit emblem of the state of her mind. Every thing announced that the approaching night would be one of darkness and cheerless gloom. Agnes for some time wandered about the streets of Madrid, totally careless what course to pursue. She applied at last for shelter to the house of an elderly female relative of her husband, in whose society she had experienced the only comfort which her bitter life had of late enjoyed; to her utter consternation she found the doors and windows of the house closed; the crime and ignominious destiny of Don Gabriel had compelled his relation to quit the scene of his disgrace, and retire to a distant part of the country. This discovery vanquished the last remains of the poor sufferer's courage.—She gave herself up to despondency, and totally regardless of what might be her fate, she continued for some time her melancholy perambulation through the capital. The night had closed in utter darkness, and the rain began to fall profusely. Fatigue, exhaustion, and the increasing storm, compelled at length the wanderer to seek refuge from its fury under the porch of the convent of St. Philip Neri.

There poor Agnes, crunched like a dog, endeavored by her caresses to hush her cries of her infant. What a dreadful picture was this! What fearful isolation! Agnes, in the midst of a great capital, was like a being who had no communion, no sympathy with those of her species; the world was a blank—a dreary waste to her. Shivering with the piercing cold, drenched in the rain, which fell in torrents, and from which she could only obtain a partial shelter, she looked with a sort of listless apathy on the gloomy prospect before her. A few stragglers, flying from the storm, hurried by in haste, and took no notice of the wretched being, they were too busy in seeking the comfort of their homes, to bestow even a passing thought on the sufferer. A sumptuous equipage came by—then another; and as the rolling of the wheels became more faint in the distance, the awful silence which followed served to augment the fearful feeling of desolation and horror. A reverend friar belonging to the convent then approached close to Agnes. She received no other consolation than a pious rebuke from the man of God. Mistaking her probably for one of the wretched females who pay the forfeit of their virtue with a life of shame and misery, he bestowed a smart reproach on the poor victim, and then hastened to a comfortable bed, no doubt, well satisfied with the zeal he had shown in the cause of morality.

In this awful and bitter moment the memory of poor Agnes reverted to her sister. Was she happy? would not her ulterior destiny be equally appalling! No—no, her gentle nature would bend to the will of her relatives, and calm resignation would ultimately lead to comparative repose and happiness. This idea diffused a momentary gleam of consolation over the darkened heart of Agnes. But the increasing and more painful cries of her child dissolved the transient dream and recalled her senses to all the horrors of her situation. Although the fire and boldness of her temper had been subdued by the iron pressure of misfortune, still enough remained of that desperate courage, which in a moment of moral oblivion, might counsel the adoption of a fearful act. The image of self-destruction for a moment intruded on the throbbing brain of poor Agnes. She dwelt with a bitter complacency on the horrible thought. It would put a termination to her constant and overwhelming sufferings. She would press her child to her bosom, and by one bold, fearful act, place him and his wretched mother beyond the power of a world in which they were outcasts, doomed to misfortune. Fortunately this frightful idea was soon repelled by that principle of right, which not all her formidable trials had been able to eradicate from the mind of Agnes. She shuddered at the crime the next moment after the spirit of evil had instigated its perpetration, and this last victory of hapless, forlorn, and forsaken virtue, brought along with it that gratifying and consoling sensation, which is its constant attendant.

The pathetic wailing of the little sufferer attracted, at last, the notice of a charitable being—for happily in this world of selfishness there are still those who come forward to vindicate the better attributes of the human species. This humane person was a female, who lived hard by, and who had been moved by the incessant cries of the child. Alas! when the voice of sorrow and distress fills the air, the ear of woman is always first to catch the mournful sound! Agnes was offered a shelter by a charitable individual of her own sex. She felt deeply thankful, but the hand of consolation came too late. A violent fever, consequent on the dreadful suffering both of mind and body which she had undergone, rendered indispensable her removal to a public hospital.

What a dreadful contrast did poor Agnes offer at this sad period, with what she had been a few years since. All her charms had withered—her cheek was hollow and ghastly—her eye sunk and lustreless—her lips cold and quivering—her raven locks tinged with the silver of premature decay, and the lines of sorrow furrowed her smooth and beautiful brow. Her mind had undergone the same melancholy change; her spirits were broken—the fire of her fancy extinguished—even the power of memory was bedimmed and almost lost. Thus a lovely, intelligent, and beautiful being—the expectant of fortune and happiness—born to ornament society, sank in early youth on the bed afflicted by public charity. From this bed she was never more to rise; in a few days her suffering spirit was released from the miseries to which it had been so long condemned. Poor Agnes expired in the hospital, abandoned by her relatives, neglected by her friends, and surrounded only by strangers and images of woe and isolation. Her child followed, soon after, its wretched mother to her early grave. By charity their remains were consigned, without delay, to the earth. The ceremony was over, and they were forgotten!!!

When Don Gil Perez received intelligence of the melancholy fate of his niece, instead of feeling compassion for her misfortunes, or being visited by remorse for that cruel treatment, which had been the real origin of her untimely end, the narrow-minded and superstitious old man felt a degree of horror at the supposed crimes of the poor victim; and he failed not to tell her sister that the hand of God was visible in the punishment with which the disobedience of Agnes had been attended. Father Bastos said many edifying things on the occasion. He descanted copiously on the dreadful effects of pride and disobedience—the eligibility of conventual seclusion—and the happy destiny which Agnes had lost by her rebellious spirit. He concluded by hoping for the mercies of Heaven towards the poor sinner, and trusting that Clara would at least take warning from the dreadful example of her elder sister. Dona Josepha threw also her share into the stock of this pious and superfluous oratory. She was of course very eloquent on the subject of female youth and beauty, to the possession of which she unhesitatingly attributed the misfortune, offences, and the disastrous fate of her niece.

The situation of Clara became, from this moment, more irksome and mortifying. In the lectures with which these personages thought proper to treat the young girl every day in the year, the disobedience of Agnes and her punishment was the unvarying peroration to the discourse. As it was a self-evident truth that Agnes would not have died in the hospital if she had consented to enter a nunnery, Dona Josepha, by process of a very curious chain of argument, satisfied herself that the only remedy for Clara escaping the same, was to make a nun of her with all possible despatch.

The possession of riches is, according to many very pious and learned authors, a severe impediment in the road to heaven; simply because their use being misapplied, it leads imperceptibly to the commission of sin, and the perdition of souls. This being admitted what act could illustrate in a more exemplary manner the fervor of charity, than to remove the said terrible obstacle from a Christian's path! Father Bastos had the salvation of the Indiano, the wife, and the niece much at heart; and consequently he felt it a duty incumbent, both on fatherly solicitude and religious capacity, to ward off the dangers that might obstruct the accomplishment of so desirable an end. Hence the pious man was indefatigable in the holy work of getting from the Indiano all the money he could.

But this was not all. The fact being now established beyond doubt that Theodosio and Clara were deeply in love, it was indispensable to provide a prompt and efficacious remedy for a danger which threatened so much evil and calamity. Father Bastos had conceived a bitter and very zealous aversion against the young man. Theodosio was equally disgusted with the sordid schemes and superstition of Father Bastos. A vast quantity of rancorous feeling was divided into two equal portions, and shared between the lover and the friar. It was no difficult task to imbue the narrow mind of Don Gill with prejudice against his nephew.

A warm dispute, which occurred between Theodosio and Father Bastos, brought matters to a crisis. The infuriated friar represented every mark of contempt bestowed on his person as so many gross affronts offered to religion. The Indiano was shocked, Dona Josepha escaped a fainting fit by the merest chance, and the expulsion of the offender from the house was instantly decided upon. This plan was without loss of time carried into effect; but Don Theodosio, on quitting his beloved Clara, made an eternal vow of constancy, and frequently conjured her not to take any future step without his previous knowledge and approbation. He promised that ere long, he would return armed with legal power to rescue her from the state of thralldom in which she was kept by her relatives.

The departure of Theodosio was the harbinger of joy to every member of the Indiano's family except his niece. The separation from her lover fell like a heavy weight on her heart. She felt as if she were doomed never more to see the object of her first and only affection. Her gentle spirit pined away in secret sorrow, although the meekness of her disposition induced her to assure before her relatives a cheerful aspect, that was in direct contradiction with the state of her feelings.

To induce Clara to take the veil was the next measure to be adopted, and the success of this scheme appeared but little doubtful in the opinion of Father Bastos. To the first attacks Clara put forward an opposition which her catechisers had not anticipated—the genuine feelings of nature—and the potency of a pure, deep, and absorbing affection struggled hard against the suggestions of superstition. Although she did not possess powers of intellect of the strongest order, yet her sense would tell her that there was no crime in the love which she felt for her cousin. A soothing hope, which came at intervals to illumine her heart, supplied her with a momentary courage, and she for the first month uniformly repelled every endeavor made to induce her to enter on a life of seclusion.

But this opposition was not calculated to discourage Father Bastos. He flattered himself that time and perseverance would vanquish the reluctance of the girl. Clara's soft and yielding disposition would not withstand long, unassisted, the repeated attacks of parental authority and religious expostulations. The only danger which the friar had to apprehend, was from the attempts made by the lover to thwart his plans. To prevent any intercourse between him and Clara was accordingly a primary consideration. This, in a house like that of the Indiano, and with the secluded habits of life in which Clara spent her time, was a matter of very easy accomplishment. Two months elapsed, and yet Clara had received no intelligence from her lover. His letters had been intercepted, while she herself, was kept in complete ignorance of the fact.

The most fearful expedient which the Indiano and the friar used to carry their schemes into effect was, as we have already stated, the awful terrors of religion. The mind of Clara was but too timid, and well disposed to receive such impressions. After some time, therefore, she began to think that she had been guilty of grievous sin in the eyes of God, for having entertained so absorbing an affection for a mortal man—one of his creatures—made of perishable clay, and full of frailties and imperfections! The lugubrious phantoms soon became the source of constant and mortifying anxiety—the repose of poor Clara was destroyed. She, who was pure and sinless, began seriously to fancy herself a delinquent—a sombre gloom gradually pervaded her mind—she became more attached to frequent the church and recite long prayers—the fatal disease of her relatives had infected her, although, in her case, the malady was destitute of that poison, which tended to the misery of others. No; the hapless and deluded girl, could not, for a moment, harm any living thing save herself—one of the most lovely, guileless, and unoffending of Heaven's creatures!

Of all the dismal images that worked on her fevered brain, none was so fearful, so full of sorrow, or so constantly recurring, as the remembrance of her unfortunate sister. This terrible phantom persecuted her by day, and disturbed her slumbers by night. Father Bastos had but too well succeeded in persuading Clara that Agnes had evinced the conduct of a great sinner, and that her miseries and disastrous end was a just punishment by an offended God. Moreover, the example of the sister was strongly urged as the most efficient arm to induce Clara to become a nun. A parallel was instituted between her present reluctance to enter a convent, and the rebellious conduct exhibited by Agnes at a former period. This reasoning, however false in principle, was but too plausible not to produce a strong effect in the already bedimmed understanding of Clara. She felt the full force of the friar's remonstrances, and she shuddered in anticipation at the sins which she might commit, and the dreadful death she might incur, should she persist in opposing the wishes of her uncle.

Dwelling on this perplexing subject, she retired one evening to bed, her mind more than usually loaded with frightful images of future misery. She directed her fervid prayers to Heaven, and composed herself to sleep. It was in vain—a thousand superstitious terrors run riot in her imagination. Then the form of her lover—that true, kind, and sincere lover, whom she was compelled to abjure, came forward arrayed in all the attributes of sorrow and affection to distract her heart. The snatches of slumber which closed her eyes were troubled with these mournful visions. Poor Clara discovered that she had placed too great a reliance on herself. Theodosio, far from being forgotten, was still in possession of her entire affection.—Those affections were harassed and perplexed, tainted and shadowed, in the mist of superstitious terror; but yet they remained true to the object by which they were engrossed.

This was a source of additional misery to Clara.—She struggled desperately to discard the image of her lover from her thoughts, but in this attempt she failed—the mournful object still kept fixed before the eyes of her mind, and his looks seemed to be full of a gentle reproach—the reproach of love and pain. In the tumult of her feelings Clara rose from her bed, and knelt on the bare ground before a picture of the Holy Virgin which adorned her room. The apartment was illumined by the dim and gloomy refulgence of a lamp, well calculated to promote the morbid sensibility of Clara's feelings. She raised her eyes to the image, and prayed fervently for the restoration of that calm and repose which appeared to have fled forever from her bosom. The tears of the penitent (for such Clara considered herself,) flowed fast, whilst her sobs and groans bespoke the agony of her soul. The fever of her imagination was now worked up to the highest degree, and she at length fancied that the image, before which she knelt in humble prayer, fixed a mournful look upon her. This illusion of her brain, she considered as a warning from heaven, and she prayed fervently that the will of Providence might be made known to her, that she might sacrifice her feelings and comforts, life, the world—all—to that sacred admonition.

When Clara rose on the following morning, the struggles which her soul had undergone during the night were but too visible on her countenance. She was interrogated concerning the cause of this emotion and she, whose thoughts were made of candor and purity, found no difficulty in revealing the whole secret of her heart. Don Gil and his wife, as usual, immediately perceived the hand of Providence on her. The anxiety and disquietude which the image of Theodosio had produced, and the tumult of agony in which Clara had passed the night, afforded ample evidence, that she ought to renounce every idea of her love, and become a nun with all possible expedition. Soon after Father Bastos came in, to throw his assistance into the balance. He delivered a very lengthy and edifying sermon, and solemnly asserted that Clara was a bride elect of heaven, and then congratulated the maiden on her happy destiny. She requested a few days to adopt a final resolution—the wish was too just, and was easily complied with.

At this interesting period, Dona Josepha died, or rather, as Father Bastos expressed it, she was gone to claim the inheritance of glory which she had gained by her piety and good works. The temper of Don Gil, became from that moment, more lugubrious, and in the undirected state of his mind, he conceived that every thing which he saw and heard was a sin; the wretched man became a torment to himself, and a positive nuisance to those who came into the least contact with him. His imagination was stored with ideas of every possible calamity that can afflict human nature, and he once entertained the notion that the end of the world was fast approaching. The increasing superstition and gloom of her uncle, and the torture resulting therefrom, made another inducement for Clara's taking the veil. She at length gave her consent, and, at the age of seventeen, commenced her novitiate in the convent of —.

Clara found no difficulty in adapting herself to the habits of a life of seclusion—her uncle's house had always been a kind of nunnery, as far as intercourse with the world was concerned. Indeed the change, if any thing, was for the better, as she could enjoy the society of the nuns, some of whom were very young, and not so morose as their elder sisters. But for the severe aspect and austere character of the mother abbess, from which the gentle nature of Clara recoiled, she would have enjoyed comparative repose and happiness; yet even the rigor of the abbess was far preferable to the tantalizing, hypochondrical, and tormenting character of Don Gil Perez.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, DEC. 26, 1840.

TERMS OF THIS PAPER.—To subscribers residing out of the city, $2 if in advance—$2.50 if within six months, and $3, if not paid until the expiration of the year. BACK NUMBERS at all times furnished.

☞ We anticipate our paper, one day, to our country subscribers, in order to give our little folks an opportunity of keeping Christmas. We wish our friends all the happiness which the day properly observed, is calculated to afford, and we hope that each returning one will find them in the full enjoyment of health, prosperity and contentment.

SACRED MUSIC.—It is gratifying to see that in our city this noble department of music is at length receiving the kind of encouragement it so justly merits, and which is so well calculated to cause its being thoroughly studied. The prejudice is fast dying away that music connected with the cause of religion, need not be cultivated. We never could discover any more impropriety in the refined performance of a sacred melody, than in the perfect style, and fine delivery of a sermon. To the latter no one objects. We recollect quite an amusing display, which occurred but a few years since, showing the great repugnance that some churches have entertained toward genuine music.—On the occasion of a skilful musician, between the different parts of the service, attempting one of Mozart's soul-subduing interludes, several of the deacons in the utmost mental consternation, hastened to the musician, crying as they went—theatrical, theatrical! We have not the least doubt but they would much rather have been tortured by listening to the grating of unattuned voices, giving to really good compositions the most inconceivable horror; than to have received the just intention of the Author by a slight exertion on the part of the musician. The eloquent Whitfield had the correct appreciation of this portion of public worship. Wherever, or whenever, he found a truly meritorious piece of music, he was always as sure to find words which he could appropriately adapt it to. When questioned why he did so, his well known reply—that he did not wish the devil to have all the good music—effectually silenced his cavilers. If churches generally would emulate the spirit which actuated the kind old man in making this reply, they would not find themselves we apprehend, doing much less good, either to themselves or their congregations.

These remarks have been occasioned by the approbation manifested at the Concert given at Dr. Campbell's church on thanksgiving night. It was overflowing attended. But although this patronage was not undeserved, we think, considering the price of admission, it must, in some degree, be attributed to its being an anniversary night. The charge was at least one half too much. It induced high anticipations. With the exception of Miss Illsley, her brother, and one or two others, it was an amateur effort. and one from which not much that was extraordinary was to be expected. However we must not be looked upon as speaking in disparaging terms—we have but seldom under similar circumstances, heard as much good musical execution. The chorusses were generally well produced, and Miss Illsley, although she had much to do, did well. We understand that the church have been fortunate enough to have permanently engaged this accomplished singer as an acquisition to their Choir. Her manner of giving the words "oh, Zion!" and "oh, Jerusalem!" in the Hebrew Captive, is not to be surpassed. The solo by a lady in the Child of Mortality, was excellent—the bass part was base indeed.—The instruments in the Overture did not, as they should have done move on together. This we presume is accounted for in the fact of their not having been much practised together. Nevertheless Mr. Burke at all times displayed his great proficiency. The Latin Trio was sung in beautiful harmony. As a whole the efforts were so laudable, that we hope to hear them often repeated.

THE MARVELLOUS.—Since the murder of Mr. Suydam, by Robinson, which is of itself horrible enough to gratify almost any morbid appetite, the news-mongers are determined to make the most of him. He is now accused of poisoning two of his children, who are said to have died suddenly. He is also accused of murdering a pedlar two or three years ago; and of digging a grave for Mr. Cheeseman, to whom he owed a sum of money, and who was to have been decoyed on the premises, in the same manner as in the case of Mr. Suydam. The probability is, that all these stories are destitute of truth, and designed for the capacious mouths of a large class of people who will swallow any thing if it partakes of the marvelous. Cook who was executed at Schenectady on Friday last, had some 2 or three murders passed to his credit, beside other offences; (price one shilling) which the Schenectady Reflector, says is untrue; and Mrs. Kinney, who is now indicted for the murder of her husband, and who, if we are to believe all that is said, has killed something like a score, of us poor innocent men, will if we credit the rational explanation given by an exchange paper, show that she has committed no murder at all. A large edition of Gulliver, would sell well about these days.

THE AMPITHEATRE.—This establishment continues as attractive as usual, and is well patronised, each evening with our most respectable citizens. The ladies have willed Mr. Nichols a fair patronage, by their smiles and encouragement: and no man is a gentleman, who will not carry out the wishes of a lady.—Ergo: The Amphitheatre will be respectably sustained.

TO OUR AGENTS.—Will those gentlemen, who are acting as Agents, for the Register, remit any monies, which they may have in their hands to us. Will they also use the opportunity which their location gives them, of reminding delinquent subscribers, that a want of promptness on their part, subjects us to great embarrassment.

LET US DESERVE THE COMPLIMENT.—The German judge that presided at the trial of Huger the American, who attempted to liberate Lafayette from imprisonment; laying his hand upon his head addressed him: "Young man, you have been guilty of singular rashness, but from what I have this day seen, had I a friend to seek in the world, it would be an American."

DR. BECK'S LECTURES IN CHEMISTRY.—This gentleman, in a course of four lectures, has been doing himself great credit, in affording the Young Men's Association before whom they were delivered, an opportunity to keep up with the times in this rapidly progressive science. The simple character of these lectures, are calculated to do much good.

"WHAT MAKES AN AUTHORESS?" enquired one ragged urchin of another, while puzzling himself over a placard in front of a bookstore, which advertised in capitals the recent debut of a young female writer.

"An Authoress!" ejaculated his companion with surprise—"Why don't you know that?"

The enquirer was compelled to acknowledge his ignorance.

"When a man writes one book," continued little Noah Webster, "he is an author—when he writes two, he is an authoress."

This explanation was of course satisfactory.

SALMAGUNDI.—The Missionary Society, have recommended the first Monday of January, as a day of Thanksgiving and prayer.—Mrs Gilman's Ladies Annual Register, says that snow is a good substitute for eggs in puddings and pancakes. Two spoonfuls of snow is equal to an egg. If this is true, we ask no favors of the hens during the cold weather.—The weather in our good old dutch city, has been delightfully uncertain for these three days past. On Monday it was warm enough with but little fire, on Tuesday, we had a beautiful snow storm, and to day, Wednesday, the mercury is so low, that it is problematical, whether a streak of lightning would reach it in a week, unless there is a material "let up."—During the year 1839, 76,000 emigrants arrived in this country—34 000 from Great Britain and Ireland, 18,000 from Germany and 7000 from France. It is estimated that 100,000 will have arrived during the present year.—The Athens Banner says, that brandy and salt are recommended as a cure for asthma, dyspepsia, &c. We are acquainted with several individuals, who are dyspeptic, &c, which we suppose from some cause or other, originates in the omission of the salt, from this "invaluable receipt."—The New Orleans Picayune, says, that the epicures of that city, have been luxuriating for some time past on "fine fat dressed squirrels" which unfortunately for a squeamish stomach, have proved to be rats caught, and fatted for sale. This is equal to Dr. Johnson's celebrated boiled puddings.—The prince of Orange, now King of the Netherlands, is said to have been a stockholder in the U. S. Bank, to the amount of a million of dollars.—The Rev. Mr. Courtney, of Richmond, Va., is said to have married 1000 couple in 24 years.—The library in Salem is said to contain 24,000 volumes, and to average a book and a half to each inhabitant.—The editor of the Keesville Herald, and the editor of the Portland Argus, have lately married. There is no better evidence of the prosperity of any section of country, than for its printer to have a reasonable prospect, of supporting a family! We hope both of these printers are in their right mind.—The Baltimore Clipper says that the Siamese twins, have both fallen in love with the same young lady. The young lady has given a preference to Chang. Eng will probably adhere to his brother Chang in his attachment which will prove a barrier to the union of Chang and the lady. The law should provide for this dilemma. Those young ladies, who have not availed themselves of certain privileges which leap year gives them are respectfully informed, that in a few days their time for seeking will expire. As a friend to the ladies, we note this fact.—The supply of pork at the west, is said to exceed any former season.—Samuel Baldwin, of Lenox, Madison co. perished a few evenings since, from the effects of charcoal placed in his room while he was sleeping.—The Baltimore Clipper cautions the craft to look out for a journeyman printer, by the name of Thomas Hauptman, who has robbed that office, of $34. The matter of surprise to us is, not that the journeyman committed the robbery—but—where the Clipper got the $34 to be robbed of.—The celebrated chandelier weighing three tons, recently purchased for the house of representatives, fell a few days since; destroying it, together with several of the members' seats. Providentially the house was not in session, otherwise several lives would have been lost.—One of our exchange papers says, that convulsion fits, may be cured, by drinking salt and water two or three times a day.—Judge Edwards, it is said will leave the bench, in the spring, having reached his sixtieth year.—The episcopal diocese of New York, embraces 191 clergymen, and 153 congregations.—Mr. James Flipp, one of the Harrison electors of N. Jersey, died at his residence in Sussex, while setting at his desk writing, a few days since.—The British Queen has given birth to a princess, and is doing well. It has occasioned much rejoicing through the British empire.

The festival of St. John, the Evangelist, will be celebrated by St. John's Lodge, in Greenfield, on Saturday, the 26th, at 11 A. M. Adjoining lodges are invited to attend.

ENGLISH CLERGYMEN AT THE RACES.—An English paper, the Kent Herald, gives as a matter of ordinary sporting intelligence the following instance of clerical conformity to the world:

"CANTERBURY RACES.—On Thursday these races commenced on Barham Downs. The day was as lovely as ever broke from the heavens, and the company was numerous, though we cannot say there were many of the nobility and gentry present. The grand stand was very meagerly attended. We noticed the Very Reverend the Dean, the Venerable the Archdeacon Croft, E. R. Rice, Esq., M. P., Lord A. Conyngham, M. P., J. W. Henniker Wilson, Esq., Twisden Hodges, Esq., the Misses Faggs, Mrs. and Miss Webb the Rev. C. Hallett, the Rev. J. Hallett, the Rev. R. O. Tylden, &c."

The practice of the London Record in exposing the names of those clerical sportsmen is producing great excitement, and will no doubt correct the evil.

THE LOVED AND LOST.

Alas! my sky is dark again,
Another star has lost its light;
I turn my eager eye in vain,
It bursts no more upon my sight:
And see—the bud I nursed with care,
Just as I nursed a bud before,
Like it lies crushed upon the stem,
To rear its broken head no more.

But that pale star whose gentle rays
Illumed no more my weary night,
Will kindle in a brighter sphere
And beam with never dying light.
And that sweet cherished, nurtured bud,
Now crushed and blighted on the ground,
In Heaven's own clime will raise its head
To shed fresh bloom and fragrance round.

Be still—be calm, my throbbing brow,
Look up beyond, my weary eye,
Each earthly grief must soon be past,
The heart will heave its parting sigh:
And then around that glorious throne
If God so will it we will meet
With those we loved and lost below,
In love renewed and Union sweet.

The lip convulsed—the rolling eye—
The tight clenched hand—the labored breath—
Shall wring the mother's heart no more—
Thou hast no victory here oh! Death,
The Mother's jewel's safe at last,
Bedeck a diadem of light,
The tears of earth no more can dim,
Nor sorrow pale their radiance bright.

From the Churchman.

THE SOUL-DIRGE.

"Then said Jesus, 'Will ye also go away?' "
St. JOHN, vi. 67."

The organ played sweet music
While as, on Easter day,
All heartless from the altar
The heedless went away;
And down the broad aisle crowding,
They seemed a funeral train,
They were hurrying their spirits
To the music of that strain.

As I listened to the organ,
And I saw them crowd along,
I thought I heard two voices
Speaking strangely, but not strong;
And one, it whispered sadly,
"Will ye also go away?"
But the other spoke exulting,
"Ha! the soul dirge, hear it play!"

Hear the soul dirge! hear the soul dirge!
It was dread to hear it play,
While the famishing went crowding
From the bread of life away;
They were bidden, they were bidden
To their Father's festal board;
But they all, with gleeful faces,
Turned their back upon the Lord.

You had thought the church a prison,
Had you seen how they did pour,
With giddy, giddy faces,
From the consecrated door;
There was angel's food all ready,
But the bidden—where were they?
O'er the highways and the hedges,
Ere the soul-dirge ceased to play!

Oh, the soul dirge, how it echoed
The emptied aisle along.
As open streets grew crowded
With the full outpouring throng!
And then again the voices—
"Ha! the soul-dirge! hear it play!"

And the pensive, pensive whisper,
"Will ye also go away?"

Few, few were they that lingered
To sup, with Jesus there;
And yet, for all that spurn him,
There was plenty, and to spare;
And now the food of angels
Uncovered to my sight—
All glorious was the altar,
And the chalice glittered bright!

Then came the hymn TAISAGION,
And wrapt me up on high,
With angels and archangels
To laud and magnify;
I seemed to feast in heaven,
And downward wafted then,
With angels chanting round me,
Good will and peace to men.

I may not tell the rapture
Of a banquet so divine:
Ho! every one that thirsteth,
Let him taste the bread and wine!—
Hear the Bride and Spirit saying,
"Will ye also go away?"
Or—go, poor soul, for ever!
"Oh! the soul-dirge—hear it play!"

FOOTSTEPS OF ANGELS.

BY LONGFELLOW.

When the hours of day are numbered,
And the voices of the Night,
Wake the better soul that slumbered.
To a holy, calm delight;

Ere the evening lamps are lighted,
And like phantoms grim and tall,
Shadows from the fitful fire-light,
Dance upon the parlor wall;

Then the forms of the departed
Enter at the open door;
The beloved ones, the true-hearted,
Come to visit me once more;

He, the young and strong, who cherished
Noble longings for the strife,—
By the rode-side fell and perished,
Weary with the march of life!

They, the holy ones and weakly,
Who the cross of suffering bore,—
Folded their pale hands so meekly,—
Spoke with us on earth no more!

And with them the Being Beauteous,
Who unto my youth was given,
More than all things else to love me,
And is now a saint in heaven.

With a slow and noiseless footstep,
Comes that messenger divine.
Takes the vacant chair beside me,
Lays her gentle hand in mine.

And she sits and gazes at me,
With those deep and tender eyes
Like the stars, so still and saint-like,
Looking downward from the skies.

Uttered not, yet comprehended,
Is the spirit's voiceless prayer,
Soft rebukes, in blessings ended,
Breathing from her lips of air.

O, though oft depressed and lonely,
All my fears are laid aside,
If I but remember only
Such as these have lived and died!

THE PILGRIM MAIDEN TO HER LOVER.

BY MRS. HALE.

Farewell, my love!—beneath the sky

We ne'er shall meet again,
For when these lines salute thine eye
Afar upon the main
Will Mary be—yet blame me not,
Nor deem my heart untrue;
My country—that may be forgot;
Yet shall I think on you.

Farewell, my love—thy soul I know
Was fondly knit to mine,
And thou wilt grieve that I should go—
Yet might I e'er be thine?
Thou wilt not worship where I kneel,
My God thou dost despise;
And could I look to heaven, yet feel
Reproved by those dear eyes?

Farewell, my love—thy gorgeous hall
May centre earthly bliss:
And thou hast fame, and gold, and all
The world calls happiness—
These baubles have enthralled thy mind,
And thus thy bane will be—
There comes an hour when thou wilt find
They cannot comfort thee.

Farewell, farewell!—my course is bound
Across the roaring billow;
And I may rest on desert ground,
A wreath of snow my pillow—
There deep, dark forests stretch afar,
By savage footsteps trod;
Yet there the beams of Bethlehem's Star
Shall guide us to our God.

And there, in that lone world, we'll rear
To Him a shrine so pure,
Though guilty nations shake with fear
Our temple shall endure;
And faith can see Jehovah bless
Our refuge with his grace,
And freedom make the wilderness
Her chosen resting place.

Farewell!—thy favorite rose I bear
To that far distant land;
And fondly shall I tend it there,
And watch its buds expand;
The first sweet flower—I'll name it thine—
And e'er the soft leaves wither
I'll lay them on this heart of mine,
That they may fade together.

Farewell, a last, a long farewell,
Since thus our fate must be—
Thou wilt not follow where I dwell,
Nor I return to thee:
The favor of the world thou hast,—
But mine is heavenly peace—
And that like meteor's glare is past,
While this will never cease.

Farewell: the grove where oft we met,
Thou must seek alone;
There should one tear of fond regret
Gush forth that I am gone—
O, hallow then to me that tear,
And be one, one prayer given,
That though our paths are severed here,
They may unite in heaven.

MASONIC.

EXTRACTS

From an Oration, delivered before the Grand Lodge of the State of Rhode Island at Pawtucket.

BY WM. H. STURTEVANT.

Masons have uniformly dated their origin from the first dawn of the arts and sciences and have given a rational account of their progress to the present day. Those, therefore, who have through ages kept watch over us, with all the jealous vigilance usually excited by what they term secret societies, ought to be equally versed in our history and be able to affix a different date to our origin, if we are really mistaken in its chronology. This they have not as yet presumed to undertake, and we therefore claim a just title to our antiquity, till one of a paramount character can be fairly exhibited against us.

Within our own time, mysterious inscriptions and characters have been found among the rubbish of Eastern Cities, over whose ruins more than forty centuries have rolled, which have called forth the wonder of the curious, and puzzled the brains of the most learned and scrutinizing antiquary, and which none have yet been found competent to decypher, save those who are versed in the higher orders of masonry.

On these mouldering ruins, and relics of ancient grandeur, the mason gazes with awful veneration, and holds converse with the spirit of other ages, while he reads on every mossy stone, and dilapidated wall, those mystic chronicles, long since forgotten in tradition, and lost in history.

Perhaps it would be impossible precisely to determine when masonry commenced: because it rose gradually with the growth of knowledge. Every person who was so fortunate as to make any new invention in mechanism, or discovery in science, so that he possessed a mystery, which was hidden from the rest of the world, was esteemed a mason; for at that period masonry comprehended indiscriminately every description of art and science. No laws then existed, as at the present day, to protect this ingenious and enterprising class of mankind, and secure to them the advantages of their discoveries. Consequently they entered into compact to protect themselves, and adopted such rules and regulations, secret marks and tokens by which they were enabled to identify each other, though strangers, and render assistance, should their necessity require it.

We have seen in our day, the poor mechanic, in despite of our salutary laws, defrauded of his rightful earnings after having pioneered with much sweat and toil, through dark labyrinth in searches of knowledge and improvement. It was to provide against these unrighteous aggressions that masonry was first instituted.

It is not wondered then, that from its earliest infancy, there have always been found among the great mass of mankind a disaffected class, who have manifested the most violent hostility to the order and who are prominently characterized by an itching ear, a lying tongue and an unfaithful breast.

Such was the situation of masonry, in ancient time, while those who composed the society, were scattered throughout the habitable globe, and mingled indiscriminately with the whole human family.

The time at length arrived, when a more general and complete organization of this invaluable class was to take place, and a permanent and indissoluble bond was to link them together in eternal harmony. By the command of Jehovah himself, a mighty and majestic fabric was to be erected in honour to his name, within the holy precincts of his holy people. The wise and inspired king of Israel was appointed to execute and finish the great work; one whom we he endowed with wisdom transcendent, and whose glory had been rendered immortal in history, sacred and profane, by Christian, Mahometan, and heathen. In obedience to the divine edict, he sent forth his summons to distant countries, and planted the White Banner of masonry on the consecrated hill of Judah. Kings and princes bowed with reverence at the command, and joyously embarked in the glorious undertaking. The Tyrian monarch sent out his most skillful artists to assist in superintending and executing the great work. There gathered together, from remote regions, the ingenious mechanics of different tongues and languages to lend their aid in facilitating the erection of Jehovah's dwelling. The Tyrian limner, with his tressel board, and the Sidonian sculptor, with his chissel and mallet, were proud to enter their names on the roll of workmen, who composed this mighty multitude. There came, also, the noble Gibcamite, to whose descendant masonry will forever be deeply indebted, and who wrought hard in his vocation, ere the temple was completed.

There is something not only beautiful, but even sublime, attached to this history, and might furnish a highly interesting scene for the painter, and theme for the poet.

Under the direction of the great master builder, this assembled congregation of artists were divided into different section and grades, according to their respective merits; and thus originated what have since been called the degrees of masonry. These moved in their various appointed spheres, with the same regularity and exactness, that we may see, at this day, in the operations of an army of soldiers, under the conduct of a wise and able general.

It has been estimated that upwards of one hundred and thirteen thousand free masons were present on this occasion.

In the proud forests of Lebanon, and marble quarries on the hills of Tyre, they first entered on the mighty work. The tall cedar that towered majestically to heaven, fell at the stroke of the persevering craftsman, and the song of the Phœnician sailor rose sweetly and merrily, on the evening seabreeze, as he fearlessly drove his deep-freighted float against the bold coast of Joppa.

On the plain of Jordan, between Succoth and Zarahatan, the workers of brass assembled, and cast the imperishable pillars, so beautifully described in the holy writings.

The temple of Jehovah was completed without the harsh and discordant sound of iron impeniments, and the same harmony prevailed, throughout, among the multitude of its builders.

Amid the various broils and contests which we every day witness, it is found that out of all, masonry occupies only the neutral ground on earth, where men, whatever diversity may exist in political and religious opinion, languages, country or color, can assemble and cordially extend the hand of friendship to each other in the hour of necessity and despair. From that sacred spot, pomp and power, pride prejudice and private animosity are forever banished. There the Arab, the Turk, the European and the American may harmoniously meet upon the level and part upon the square. Herein is the grand and important secret of our institution which the mason alone has ever known or felt.

I here pause to ask if indeed there is no wisdom discoverable in this structure, no strength to support it and no beauty to adorn it. Let those who attempt to controvert this opinion, call in question, if they please, the wisdom of the anointed Chief of Israel and pronounce him a fool! Let them cavil at its precepts and smile contemptuously at the handy work of God. They will find, if they search, on the catalogue of masonry, the first and noblest names that grace the pages of ancient and modern history. St. John, whose proud day we are now celebrating, was one of the most devoted patrons of our order. His name-sake too, the inspired Revelator and the favored companion of the Savior of the world, was not ashamed, though the dark vicissitudes of that stormy age; through good report and evil report, to wear before the world, the white badges of masonry. Royalty and nobility through every age have been proud to append them to their robes, stars and coronets. On this roll we read the names of Washington and Warren, of Hamilton and Lafayette, and many others who still survive to bear witness to mankind, by their ardour for our welfare, that we are not dealing in foolery or fiction.

We have already alluded to the antiquity of masonry; and if indeed I am correct in saying that it is the most ancient of any in existence, this circumstance alone would induce us to believe that it possesses strength, when time itself, with all its frightful ravages, is found inefficient to make the slightest innovations. Destroy all that is outwardly visible, connected with the order, and still the spirit of masonry will survive and rise again upon its ruins. It cannot be annihilated; for even amid the demolished heap itself, it has always found a secret and safe repository, where after-ages have discovered and revived it.

In every age and in every part of the world, masonry has been doomed to encounter the formidable assaults of powerful enemies. He who professes to know a secret, and will not reveal it, is execrated. The engines of war and death are set in array, and the edicts of despots and the bulls of popery are issued against him. Bigotry, and scandal and falsehood are had in requisition to effect the same laudable purpose. The Tartarean jaws of the Spanish Inquisition have been expanded, and the dying groans of the persecuted masons have echoed through the portals of its horrid dungeons, while the haughty satraps of Europe have proscribed masonry, as the work of the sorcerer, and subversive of their governments.

I will, however, pass over this disgusting subject.—I have alluded to it not for the purpose of calumniating, but to repel calumny, and evince that as the storm seems to thicken around us we see the assailants every day growing more distant from their object. Amid inundation, conflagration and ruin: amid war, pestilence and death, the shock of time and the assaults of hostile and malignant foes, masonry still stands; and stands unshaken; its brazen archives and depositories have never yet been violated. Those who strike, can never know how their blow should be directed to reach its vitals.

Those who will give themselves the trouble to listen to our tradition and examine our history, unprejudiced and unprepossessed, may there find subject matter for the most delightful contemplation. We there find prominently displayed, friendship, charity and brotherly affection, and whatever else can be found in morality and religion, to deck the sacred arch under which freemasons are wont to assemble. The most beautiful eulogium, however, which can be given to the order is a simple unadorned history of progress till we arrive at the present period.

BONAPARTE AND THE POPE.

From Memoirs of the Duke of Rovigo.

The Emperor went to meet the Pope on the road to Nemours. To avoid ceremony, the pretext of a hunting party was assumed: the attendants, with his equipages were in the forest. The emperor came on horseback, and in a hunting dress with his retinue.—It was at the half moon on the top of the hill that the meeting took place. There the Pope's carriage drew up. He got out at the left door in his white costume. The ground was dirty; he did not like to step upon it with his white silk shoes, but was obliged to do so at last. Napoleon alighted to receive him. They embraced; and the Emperor's carriage, which had been purposely driven up, was advanced a few paces, as if from the carelessness of the driver; but men were there posted to hold the two doors open at the moment of getting in, the Emperor took the right door and an officer of the court handed the Pope to the left, so that they entered the carriage by the two doors at the same time. The Emperor naturally seated himself on the right; and this first step decided without negotiation upon the etiquette to be observed during the time that the Pope was to remain in Paris.

REVIEW OF BOOKS.

It being one of the ostensible objects of the SEVEN, to promote the interests of literature and Science, to guard the lovers of the one and the devotees to the other, from imposition through the press, and at the same time to rescue from the threatening waves of oblivion any production that may possess real value, or that may be made of service to mankind, it may not be improper to remark, in our first cogitation, that we shall be governed by rules infallible as the purest and best that have ever been framed. There have been reviewers in days that are past, and there are even now, characters who consider themselves entitled to the same name, who with the most canine servility, sit calmly down to peruse from title page to finish, the volumes of every character that are every day rolling from the printer's hands. But in the midst of this class of critics, there is now another, far more noble in their pursuit, for, while they entertain the same anxiety for the well being of the world around them, that is felt by the general profession, and ourselves in particular, they scarce ever stoop, to look at more than the preface and opening and closing chapters. To men lynx-eyed as they are, and skilled in judging from indications, this is quite sufficient,—indeed, it will be seen in a moment, that it is far more than is essential to a correct appreciation of a work and of the author who gave it being. The height of absurdity, which, with this class of the profession, would be the candid acknowledgment that the books which are reviewed are never read, is seldom if ever ventured upon,—because most of them have brains of sufficient dimensions and of the proper quality, to guard against so ridiculous a mistake. It is sometimes said, with an amount of honesty of which no human being could ever have been guilty, "that we have not had time to give to the work before us that attentive examination which it so unquestionably deserves, and we shall confine ourselves to the following beautiful extract, reserving the book to some future time for a more careful perusal." Such confessions are usually written upon the last evening of the week, when, "coming events cast their shadows before," and the critics choose to be prepared for all the sunshine of conscience to which their numerous transgressions will permit them. These we let pass and those who preceded them, for they are behind the improvements of the age. Engineering in morals and intellectual science is of as much service, and we shall show as much in real practice, as engineering in physics and physical science. But that shall be attended to in some future number, and we will proceed now to the new mode of reviewing, so eminently calculated to secure uniformity of expression concerning the writer and his productions, and also to prevent the tedious and totally unproductive task of reading the whole or even any part, of works that pass under review.

Our hands fall upon Eaton's Engineering. Its title page alone will be the subject of critical examination, for here are to be found all the peculiarities that distinguish the author and his writings. "PRODROMUS of a practical treatise on the Mathematical arts, containing instructions for surveying and engineering. By Amos Eaton. A. B. & A. M., Senior Prof. in Rens. Inst., and Prof. of Civil Engineering. Ten years an acting land agent, surveyor and engineer. while pursuing the profession of Law. Member of the American Geol. Society of Phil. Acad., Nat. Sciences, N. York Lyceum, etc."

The first word in this lengthy title page that demands particular inspection is prodrumus, the literal signification of which is forerunner. There is something awfully portentous in the single word which announces that the book before us is but an introduction, a kind of first chapter, to a volume yet in reserve, which may hereafter be let slip upon an unsuspecting public.—To us it seems to desire to say that 'I Amos Eaton have time just now, to select a few, rather more than generally interesting truths, from a mighty host in my possession, and will let you have them because your famishing minds need aliment, and by and by I will supply you with a regale suited in extent to the demands of science and the world.' But taken in connexion with the name of the author and the numerous titles with which that name is bolstered, to us it really does say, that "I Amos Eaton will catch you gaping pupils in the opening field of science, and make you buy my book, and make you think that I know, not only more than this book would indicate, but more than most men living." A glance at the chain of titles will render the truth of this remark sufficiently apparent. Nothing in a high degree reprehensible can be found that we have failed to notice, for the remainder of the title page is what might have been expected.—In one word, from an inspection of the first leaf, we pronounce this to be a book, in which may be found many of the practical applications of mathematical principles to the common business of life, given in language burdened with self-conceit and indicating at every step the most superficial investigation, an entire absence of profundity, an unjust claim to originality and a proud display of material of the most inconsiderable value.

The next book at hand is Combe's Constitution of man. See its title. The Constitution of man, considered in relation to external objects, by Geo. Combe. No useless drapery is thrown around the name of this book; nothing that fosters expectation never to be realized. No crutches are arranged about the author's name to give to the work factitious excellence. The title speaks forth in imperial language "there are truths here, and they have been arranged by Geo. Combe." What a majesty is there in a name so unassuming as this? We pause to remark, that the first leaf says modestly, that great principles pertaining to the relations which subsist between men and the surrounding universe are here carefully discussed, by an individual who has no fear that the book in order to be noticed needs an array of titles to follow his name. It says moreover that if not now appreciated, the time will come when it will be enough for any author to have written the Immortal constitution of man.

BEAUTY AND TRUTH.

To a mind that is desirous of extracting from Nature in all her departments, every deduction which can be reasonably drawn, there is scarcely an object that cannot, more or less directly be made the subject of useful application, in the way of comparison or analogy. Physical nature has become so familiar to us and the distinction between the material and immaterial has been so nicely drawn, that we seem almost to be unconscious of the existence of any analogy between the former and moral qualities. But the assertion may, we think, be hazarded, that if our mental operations were closely examined, we would find that on many occasions we recognise the existence of such analogy and act upon its results.

Nature and the human body itself were not we think, clothed in all the various forms of beauty and loveliness with which they greet us, without some object more important than the mere production of the pleasurable sensations which they naturally excite, though this effect is in its immediate and ultimate results, important and highly beneficial.

There is evidently an adaptation of our mental constitution to those ever-occurring forms of beauty with which creation is filled.—There is a chord in the human heart that vibrates at the very sight of anything beautiful, and whether this be a landscape in nature or some living being, a moral emotion is roused into action. No one can tell what beauty is, no one knows but every one feels, because its effect is to excite a feeling or emotion. A picture may be criticized coolly, and it may be found to be correct, and conformable to what are called the rules of art, but it cannot be called beautiful, unless it excites an emotion in the mind while we gaze upon it, and cause the pulse to beat quicker, and the eye to grow brighter by the sympathy which exists between pleasurable emotions and our physical nature. Thus the features of the human face may be classically regular, they may be as correctly and exactly defined as the statues fresh from the chisel of Canova, and yet they may and will fail to move the beholder with such an emotion as it is the effect of beauty to produce. This effect is always of a moral character; we, unconsciously perhaps to ourselves, connect it with the same corresponding mental disposition. We are thus furnished with an aid necessary to our limited powers, to create an idea of moral beauty, or in other words, truth, and thus be enabled to feel a love for it, and an inclination to possess it.

In this view, the artist who portrays the image of his fancy upon the canvass, or moulds them from the snowy marble, is prosecuting an avocation of the highest importance and responsibility. Nature has furnished him with models of beauty of every kind, and by the operation of his glowing imagination he is selecting out of this inexhaustible source, those forms which please his eye, and uniting them together to produce a new embodiment of thought. He is thus adding to the store which Nature has so kindly afforded us, and it is in his power, if he be a true artist, to rouse up from their depths, moral emotions or those of a different Character.

Nothing is beautiful, but that which is true in itself or affects the garb of truth. We cannot guard always against deception and therefore we are often led to admire that which possesses this quality only in seeming. It is the province of man to be, not to seem, but he chooses the latter often in preference to the former. But that which is not, cannot always seem to be, and consequently it ceases to be beautiful as soon as its falsity is apparent.

There is a kind of beauty which excites the emotion of which we have been speaking in perhaps a higher degree than any other; it is that which may be called intellectual beauty, and the feeling it produces is (in intensity) in exact accordance with the degree of truth which we feel to be involved in it.

We will conclude these desultory remarks by describing it in the words of the poet—

"How much superior beauty awes,
The coldest bosoms find;
But with resistless force it draws
To sense and sweetness joined.

The casket when to outward show
The workman's art is seen,
Is doubly valued, when we know
It holds a gem within."

MISCELLANY.

THE DISAPPOINTED BRIDE.

At an age when the heart is open to every impression, and forms with the same readiness engagements and connexions, which, in a man of riper years would be the fruit of esteem and observation, St. A— was travelling from his native province to explore the wonders of a metropolis which he had as yet beheld with the eyes only of hope. In the coach which was to convey him to Paris, he found a young man of prepossessing appearance; a conversation soon began that terminated in protestations of friendship, warmly reiterated on both sides. Mutual confidence soon flowed from their lips, and all the secrets of their hearts were revealed; it was then that St. A— learned that his new friend was going to Paris to marry a young lady whom he had never seen, but whom his father and family had chosen for his bride, with the consent of her relations. The journey was finished without any accident, and they arrived in the morning at Paris, where they took lodgings in a public hotel.— Scarcely had they taken possession of their apartments when the young man was seized with a bilious colick, which, in less than two hours deprived him of his existence. Affected with the melancholly fate of his youthful acquaintance, St. A——, whose attentions had been unable to raise him, thought it his duty to inform the father of the future bride of the overthrow of his expectations, and taking with him the letters and port folio of his friend, repaired to the house of the gentleman.

The servant who opened the door, conscious that his master expected his son-in-law, announced St. A—— as such. The father, without giving him time to explain himself, embraced him with eagerness and presented him to his daughter as her husband.

St. A——, naturally gay and volatile, could not resist the temptation of deceiving the family awhile longer, and played his part extremely well. He gave the letters, and being perfectly acquainted with the secrets and affairs of his friend, returned the most satisfactory answers to their questions. He succeeded especially in captivating the attention of the young lady, who, with side long glances admired the features and the fine shape with which nature had blessed her lover. Dinner was announced, and St. A—— was placed by the side of the timid bride; and the whole family yielded up their hearts to joy and satisfaction. The young lady spoke little, answered with difficulty, and often blushed, while St. A—— was polite and ardent in his attention to her; and though the expressions of his face were naturally serious, his conversation was pleasing and cheerful. After dinner, the father entered into all the details necessary to settle the marriage, when suddenly St. A—— rose, and, taking his hat seemed anxious to retire. "Are you going to leave us?" "Yes," answered St. A——, "important business compels me to quit you." "What important business can you have in a city where you are a stranger? Perhaps you wish to draw money from a banker? my purse is entirely at your service; but if you will absolutely have recourse to a banker, I may send somebody to transact the business for you." "No," said St. A——, who continued to walk towards the door—and they were soon in the hall—when, addressing the father. "Now that we are alone," said he, "and the ladies cannot hear us, I will tell you—this morning, a few moments after my arrival, an accident happened to me; I was taken with the bilious colic, and died. I promised to be buried at six o'clock, and you will easily conceive that I must attend the place of rendezvous; for, not being known in this part of the world, if I fail to be exact to my word, it would awake suspicions of inattention to business that would prove very prejudicial to my character."

The father listened to him with astonishment, but taking the whole for a joke returned to the ladies, and bursting with laughter, related the cause of his son-in-law's hurried departure. While they were still conversing on the subject, six o'clock struck; it was soon seven, and the family were alarmed at not seeing St. A——. Half an hour after the father sent to the hotel to inquire. The servant intrusted with the commission asked for him under his assumed name, and received for answer, that he had arrived at nine in the morning, died at eleven, and was buried at six. It would be difficult to express the surprise of the family at receiving the information; and as St. A—— left his lodgings and never visited there again, a general belief was spread around, that it was the ghost that spent the day with Mr. N——, in social enjoyment and conversation.

DREAD OF DEATH,

Is a common symptom in nervous diseases, and is here considered with its regard to influence on health. In these cases it seems rather to spoil life than to destroy it. "Not only the child, but the young man till thirty feels that he is mortal;" but after forty a man's thoughts are much occupied by the inevitable prospect from the fear of it. Those of authors come out in their works. One of the most remarkable is a little Essay on death by Lord Bacon; not that in his Essay, but towards the end of his works, near his will. The Curate of a London Parish, who has great experience of death-bed scenes, was asked how people generally met their end? And the answer was, "either they wish for it as a relief from suffering, or they are not conscious of it." Even Dr. Johnson who dreaded death so much at a distance, seems to have feared that to many persons with right views, who have had a liberal allowance of sickness and sorrow, death becomes an object not so much of apprehension as of curiosity and interest. This state of mind is not only necessary for our comfort during health, but for our safety during sickness. One of the ablest physicians alive once said that in a dangerous illness, ceteris paribus, a Christian would have a better chance of recovery than an unbeliever; that religious resignation was a better soothing medicine than a poppy, and a better cordial than an ether; and Dr. Reid gives a similar opinion in the following expressive passage:

"The habitual horror which thus overshadows the mind, darkens the little daylight of life. An indulgence of this morbid excess of apprehension not only imbibes a man's existence, but may often tend to shorten its duration. He hastens the advance of death by the fear with which his frame is seized at its real or imaginary approach. His trembling hand involuntarily shakes the glass in which his hours are numbered."

Contradictory as it may appear, there are well attested instances of persons who have been driven even to suicide by the dread of dissolution. It would seem as if they had run into the arms of death in order to shelter themselves from the terror of his countenance.

THE VIRGINIA GAME COCK.

It was in the year 18—, that I was bound for the Havana, in the brig Evening Star, when we had lost sight of the coasts, that a large eagle lit upon our yard arm. The sailors seeing him, let him remain until after dark, when one of the men, taking a large bag with him, went out upon the yard and succeeded in flinging it over him, so as to prevent his biting, and tying the bag at one end secured him until the following morning, when he was taken from the bag, and his wings clipped, and trimmed in such a manner, as to prevent his escape. He was always fed well by the men in the fore-castle, and at last became quite domesticated, and was a great favorite of the captain. He played a great many tricks to the great annoyance of the pigs on board, for any thing in the pigs' mess he would have if he took a liking to it; he was the terror of his bristly companions to such a degree, that if a pig showed his snout on the quarter deck, he was sure to "go the whole hog" on him—this very much pleased the captain, for when pigs are let loose on board ship, they are very troublesome.

The day after we arrived at Havana the captain, with several more Americans, visited the cock-pit, to have some sport. The captain bet several times, but invariably lost, at length he offered to bet five hundred dollars, that he had a Virginia game cock on board that would kill any cock on the Island. Of course he was soon taken up, and the day pitched for the fight, which was to be three days after. Accordingly, on leaving the pit, he let his companions into the secret, and proposed to them to go snacks, and throw in, to make up the bet. The captain also went around to the American captains in the port, and told them of the hoax, advising them to bet on the Virginia game cock, if they wanted to win a stake or two. The captain then returned on board, and had the eagle trimmed as cocks generally are for fight; all his feathers about the neck, which are called the cow feathers on a chicken, in consequence of their letting them fall when they are beaten, or as it is termed, cowed. He then had a little more trimmed of his wings, and in fine, disfigured him in such a manner that very few could have told it was an eagle. He was then cooped and put upon short allowance, so as to whet his appetite for the coming battle.

The news spread all over the Havana, and many flocked to see the fight between the Virginia game and Spanish cocks, and bets were made to a considerable amount. When the day of battle came, the eagle was conveyed to the scene of action in the same bag in which he was caught. The time of pitting the cocks arrived, and two men stepped out, who were selected to pit the cocks, for neither party were permitted to pit their own chicken; the man on the opposite side, produced one of the largest the Spanish breed, and fixed the heels on him. The man who was to pit the captain's cock, was about preparing a large pair of heels, when the captain told him not to trouble himself, for he fought his cock without gaffs. The captain's bird was taken from the sack, and was received with surprise by the beholders, but the Spaniard said his cock would gaff him the first fly. The Spanish cock made a fly at the eagle and picked him with his heels pretty smartly, which raised his ferocity, which was very high before for want of food—he cast a look of disdain on his adversary, and the next fly the game Spaniard made at him, he seized him with his talons, by the breast and wing, and in an instant tore him in pieces. The fame of the Virginia game cock was raised so high, that the captain, before he left the place, sold him for an amount of money equal to the bet.

THE FIELD OF WATERLOO.

I have spoken heretofore with some levity of the contrast that exists between the English and French character; but it deserves more serious consideration. They are the two great nations of modern times most worthy of each other's rivalry; essentially distinct in their characters, excelling in opposite qualities, and reflecting lustre on each other by their very opposition. In nothing is this contrast more strikingly evinced than in their military conduct. Forages have they been contending, and for ages have they crowded each other's history with acts of splendid heroism. Take the Battle of Waterloo, for instance, the last and most memorable trial of their rival prowess. Nothing could surpass the brilliant daring on the one side, and the steadfast enduring on the other. The French cavalry broke like wave on the compact squares of English infantry. They were seen galloping round those serried walls of men, seeking in vain for an entrance; tossing their arms in the air, in the heat of their enthusiasm, and braving the whole front of battle. The British troops, on the other hand, forbidden to move or fire, stood firm and enduring. Their columns were ripped up by cannonry; whole rows were swept down at a shot: the survivors closed their ranks, and stood firm. In this way many columns stood through the pelting of the iron tempest without firing a shot; without any action to stir their blood or excite their spirits. Death thinned their ranks, but could not shake their souls.

A beautiful instance of the quick and generous impulses to which the French are prone, is given in the case of a French cavalier, in the hottest of the action, charging furiously upon a British officer, but perceiving in the moment of assault that his adversary had lost his sword-arm, dropping the point of his sabre, and courteously riding on. Peace be with that generous warrior, whatever was his fate! If he went down in the storm of battle, with the foundering fortunes of his chieftain, may the turf of Waterloo grow green above his grave!—and happier far would be the fate of such a spirit, to sink amidst the tempest, unconscious of defeat, than to survive, and mourn over the blighted laurels of his country.

In this way the two armies fought through a long and bloody day. The French with enthusiastic valor, the English with cool, inflexible courage, until Fate, as if to leave the question of superiority still undecided between two such adversaries, brought up the Prussians to decide the fortunes of the field.

It was several years afterwards, that I visited the field of Waterloo. The ploughshare had been busy with its oblivious labors, and the frequent harvest had nearly obliterated the vestiges of war. Still the blackened ruins of Hougoumont stood, a monumental pile, to mark the violence of this vehement struggle. Its broken walls, pierced by bullets, and shattered by explosions, showed the deadly strife that had taken place within; when Gaul and Britain, hemmed in between narrow walls, hand to hand and foot to foot, fought from garden to court-yard, from court-yard to chamber, with intense and concentrated rivalry. Columns of smoke turned from this vortex of battle as from a volcano:—"It was," said my guide, "like a little hell upon earth." Not far off, two or three broad spots of rank, unwholesome green still marked the places where these rival warriors, after their fierce and fitful struggle, slept quietly together in the lap of their common mother earth. Over all the rest of the field, peace had resumed its sway. The thoughtless whistle of the peasant floated on the air, instead of the trumpet clangor the team slowly labored up the hillside, once shaken by the hoofs of rushing squadrons; and wide fields of corn waved peacefully over the soldiers' graves, as summer seas dimple over the place where many a tall ship lies buried.

CLARA: OR LOVE AND SUPERSTITION.

BY DON TRUEBA TELESFORO D'F COSIO.

In a few months, calm was restored to Clara's bosom. Not that the phantom of Theodosio had completely quitted her thoughts. That image still broke upon her meditations at intervals, but still the intrusion was not accompanied with that intense feeling of disquietude and pain, which it was wont to bring on former occasions—a sensation of subdued sorrow, rendered endurable by the spirit of piety and resignation, which had now taken possession of Clara's heart, and even this remnant of unfortunate love, she hoped would at a future period, be converted into a tender, pure remembrance for the object, divested of all human passion, and incapable of either inflicting pain or regret. With this soothing idea the days of the novice flowed in a gentle stream, unrippled by cares or remorse, whilst those of her lover were involved in mystery. We must now revert to Theodosio, who, had by this time, become as a dead man to his beloved Clara.

The destiny of Clara had long been a subject of doubt and speculation to her absent lover, thanks to the activity of Don Gil and Father Bastos. Every means of intercourse had been so efficiently intercepted, that in the moments of grief, Theodosio entertained the most gloomy ideas, sometimes fancying that he was no longer an object of tenderness to Clara, at others, that she had sunk into an early grave. A charge of heresy brought against him before the holy office of the Inquisition, confined him to the dungeons of that terrible tribunal for a period of several months—the accusation, however was not substantial, and he was released from prison. The first use he made of his liberty, was to repair to Madrid in all haste, to ascertain the fate of his beloved Clara: the information which he gathered, filled him at once with astonishment and sorrow. One ray of hope, however, dawned upon his soul—the novice of his mistress had not yet expired, and she might yet be rescued from pronouncing a rash vow, which would bring along with it only misery and regret. Theodosio naturally enough conceived that undue influence had been used in persuading Clara to take the veil. He considered her as an addition to the list of victims, of fanatic zeal and parental oppression. With this idea, a feeling of pity and justice alone, had no other more tender sentiment actuated him, would have suggested the propriety of an attempt to rescue her from the convent.

This enterprise, however, was surrounded with almost insurmountable difficulties. But a few days remained of the noviciate, and it was not probable that in so short a period Theodosio could succeed in getting access to his mistress, and inducing her to a flight. Instigated by a tumult of dread, love, and compassion, he hastened to the nunnery, and essayed every means of informing Clara that he was sojourning in the precincts of that solemn prison house. Baffled in all his attempts, he one day adopted a step of greater boldness—he climbed the walls of the garden at the fall of evening, and hiding himself behind a cluster of trees, he struck a few melancholy strains on a guitar, which was followed by a Moorish ballad, to which Clara had always been very partial. The scheme was full of danger, but, like many other attempts instigated by boldness in the moment of despair, was accompanied with success.

Clara was sitting by the narrow window of her cell, when her ear caught the plaintive sound. She was at first startled, and imagined that she labored under some delusion of the brain. She listened attentively—her heart now throbbled with a tumult of conflicting feelings. The leading events of her mind passed rapidly and vividly before her mind. She trembled with a strange mixture of terror, hope and pleasure. She opened her window and leant forwards to ascertain if her eyes would confirm the promise of her ear. A man issued from the green bosom of a thicket, which appeared now partially tinged by the silvery radiance of the moonbeams. Clara, with a thrill of uncontrollable emotion, perceived the form gently moving forwards. She beheld the outlines of a man resembling her lover in height and deportment: imagination filled up the picture, and the throb of her heart clearly told her that Theodosio had impiously intruded within the precincts of that sacred spot. But the sensations of terror and superstition gave way before the more genuine and powerful feelings of human nature. The pure stream of love returned to those channels of the heart from which it had been repulsed by the troubled current of superstition.

Theodosio held up a letter, and with all the eloquence of passion, conjured Clara, by signs, to admit it into her possession. He then placed the epistle in a marked spot, but yet sufficiently hidden to escape detection, and after lingering for some time, on the hallowed place which contained all that his soul held dearest in life, he at length retreated from the garden, to concert measures for the rescue of his beloved Clara. The feelings of the young novice were now excited to the highest point: the astonishment produced by the unexpected apparition of her lover, had at first completely absorbed all her powers, and she suffered no ungrateful reproach to intrude in order to dissolve the charm by which she was bound. But with the retreat of Theodosio came reflection. Clara was soon plunged into a deep and perplexing reverie. She blamed herself for the guilt which she had incurred by affording the least encouragement to the desperate of a man with whom every connexion was broken in this world—a man, whom, more than any other member of the human species, she was bound to banish from her thoughts. These painful speculations disturbed the repose of Clara during the night. To soothe the agitation of her soul, she had recourse to prayer, but even the power of fervent devotion failed in calling back the lost tranquility of her mind—that mind, despite of the efforts of piety, was chiefly occupied by the image of her lover. Alas! all the endeavors of religious zeal were insufficient to eject so powerful a tenant from the habitation of which he taken possession.

When morning came, the state of Clara's mind was, if possible, more distressing. Her sense of duty suggested that she ought not to read the contents of her lover's letter. Moreover, some whispering spirit told her that the epistle should be delivered up to the mother abbess. She was almost determined to act up to this idea, but her courage failed at the moment of putting it into execution. A stream of tenderness and of returning affection inundated her heart. The death of her lover might perhaps be the result of her severity. She had not yet pronounced the awful and hopeless vow, and the agency of her will was still unshackled. Besides the period of a noviciate is allowed to the young mind in order to weigh maturely the awful responsibility of the engagements which it is about to make. These consoling reflections came next to counsel a different course, and as the heart is never backward in adopting that alternative which is more consonant with the tenor of its feelings, Clara at length resolved to be guided by the impulse of ill-suppressed affections.

She descended to the garden, and watching a favorable opportunity, was fortunate enough to possess herself of her lover's letter, without having attracted notice, or excited suspicion. Her fingers trembled as she took up the paper. She felt (in her estimation) a guilty joy, and she sped to the secrecy of her cell; she fancied that every object which met her eyes was a severe witness of her offence, and reproached her conduct. Once again safe within her narrow chamber, she breathed more freely; but the tumult of her heart increased as she opened the letter and read its contents—they were imbued with the wild eloquence of impassioned love and despair. The perusal produced a powerful and decisive impression on the mind of the gentle and affectionate girl. After detailing the trials which he had undergone, and his efforts to obtain information with regard to her destiny, the ill-fated lover continued to dissuade Clara from the rash resolution which she had adopted. This part of the letter ran thus:—

"Clara! Clara, my own beloved—the hope of my soul—the sole principle of my life! I conjure you by that immaculate purity—by that love of virtue which is the essence of thy nature, to repel an institution which is prompted not by the voice of true religion and piety, but by the foul breath of fanaticism. Oh! listen ere it is too late—the moments are counted, and a life of remorse and despair will be the award of your infatuation. Yes, Clara, you are going to pronounce sacrilegious vows, in which the heart will have no share. Pause, I conjure you; pause ere it is too late. And if after this more solemn admonition, the pleadings of my agony and despair could be weighed in your mind, let me recall to your memory the sacred pledge of love. Have you forgotten a feeling which I deemed interwoven with the very principle of your life? Are you ashamed of that love?

"No, no; the love which I feel for you, Clara, is not the offspring of vanity, or a fleeting passion. No, it is a sentiment worthy of the object by which it was inspired—a sentiment tender as the expression of thine eyes—pure as the imaginings of thy mind—deep as the innate goodness of thy soul—a sentiment fresh like thy beauty—enduring and indelible, like thy virtues."

After these, and other earnest admonitions, Theodosio concluded by insinuating that he would convey to her the means of escape. No time was to be lost, and as the case was so urgent, the lover announced his intention of making a bold attempt.

The perusal of this letter threw poor Clara into the most powerful agitation; the conflict of her feelings produced a keen sensation of pain, yet in the midst of her emotion she enjoyed an undefinable charm in the boldness expressed by her lover; the darker phantom of sin now and then came across her imagination, but the lurid image was soon chased away by more consoling and enlivening prospects. One thing, however, puzzled her ideas, and this was, the nature of the plan which her lover would pursue to accomplish his designs. In the postscript of his letter he had intimated that in a trunk, which was to be taken to the convent on the following day, she would find the means, for effecting her escape. We must now explain.

When a young maiden takes the veil, and abjures the world for ever, the most interesting part of the ceremony is certainly that which refers to the sacrifice as connected with her personal charms. The young novice is represented as the bride-elect of the Saviour, and accordingly, on the day on which her espousals are to take place, she is attired in the most splendid habiliments. She is adorned with the most scrupulous care and rich profusion, and these worldly ornaments are exchanged by her for the humble and coarse habit of the convent; her hair is then cut short and every thing is done to give the impression that she renounces the pomp and charms of life, for an existence of penance and humility.

Don Gil Perez of course was neither forgetful of this part of the ceremony, nor disposed to let it pass without evincing his zeal. It was a matter of the highest importance: nay, a sprinkling of worldly vanity might also be mixed with this religious fervor, and he had accordingly resolved that his niece should be dressed for the approaching ceremony with all the pomp and splendor that care and expense could procure. Father Bastos approved highly the zeal evinced by the Indiano. It was an additional proof of the influence which every thing connected with religious ceremonies exercised over his mind. The preparations were accordingly made in the most expensive manner, and a passing sunshine diffused itself over the lugubrious aspect of the devotee, as he conceived that he was zealously promoting the future welfare of his niece, as well as his own. With regard to Father Bastos, he inwardly congratulated himself on the near completion of those plans which he had labored so much to bring about.

Clara, the interesting subject of so much care and speculation, was, meantime, laboring under the painful trials of dread and irresolution. The impassioned appeal of her lover had made the strongest impression on her heart. She felt half-determined to follow his wishes, but in the following moment the image of the sinful duplicity which she was committing, would fill her soul with agony and terror. The battle of her feelings was very distressing, and the nuns failed not to observe the agitation of the young novice; this, however, did not afford matter for great surprise—such displays were not of unusual occurrence in the nunnery on similar occasions. The painful reverie of Clara was soon dispelled by the necessity for action. A trunk arrived from her uncle, containing the dress and ornaments in which she was to be decked out for the ceremony of the morrow. Clara endeavored to conceal the emotion which she experienced when the key of the trunk was delivered to her. She would have immediately proceeded, to examine the contents, but, her desire was thwarted for the present, as she was obliged to attend the confessional, and undergo other religious exercises, preparatory to the solemn sacrifice which she was on the eve of making.

The hour for evening prayers arrived, and the quietude which Clara had felt during the day increased to a painful degree: the sisterhood repaired to the choir, with that sort of listless indifference which habit had rendered natural. The mother abbess, with her accustomed severity of aspect and solemnity of deportment, heralded her flock to the evening devotions, pride and moroseness stamped on those features which all the efforts of practised deceit could not bend to exact humility. She cast a scrutinizing look on Clara—the glance went to the young girl's inmost heart; that heart, though pure as the unsullied snow, quailed from the cold unfeeling eye of cruel superstition.—The excitement produced by her lover's letter could not be hidden from the observing mind of the abbess but she was far from surmising the real cause of so visible an emotion. She naturally concluded that it was the effect of the solemn ceremony about to take place on the morrow. Convinced, as she felt, that the young novice was one of the many victims obliged to pronounce vows in which the heart has no share, and to bid adieu to all of the pomps and deceits of a world, which alas! they were incompetent to judge—the circumstance, therefore, excited neither surprise nor indignation; the event, was of no unusual occurrence, and all that was required of a novice was an humble spirit when making the detestable sacrifice.

Prayers began in the usual solemn monotony of tone, but the mind of Clara was absent from devotion—the sensations of her young heart were harassing and painful. It was in vain that she endeavored to fix her thoughts on the religious duties for which they were assembled. She had no longer control over her will—a crowd of distressing images flocked and fled before her imagination, all full of dismal omens, all pregnant with a certain woe and horror, which though undefinable, appeared yet to threaten with a fearful calamity. The letter of her lover had thrown her into a state of wild excitement. She seemed no longer the mild, pure, pliant being, born merely to suffer and bend to the will of others. Nor did her aspect offer the image of a virgin, spotless even in the most fleeting thoughts: alas! no, a revulsion of feeling had come over her heart—good and virtuous she was still, but that angelic purity of mind was withered. She had in some measure sanctioned any steps which her lover might be induced to take in his despair, and this thought conveyed a poignant sensation to her soul.—Her sense of virtue shuddered from the lurid phantom which her weakness had conjured up in her imagination. She fancied herself guilty of some great sin, and the impression was productive of the deepest agony and remorse.

Nor was this the only feeling that pressed to distract her mind—the pathetic appeal of her unfortunate lover had gone to her inmost heart, and remained firmly impressed thereon. She could not disguise from herself that she still loved him—loved him with all the fondness of a first, a pure, deep affection, loved him with that absorbing sentiment which can alone be felt by a devoted female in the spring of life, when all her feelings are fresh, all her thoughts unsullied, all her acts beaming with the light of candor and purity. Such love partakes of a celestial origin—it is a rare boon—frequently, alas! the bitterest curse that can fall on the possessor. But there is a charm in the feeling which takes a strong possession of the mind which loves to dwell on the idea, however harrowing, and which, in the midst of dismal gloom and threatening horror, throws a soothing influence to cheer up the sinking heart. It is a cheering light glimmering thro' the darkness—a smiling flower blooming in a dreary desert.

The tumult of Clara's thoughts increased every moment. She was anxious to see the prayers ended—never had they appeared so long as in the present instance; her mind was restless—her heart throbbing to painful intensity—the wildest and most incoherent ideas played before her besotted imagination. Sometimes the prospect of escape from the life of misery to which she was about to condemn herself, came to diffuse a momentary comfort, but in the next moment the sacrifice of the morrow dispelled the illusion, and she shrunk from the wickedness of which she was guilty in harboring such criminal thoughts; this conflict of feeling grew to a degree that made her ready to faint, and she reclined for protection on the balustrades of the choir. Meantime the nuns continued mumbling the accustomed service in their usual drowsy monotonous manner, perfectly heedless of the sorrow of the novice.

What an awful moment was this! The silence of the hour—a chilling silence, and disturbed alone by the solemn voice of prayer. The melancholy and awe inspiring aspect of the place was sufficient to engender gloom and despondency in the youthful heart.—Images of woe and terror danced before the mind of poor Clara—the church seemed enrobed in dismal shadows—the saints appeared as if animated and coming forward from their niches; the solemnity of death, which presided over the place, whispered to the soul a warning of misery and woe. A fearful presentiment seized on the hapless victim—she strove to discard it from her mind, but she strove in vain, for the unwelcome and dismal thoughts broke on her meditations with ominous pertinacity. She could not pray—her whole soul was absent from the spot, and when, by a strong effort, she summoned, back her thoughts to the holy duty she was performing, she shuddered at the phantom of guilt which presented itself to her mind. She was on the point of bidding farewell to the world—of pronouncing solemn, irrevocable vows which would render her as it were dead to all the purposes of life—her whole thoughts, feelings, and desires, were henceforward to be directed towards heaven alone and yet at such an awful, and such a sacred period, she had harkened to the voice of a lover—granted his request—and was harboring criminal hopes of a rescue from her religious confinement.

A thrill of horror shot to her heart as the pealing organ spread its full, solemn, and elevating notes along the aisles of the church. That mournful sound, to which her ear ought to have been accustomed, was like a voice of death. There was something replete with dark forebodings in those sublime, yet melancholy strain. She felt an undefinable presentiment of evil working in her throbbing brain, and she trembled in every limb, unconscious of a cause for the agitation.

Theodosio had promised to supply the means of her deliverance. Were those contained in the trunk which contained the rich habiliments in which she was solemnly to renounce the world and take the vow? This thought recurred frequently to her mind. It had already troubled her from the first, but every moment it became more and more anxious and tormenting.—Perhaps a ladder of ropes—but would she have courage enough to adopt so desperate course? Again, was not this an act of guilt from which a virtuous mind ought to shrink with horror?

Prayers were ended, and the nuns, in the usual order and awful silence, having received the blessing of the mother abbess, began severally to retire to their cells. When Clara, her heart brimful to bursting, approached the abbess, the matron addressed some words of consolation, not unmingled with a certain severity both of tone and manner, which is in accordance with strict religious discipline.

"Go, my daughter," she said in a calm, austere voice, "go to thy rest, and may the Holy Virgin watch over thy slumbers—raise your soul to heaven—for to-morrow thou wilt choose the better part. Thou art a bride elect of the Saviour, and an imperishable wreath will be thy reward hereafter."

Each of these words was a dagger in the breast of poor Clara; they were so many condemnations of her duplicity; and she felt relieved when the abbess, holding forth her hand to be kissed, bestowed upon her the parting blessing for the night. With hurried speed and a panting heart the novice then hastened to her cell: she entered—closed the door—breathed a long sigh, and felt eased from the weight that pressed on her soul. For a moment she stood as if fixed in the midst of the narrow tenement, then summoning her strength, she approached the trunk. No sooner had she touched it than she felt a cold chill running thro' her veins—her bosom heaved fearfully—her tongue was parched up—her eyes seemed burning in the sockets—a powerful, overwhelming fever paralyzed her limbs. She wept—she wept aloud—unconscious of the cause of her sorrow; but her conscience was not tranquil, she considered herself a sinful being, and a fearful voice rang in her ear the award of guilt. Poor hapless girl! thou wert good and angelic; if the shadow of sin approached thee, it was thy own gentle and pure nature alone that converted the fleeting, perishable shade, into a thing of substance!

A moment elapsed—Clara felt somewhat more tranquil. She at length resolved to open the trunk; she turned the key—her eyes were fixed for a moment—the next a scream of horror and dismay filled the room—and was echoed along the silent precincts of the cloisters. The trunk, instead of bridal ornaments, contained the breathless corpse of a man—that man was Theodosio, her ill-fated and devoted lover! She gazed again in throbbing anxiety—he might be alive; alas! no—it was too late—the chill of death was upon his brow, and his countenance exhibited the ghastly hue produced by suffocation. He had been too long kept without the power of breathing; for although he had bored an aperture in the trunk, the porters who brought it to the convent, ignorant of its contents, had placed it in a manner to render abortive the unfortunate lover's contrivance. Life was extinct. With a look of glazed horror the wretched Clara contemplated the fearful object before her. She had no tears to shed—hers was an agony beyond the power of the least passing relief. Mechanically she took the hand of her adored love—the clammy coldness of the touch called her wandering senses again to concentrate all the horrors of her situation. The paroxysm was over. Again she endeavored to deceive herself with false hopes—again those fearful hopes were repulsed by the chilling reality. She found the powers of utterance—and a loud, wild, harrowing cry disturbed, for the second time, the awful silence that reigned in the convent.

The painful sound had startled the peaceful tenants of the place. The mother abbess, and two or three of the neighboring nuns, rushed to the spot from which the dismal cry had issued—the door of the cell flew open, and the horrid spectacle struck their astonished eyes. Clara's wild and frenzied looks were for a moment withdrawn from the ghastly remains of her lover, and fixed on the stupefied nuns. The misery of her situation was increased. The mother abbess gazed for some time on the terrible scene before her, then suddenly bursting into a strain of horror—"Can this be possible?" she exclaimed. "The corpse of a man in this holy cell! Are then our sacred walls defiled by so flagrant a guilt? 'Thou wretched thing,' she added, turning to the awe-struck novice, "tremble at the enormity of thy crime—the curse of heaven is on thy head—a life of unceasing penitence can only partially atone for your sins, and serve to calm the wrath of Heaven. Prepare to be immured for the rest of thy wretched existence in the close and dismal dungeon which justice and religion have assigned for criminal females like yourself."

The sufferings of Clara had now arrived at their acme—the cup of misery was brimful to overflowing—the dreadful image of disgrace which would attach to her memory, presented a hedious train of thought to her mind; the awful aspect of the mother abbess—the prophetic terror of her words—the fearful malediction she pronounced, added to the horrors of the tragic scene, pressed so heavily on her head, that the weight surpassed all the powers of suffering. Clara spoke not a word; she looked mournfully for a moment on the abbess, uttered a low, plaintive moan, and fell on the body of her unfortunate lover. The nuns imagined this was a swoon, produced by the horror of the scene, and hastened to proffer their assistance.—Alas! it was in vain—Clara was no longer among the living—her heart was broken, and her trials and sorrows were no more. For some time the nuns harbored hopes she might recover, but when the death of the poor victim could afford no doubt, such a catastrophe, instead of the tears of compassion for the hapless fate of a lovely being, only produced in the votaries of fanaticism a religious terror at the supposed crimes of a wretched sinner. So vast, so absorbing is the power of superstition, that it corrupts even the pure stream of female tenderness! And that feeling of compassion, which they would not withhold from the most worthless object in the creation of the moment of distress and destitution, they deny to a wretched, innocent and lovely being of their own sex!

The news of this dreadful tragedy, despite of the precaution of the mother abbess, was soon spread thro' the town, and produced a powerful sensation among the friends of the parties. Don Gil Perez was horror struck at the catastrophe. Yet, although he had been so materially instrumental in bringing it about, he nevertheless felt not the least remorse of conscience, whilst his zealous indignation was powerfully excited at the fancied crimes of his victim. The Indiano's health had for some time been in a declining state, and the fearful events which had within so short a space of time taken place among his nearest relatives, were calculated to hasten the period of his existence. His malady assumed a mortal aspect, he felt his end approach, and desired Father Bastos not to quit his side. He died calmly, as if his had been a life of blessing, comfort, and utility to his fellow creatures, instead of the accursed origin of a great sum of deepest woe and misfortune. He consoled himself with the idea that he died the death of the just, an idea which the pious Father Bastos took no care to contradict, for his plans had succeeded to the fullest extent. The whole wealth of the superstitions Gil Perez devolved on the church, and such piety certainly rendered him deserving of an immortal crown in the regions of bliss.

The funeral of the diseased Indiano was performed with the greatest pomp and solemnity. Masses were ordered to be said in every convent, church and chapel. Charity was distributed to all the paupers of the place, and the service for the dead was celebrated with all the state and ceremony of religion. To conclude the scene in a befitting manner. Father Bastos ascended the pulpit, and delivered a panegyric on the deceased, which in the eyes of common sense would seem like a mockery of religion. He descanted copiously on the piety, charity, and other virtues of the Indiano in extravagant terms, coolly announced to the congregation that his soul had flown to the realms of light, and concluded by making a contrast between the virtues of Gil Perez and his edifying death, and the guilty lives and appalling deaths of his relatives.

The greater part of the audience felt no doubt convinced by the friar's eloquence, and departed accordingly, impressed with a feeling of terror mingled with astonishment, that such pious persons as Don Gil Perez and his wife, should be the relations of such fearful sinners as Agnes, Clara, and Don Theodosio.

THE EMPIRE OF CHINA.—The Oriental Herald contains the following curious article upon the empire of China.

The empire of China is divided into 20 provinces; there are one hundred and eighty five capitals, and as many cities of the second order. The taxes and the duties amount annually to thirteen millions and a quarter pounds sterling—one million nine hundred and eighteen thousand tons of wheat and rice must be deducted for the subsistence of the troops and the supply of the public granaries. The civil service costs but one and half millions sterling per annum, but the military service is six times as expensive, and amounts to more than eight millions. Among the articles of the Chinese budget, we find eight millions for the maintenance of the Yellow River, two millions for the gardens of Yuen-Ming, and considerable sums for the entertainment of the Ministers of State of the first and second class, to the number of three thousand five hundred and twenty-five. The revenue of the nation in silver and in products, is valued at thirty millions sterling. The duties levied on English and American ships entering at Canton, adds about another million to that sum. The revenue of England, which possesses but twenty-two millions of population, amounted, in 1824, to one third more than that of the Chinese Empire, which, according to late enumerations, contains no less than one hundred and sixty-four millions of inhabitants. The persons in civil employment by the government do not exceed nine thousand five hundred and eleven, and the military officers seven thousand five hundred and sixty-two. The army consists of an enormous mass of one million two hundred and sixty three thousand men, of which eight hundred and twenty two thousand belong to the infantry, four hundred and ten thousand to the cavalry, and thirty thousand to the marine."

An Irishman having been told that the price of bread has been lowered, exclaimed, "This is the first time I ever rejoiced at the fall of my best friend."

Distinguished Author.—"Gentlemen," said a ragged loafer, addressing a crowd, "I am an author." Indeed—of what? "My own misfortunes."

Fall Fashion.—Last Sabbath morning a YOUNG LADY was seen wending her way to church, with Elssler buttons on her wrists, and a hole as big as a ninepence in the heel of her stocking.—Prov. Jour.

A Toper's idea of Temperance.—Temperance is a great virtue; therefore always be moderate in the use of ardent spirits. Six glasses of sling before breakfast are as much as any man ought to take unless he is extraordinarily thirsty, and didn't drink enough on going to bed. But even in that case, he should not exceed twelve no how.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, JAN. 2, 1841.

TERMS OF THIS PAPER.—To subscribers residing out of the city, $2 if in advance—$2.50 if within six months, and $3, if not paid until the expiration of the year. BACK NUMBERS at all times furnished.

 THE SEASON.—To our friends and patrons "from Maine to Georgia," we extend through our columns, the right hand of fellowship, and with it the congratulations which each returning "HAPPY NEW YEAR," is calculated to awaken. As a people and as individuals, we have every cause for thankfulness, that the Almighty has in His infinite goodness spared our lives, and blessed us in our many comforts. Are we not then bound, with the heart mellowed and softened as it should be, on this auspicious day, to contrast our own happy situations with that of the child of want and sorrow; and as we are blessed in our own store, so to pour into the lap of affliction, the wine and oil, which over and above our own use is only entrusted to us as faithful stewards of Him who feedeth us, and commands us in return, to feed our brother. How little will it take to bring a "happy New Year," in many a wretched family in our respective neighborhoods; and how much true satisfaction will it impart to the pillow, to carry it there, when the "still small voice" utters its monition in language never misunderstood.

MRS KINNEY—who has been the lioness of the day has been tried for the murder of her husband, and as a matter of course acquitted. We say a matter of course, because from an attentive perusal of all of the facts elicited on her trial, we can perceive nothing on which to ground even a reasonable suspicion. It is true that "her bright eyes," [which all handsome women have] enabled her to catch three husbands—and it is likewise true that a paper was found in the house on which was written "poison;" but there is nothing suspicious in all this. Husbands will die, and their widows have a right to marry, if it suits their taste, and "poison"-ous papers will creep in the houses of the best regulated families. We believe Mrs. Kinney to be an innocent and abused woman, and the trials she has been compelled to pass through, redound but little to the credit of the sapient public prosecutor, who has failed even to make a case of it.

VACILLATION OF THE PRESS.—The mysterious circumstances that surround the unfortunate situation of Dr. Eldridge, of Philadelphia, have of late furnished fine food for the craving maw of the press. Phrenologically, it has not only afforded it an opportunity to gratify its marvelousness, but its destructiveness. We had an article touching upon the first named propensity in our last, but the present case is of so singular a character, that we feel ourselves impelled to the making of a few more remarks. On first arresting the Dr. the cry from all quarters was, that the world never heard of such consummate villany as he had committed. He had resorted to devices to carry out his infamous projects, without number and without parallel. He was guilty of all—if not much more crime than that of which he was accused—and to crown his audacity, he had committed the unwarrantable enormity of becoming enamored of an heiress. This last uncommon circumstance was of course of a character so appalling as not, on any consideration, to be forgiven. Now, that matters are assuming something of a different aspect, and the Dr. is likely to be acquitted by a jury of his country, with the facility of a magician, the sublime press turns a handsome somerset, and the entire scene is changed. What before appeared of a character the most heinous, is with marvelous expedition transformed into quite endurable virtue. His extravagant and almost immeasurable wardrobe has been reduced to entirely consistent dimensions—his very exquisite person, to the astonishment of all, proves to be exceedingly modest and plain, and his power of making the valuables of others his own, has been entirely lost in the elevated integrity of the gentleman. Instead of everlastingly deserving distance vile, he is now looked upon only as the young, talented persecuted Dr. Eldridge. He will now become a man of such enviable notoriety, that we expect nothing else than that we shall soon hear, that instead of his having to pay Court to young ladies—be they rich or beautiful—that they will hereafter offer a premium for the privilege of addressing him.

We do not pretend to be capable of accounting for this expert manœuvring on the part of the guardian of public opinion. We would not even surmise that it may have had its origin in certain forebodings about prosecutions nor, in the still absurd idea, that the Dr. might show his indignation by a large prescription of lead pills; it doubtlessly arose from conscientious scruples—to assign any other reason for it, would certainly be falling short of the truth.

But to be serious. We consider such vacillating as the above would portray, as calculated neither to elevate the character of the press or mankind, and entirely unworthy of emanating from so high a source. Moreover we look upon a man's "good name" as possessing too sacred an importance, to be tossed about "like tempest-withered leaves." But while we think that a fair reputation to any one—more especially such as have to depend entirely upon their own personal exertions—is every thing; still we would not be thot as in the slightest degree countenancing crime. If the Dr. is guilty, let punishment fall heavily upon him "if he has sown the tempest, let him reap the whirlwind;" but do not prejudge—do not let the character that might otherwise have risen into fair and graceful proportions, be blasted by the merciless breath of slander.

AMPHITHEATRE.—Among the entertainments at this establishment, on Monday evening may be found the splendid spectacle of St. George and the Dragon.

Our readers will discover that we have this week devoted one of our pages to contributions from the 7, and we need not say that we have done so with pleasure. We are personally acquainted with several of the persons constituting this Literary Club; and know them to be possessed of fine abilities. Some of them are already favorably known to the public. What is signified by their numerical title, we are not masonic enough to enable us to divine. As to the character and merit of their correspondence, our readers will have an opportunity of judging for themselves. We expect to have the gratification of frequently filling the same page with material derived from the same source.

LEDDINGS convicted of the murder of his wife and the mother of 12 of his children, paid the awful penalty of the law, on Tuesday last, in the hall of our gaol. We understand that he died devoid of all conscience or feeling, for his unnatural act. The Evening Journal contains the reasons for his respite, from time to time by the Governor, which we have not room to copy. It will prove satisfactory to the public. We were fearful that the Governor would be influenced by importunity to commute the punishment; not because we lack less humanity than our neighbors, but because as good citizens, we shall ever deprecate executive clemency stepping between the law and its victim, unless for the most powerful reasons. The preservation of society and the peculiar state of the times, require a CERTAINTY, in the infliction of punishment. The law must be respected, or the offender must pay the penalty. Our courts and our officers of justice can not impress this too strongly on the minds of the community—it is only by this conservative influence that society can be kept together. The unatoned murders of Duffey, Jewett, and Labau cry aloud for justice, and the acquittal of their assassins, is a disgrace to the state, and has already opened the way to the commission of crime, which unless met firmly by the uncompromising arm of the law, will at no distant day exercise an influence which must become insupportable.

Gov. Seward, closes his remarks in relation to Leddings with the following; which should forever rebuke the morbid sympathy, of those who would have saved this abandoned villain from the fate which the laws of God and of man have so deservedly meted out to him:—

"The prisoner is first made known to us as an unfeeling and abusive husband. His wife is shut out of his house by day and by night, and is left to sleep in the cold and wet cellar; the help of neighbors and friends is called in to pacify his violent and unreasonable temper; he threatens the life of his wife; on the day which closed with his fearful crime he is found with his gun at an early hour trying to persuade her to go with him to a distance from the house; then to send her children away that he might be alone with her in the house; failing in both these efforts, he enters her room with his gun loaded; he commences a conversation with her; receiving an answer, which, although kind, evidently proceeded from a meek and broken spirit, he deliberately rises and murders the mother of his twelve children. There could be no defence but insanity for such a crime, and that defence is not attempted in this case.

The Executive therefore feels obliged to leave the law to its course, notwithstanding the sympathy the prisoner's condition has excited."

TEXAS.—An important resolution has been passed by the Texan House of Representatives in Congress, empowering the President to accept the services of 5000 men for the invasion of Mexico, allowing them to have what they may take from the enemy, and a league of land out of any they may conquer.—Texas is breathing nothing but war against her dastardly and treacherous neighbor.

Intelligence.

Counterfeit Red Back notes.—Our attention has been called to a new counterfeit. It is the five dollar red back plate, a correct imitation and very well executed the back of the bill particularly. The face seems to be a wood cut, and does not bear examination, although we'll calculated to deceive at first sight. The filling up is bad, and the paper thin. The Registers' names are poorly imitated. One of them has the name of P. D. Prindle as register. (The name is P. B. Prindle, and he signs no 5's.) The bills that we saw purported to be on the St. Lawrence and James Banks.

The probability is that the plate being a general one, will be applied to all the banking associations. The imitation of the red back is a new feature in counterfeiting. It had been supposed to be beyond the power of the art.

A DREADFUL CASE.—One of the most appalling cases that we remember is related in the Philadelphia Inquirer to have occurred a day or two ago in the lower part of Philadelphia County. A drunkard named Jarvis resided in an unfinished house in Sixth street near Catharine—and his daughter, a girl of nineteen—together with a little boy, absolutely perished with hunger and cold. The female was alive when discovered, but all the efforts of the neighbors proved vain, and she expired on Sunday morning. The little boy was dead when discovered, and two other children were perishing with want in one corner of the room. The wretched father is said to be utterly lost to all sense of shame.

It is confidently said that the New-York merchants are making great preparations for an early and extensive spring trade, as soon as the holidays shall have passed.

Mayor Varian.—We regret to learn (says the N. Y. Com. Adv. of Thursday) that the Mayor's situation is very critical, and that his symptoms have assumed an alarming character.

The Adrien Murder.—We learn from the Wetumpka (Ala.) Argus, that Dr. McLeod, and Mr. Cox, of Montgomery, who were charged with the murder of Monsieur Adrien about a year ago, have been tried and acquitted.

SHOT.—A Mrs. Stinger, of Washington township, Williams county, Ohio, got up from her bed on the night of the 18th ult., took a rifle hanging in the room, placed the muzzle to the head of her sleeping husband, and deliberately shot him dead. Jealousy the assigned cause.

SUMMARY.—Young Simes, the murderer of Professor Davis, has had his trial postponed on account of the voluntary absence of Kinkaid, the principal witness.

Judge Ernest, of Georgia, recently appeared in court clad in a full suit of silk, even to pocket handkerchief, and stock, manufactured in his own family.

Nearly a million of barrels of flour have been shipped from Cleveland the last season.

David E. Patton has recovered $2,500 for injuries received by the falling of a promenade deck at a Sabbath School celebration in 1839, at Staten Island.

CARRIER'S ADDRESS.

TO THE PATRONS OF THE
AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

January 1, 1841.

THIS MORN has ushered in the new-born year;
The passing throng arrayed in smiles appear;
Joy lights the eye, while hope each bosom fills;
The sweets of life are tasted—not its ills;
The past is fled—the future hid from view;
The present claims attention—well the meed is due.

Ah! see the hearty shake of those who meet
In town, and village, city, lane and street,
In hut, in hamlet, and in stately hall.
This day must hold its yearly festival:
'The sparkling wine flows pure as chrystal tide,
While every joy shall o'er our feasts preside;
Friends—Kindred—all—unite in social cheer,
To greet each other with a—"A HAPPY YEAR."

But while this globe its annual course shall roll,
What unseen changes may our lives control?
What acts of virtue will the good pursue?
What deeds of darkness will be held in view?
What useful arts will science bring to light,
To guide man onward in his glorious flight?
What thrones may sink, or totter to their fall?
What scenes of blood the human mind appal?
What virtue may earth's family possess?
To teach us all the road to happiness?
Tis not for man to fathom—we must wait,
Till time reveals them from the book of Fate.
The past affords Instruction—to it turn,
And from the page of History, Wisdom learn:
Nations which claimed earth's sceptre for their sway,
How are they shrunk! how frittered to decay?
As Oaks uprooted, or by Lightning riven,
Display the power—the Majesty of Heaven,
So Nations when they fall—and fall so low,
Show us the Power which struck the awful blow.
To classic Greece we turn with tearful eye,
And mark what Precepts in her Ruins lie:
Dissension's wave swept o'er her beauteous land,
Her soil seems smitten by some vengeful hand:
Where are her bards?—her sons of mystic lore?
Death sternly answers—"THEY ARE FOUND NO MORE."
And where is Rome, once mistress of the world,
Whose flag in every clime was found unfurl'd?
Degraded now she lies—the scornful lower
Of Nations who of yore obeyed her power:
Where are her Cæsars?—where her Senate?—Aye—
Echo will answer—"WHERE INDEED ARE THEY?"
Heroic Poland—What becomes of her?
The fallen Fief of a despotic Czar;
No chief she boasts—nor nobles' glorious fame;
But all are slaves, and fear a despot's name.
Debased, inglorious Spain: What is her state?
Dragg'd from her splendid, proud and gorgeous height;
A monument of shame—and who will take
This barren sceptre, even for Virtue's sake?
From towering skies each finds an awful fall,
Pride and Disunion mars the power of all:
But Reason cries, "Each reigning Power should know
The cause of Ruin, and avert the Blow."

America! to thee we turn;
Land of the brave and free;
For on thine Altars brightly burn
The Flames of LIBERTY:
And those who would its blessings share,
Will find its lasting Glories here.

And who dare quench these Flames,
Or even dim their Light?
Curses be ever on their names,
Their days eternal Night.

Our dear, our happy land, long may she be,
The Friend of human Woe—the Asylum of the free.

With hasty steps he brings th' MASONIC sheet,

In Links of Sympathy—but unconfin'd
And wide as light; as far as man can roam,
And makes more pleasant each Subscribers' home:

CHRISTMAS CAROL.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

O lovely voices of the sky,
That hym'd the Savior's birth!
Are ye not singing still on high,
Ye that sang "Peace on earth?"
To us yet speak the strains
Wherewith, in days gone by,
Ye bless'd the Syrian swains,
Ye voices of the sky?

O clear and shining light, whose beams
That hour Heaven's glory shed
Around the palms, and o'er the streams,
And on the shepherd's head;
Be near, though life and death,
As in that holiest night
Of Hope, and Joy, and Faith,
O clear and shining light!

O star which led to Him, whose love
Brought down man's ransom free;
Where art thou?—Midst the hosts above,
May we still gaze on thee?—
In heaven thou art set,
Thy rays earth might not dim—
Send them to guide us yet!
O star which led to Him!

VISIT FROM SANTA CLAUS.

'Twas the night before Christmas, when all thro' the house,
Not a creature was stirring, not even a mouse:
The stockings were hung by the chimney with care,
In hopes that Santa Claus would soon be there;
The children were nestled all snug in their beds,
While visions of sugar plums danced in their heads,
And mamma in her 'kerchief, and I in my cap,
Had just settled our brains for a long winter's nap—
When out on the lawn there arose such a clatter,
I arose from my bed to see what was the matter;
Away to the window I flew like a flash,
Tore open the shutters, and threw up the sash.
The moon on the breast of the new fallen snow,
Gave the lustrous of mid day to objects below;
When, what to my wondering eye should appear,
But a miniature sleigh, and eight tiny reindeer,
With a little old driver, so lively and quick,
I knew in a moment it must be St. Nick.
More rapid than eagles his coursers they came,
And he whistled, and shouted and called them by name:
"Now Dasher, now Dancer, now Prancer and Vixen,
"On Comet, on Cupid, on Dunder and Blixen;
"To the top of the porch, to the top of the wall;
"Now dash away! dash away! dash away all!"
As dry leaves before the wild hurricane fly,
When they meet with an obstacle mount to the sky!
So up to the house top the coursers they flew,
With the sleigh full of toys—and Santa Claus too;
And then in a twinkling, I heard on the roof,
The prancing and pawing, of each little hoof.
As I drew in my head, and was turning around,
Down the chimney Santa Clause came with a bound;
He was dressed all in fur from his head to his foot,
And his clothes were all tarnished with ashes and soot;
A bundle of toys was slung on his back,
And he looked like a pedlar just opening his pack;
His eyes—how they twinkled! his dimples how merry
His cheeks were like roses, his nose like a cherry;
His droll little mouth was drawn up like a bow,
And the beard of his chin was as white as the snow;
The stump of a pipe he held tight in his teeth,
And the smoke it encircled his head like a wreath;
He had a broad face, and a little round belly
That shook when he laughed, like a bowl full of jelly;
He was chubby and plump, a right jolly old elf,

And I laughed when I saw him, in spite of myself;
A wink of his eye, and a twist of his head
Soon gave me to know I had nothing to dread.
He spoke not a word but went straight to his work,
And filled all the stockings, then turned with a jerk;
And laying his finger aside of his nose
And giving a nod up the chimney he rose.
He sprang to his sleigh, to his team gave a whistle,
And away they all flew like the down of a thistle;
But I heard him exclaim, ere he drove out of sight—
Happy Christmas to all, and to all a good night."

NATIVITY OF ST. JOHN.

Br. Hoffman.—Notwithstanding the severity of the storm this day, a goodly number of Companions and Brethren, associated at Porter's Corner, in this town, pursuant to previous notice, given by a committee from St. John's R. A. Chap. No 103, and St. John's Lodge No. 22, N. Y. The primary arrangements of celebrating the anniversary of the nativity of our revered brother and patron Saint were carried out in a manner highly interesting to the members of the fraternity present on the occasion, and I believe to the respectable congregation of spectators also.

The following resolutions were unanimously adopted, viz.

Resolved That the thanks of this R. A. Chapter are due and are hereby tendered to our Rev. brother, Dr. P. P. Atwell for his very interesting and appropriate masonic Address delivered before us this day.

Resolved, That Messrs. A. C. Howard, T. W. Gwinn, and the choir of singers deserve our sincere thanks for their rich treat of vocal and instrumental music, on this solemn and interesting occasion.

Resolved, That the Secretary furnish a copy of these resolutions for publication.

ORATION,

Delivered before the members of Franklin Lodge No. 28, at Danville, Kentucky.

BY BROTHER DAVID G. COWAN.

BRETHREN,

Once more, by favor of Divine Providence, we are permitted to assemble to commemorate the virtues, and testify publicly our veneration for the exalted character of St. John the Baptist, one of our illustrious, departed brethren.

In every age and country in any degree civilized, it has been customary to pay homage and respect to the memory of departed worth at certain stated periods, usually on the anniversary of their entrance into the world. It should not therefore be considered strange or unusual, that the Masonic Fraternity should in common with other christians, evince their regard and veneration for the character of a personage who was one of the most illustrious of the primitive christians and of the patrons of the science of Masonry.

But to very little purpose would it be, if our regard and veneration extended no further, than regularly assembling and moving in public and solemn procession, if we derived no improvement or advantage from it.—It is not for the purpose of paying empty honor to the memory of one, who cannot be benefited by it, but for the purpose of bringing to mind and keeping in remembrance his virtues, good qualities and example, and from these recollections of improving our own conduct by endeavouring to imitate, as nearly as our frail natures are capable, the example set before us.

It has uniformly been observed, that bringing frequently in review to the minds of men the characters of those who have performed illustrious and praiseworthy deeds and possessed exalted virtue, has a tendency to inspire virtuous emotions, and a disposition to imitate the example set before their eyes. The true aim and design therefore of celebrations such as the present, is to receive improvement and instruction; and with such views I hope we are now assembled. Well might it be said by the world, that our celebrations consisted of vain pageantry and empty show, if such were not our motives.

The institution of masonry, being one which has always preserved its secrets from an inquisitive world, has often been charged with entertaining principles and views, abhorrent to the feelings of every genuine Mason and upright man, and for the purpose of removing prejudices and erroneous impressions Masons have frequently made no scruple to declare publicly to the world the governing principles, aim, and object of their institution.

On a former occasion of the present kind, when it was your pleasure that I should address you, I endeavored to set forth some of those governing principles and the advantages attendant upon a strict adherence to them in the discharge of the various duties required at our hands. I shall therefore on the present occasion confine my remarks, principally, to the notice of some of those particulars in which we as masons may come short of duty.

The duties which masons are bound to discharge may be divided into three classes; those due from us as created and dependent beings to the supreme Grand Master of the universe, our creator, preserver, and bountiful benefactor; to our fellow men as members of the same great family of created beings; and to ourselves.

As created rational beings, we are unquestionably bound to comply in all things with the will and commands of the great creator; and, such has been the goodness of our Divine Grand Master and Governor, that, he has not left us to grope in the darkness and fallibility of our reason, to ascertain what is his will and commands, but has been pleased to reveal the same to us in the sacred volume before us.

We are also enabled, by a proper exercise of our faculties of reason, with which he has been pleased to endow us, and by which we are distinguished above the rest of created beings, to ascertain and understand some of the most prominent of our duties towards him. We cannot therefore plead ignorance as an excuse for the neglect of duty, as the path is plainly pointed out to us, but are inexcusable for any neglect or non-performance.

Among the great duties which we owe to God is reverence for his great, mighty and terrible name: to implore his benediction upon all our laudable undertakings; and to esteem him as the chief good, whence all earthly comforts flow. These are duties which all men, as created and dependent beings, are bound to observe; They are duties which we as masons are specially charged to inculcate. How lamentably then are we, as masons, as members of an ancient and virtuous institution, whose principles and precepts accord fully with the revealed word of God, and which we profess to follow, deficient in duty. Many of us frequently so far forget the reverence and respect due to our creator as to take his sacred name in vain upon light and trivial occasions, descending to the reprehensible and vulgar practice of profane swearing. This is a habit degrading to the character of a well-born gentleman and much more so to the character of a mason. It is a habit which often grows upon us imperceptibly to such a degree, that we frequently violate the express command of the Creator and precepts of Masonry, unconsciously. This is a habit not only vicious in itself but it gives cause to our fellow men, not masons, to deride our institution; and the pious christian can hardly be made to believe we pay any regard to the precepts of the Sacred Volume, when they see one of its express commands daily and habitually violated and disregarded.

We are deficient in other respects in duty to our great Creator and Supreme Grand Master. We are not at all times sufficiently conscious of our dependence upon him. The precepts of masonry, which we profess to follow, direct us to implore the aid and benediction of almighty God in all our laudable and praiseworthy undertakings. The very forms prevalent among masons, which have been used and handed down to us from time immemorial, prove conclusively that our ancient brethren were sensible and negligent of their duties in this respect. The whole life of St. John the Evangelist of nearly one hundred years, is an example of strict adherence to duty which we should always endeavor to follow. This venerable saint, while high in office in the primitive Christian Church, of which he was one of the brightest ornaments, took upon himself the superintendence and government of the institution, promoting the interest and prosperity of the same during the remainder of his long life, thereby evincing to the church of which he was a member and to the world at large, that he deemed the institution not hostile to, nor incompatible with, the precepts of the Christian Church, and of sufficient importance to warrant the greatest and most distinguished individuals in devoting a portion of their time to promote its prosperity.

The duties of masons to their fellow men are various. One grand object of masonry being the promotion of the cause of virtue, morality and benevolence, of the happiness of the whole human family; as a mean to attain those objects, she enjoins upon her members brotherly love, relief to their distresses of others their fellow men, and endeavors to induce all mankind to live together in peace and harmony as one great family, performing all duties that may be due from and owing to each according to their several stations and relations in which they may stand to each other while travelling the rugged path of life. The society of masons has this common object in view wherever dispersed around the globe. We as masons are bound not only to be moral and correct in our individual deportment, but it is our indispensable duty, whenever we see our brother going astray, to point out to him the course he should pursue, to give him friendly admonition and advice of the danger into which he may run, and, if necessary to reclaim him, reprove him, not with harshness and asperity, but in the temper and spirit of our distinguished and learned brother Paul, when he says, "yet count him not as an enemy but admonish him as a brother."

In this part of the duty of masons I fear many of us are deficient. We often fail to advise or admonish a brother of his foibles, imperfections, or vices, through fear of giving him offence; but this should not deter us from constant attention to this duty. We should bear in mind, that it is the duty of our brother to receive advice or admonition in the spirit in which it is given, as the effusions of a heart solicitous for his welfare and happiness. We should not suffer a proud and haughty spirit to bear away and call into action the angry and turbulent passions of our nature, which the principles of our institution teach us to subdue and keep within salutary and proper restraint.

I feel confident that if this duty of Masons was steadily and invariably adhered to, the enemies of the institution would much less frequently have cause to reproach us with the irregular or improper conduct of individuals of the order. It is highly necessary that we be strict and faithful in the discharge of this duty, lest improper habits be formed, and the observation of every one will bear testimony to the extreme difficulty of correcting or abandoning a confirmed habit. We are all so much the creatures of habit, that we should be constantly on the alert to check improper habits or propensities in their incipient state, lest they become confirmed, and we be compelled to resort to the last resource and exclude from the society a brother, who, by timely admonition and advice, might have continued in the path of virtue and a useful member of society. Those among us who have been blessed with opportunities of improvement, and whose acquirements and standing render them conspicuous among the brethren, should be careful and circumspect in all their conduct and deportment, as they are the persons looked up to by the less informed brethren as models and examples by which to regulate their conduct.

The institution of Masonry directs its votaries to live in peace and harmony with each other and if possible with all the world. We should therefore regulate our conduct in such a manner as to avoid giving offence. Masons are however no more than men, subject to the same passions and propensities as other men, and differences may take place among them, which, if attended to promptly by the elder and more experienced of the craft, may be easily healed by proper explanation or advice, but which, if permitted to remain unnoticed, might ripen into fixed and unalterable enmity. It is therefore the province of masons when informed of such a case, as brethren, as members of the same great masonic family, to enquire into, and if possible remove, the cause of such unfortunate difference, and see that strict and impartial justice be rendered to each brother.

I will here pause and answer one objection made against the institution of masonry. It is said, that, inasmuch as Masons are so invariably friendly to each other at all times and in every place, the design of the institution is hostile to or incompatible with the interests of the rest of the community; that their connection is of such a nature, as would induce them to disregard or sacrifice the interest of their fellow-citizens to advance the interest of one of the brotherhood.

The very existence of this objection I consider a high encomium upon the institution, as it shews that the precepts of masonry have been so well attended by its members, as to produce an union, harmony, and peace among them, plainly perceptible to the rest of the community.

But, for myself and the institution, I do most unequivocally deny, that there is any thing in masonry which would lead or induce its members to do the least injustice to any fellow mortal in any case whatever. On the contrary it is the express and positive command of masonry, that its members should act upon the square to all men, doing unto them as they would wish done to themselves, demeaning themselves as quiet and peaceable citizens, true to their government, just to their country, obedient to its laws.—Masons will never interfere to obstruct or prevent the due execution of the laws against any of their brethren who may have rendered themselves amenable thereto. The concord, harmony, and peace subsisting among masons, are the result of mutual trust and confidence in each other, which has never been found to exist in so eminent a degree among any set of men associated for a wicked or improper purpose. The want of confidence among such soon breaks them to pieces.

We find among the members of the human family a great variety of dispositions and tempers of mind, and masons are not exempt from those peculiarities. There are tempers impatient of control or contradiction; and fortunately the precepts of masonry, when correctly understood and followed, will tend to correct and improve such tempers. Masons are charged to exercise courtesy and affability to each other, to treat the opinions of each other with deference and respect. They will never condemn nor ridicule opinions advanced by a brother although conceived manifestly wrong, but treat them with forbearance, and endeavor rather to convince him of his error without mortification to his feelings. A contrary course might tend to produce asperity, which is at all times forbidden. From this source the harmony and peace subsisting among us may be interrupted, if the injunctions of the institution be not strictly adhered to.

From habitual attention to and practice of the precepts of masonry in this particular, a mason improves in social intercourse and acquires power habitually to restrain and keep within proper bounds an unruly or unfortunate temper, and thence be able to derive and enjoy that calm serenity and tranquillity of mind which he may not otherwise have attained.

Almighty God has been pleased, for wise and beneficent purposes, to implant in our breasts feelings of sympathy, philanthropy, and benevolence towards our fellow men. One object of our institution is to improve and cultivate those heaven-born feelings, productive of deeds which the generous, humane, and philanthropic mason reflects upon with pleasure and heartfelt satisfaction.

The exercise of genuine charity is a mean by which we may acknowledge the goodness and bounty of Providence to ourselves, in the relief afforded to his suffering creatures, and is in the power of every one, for the tear of genuine sympathy let fall to the distresses of a fellow mortal by him who has nought else to give, is as good and sufficient a discharge in Heaven's chancery, of the obligation upon us all, as the splendid donation of the possessor of thousands,

Care should be taken that our sympathies do not become dull by being familiarized to the calls of distress unrelieved. We shall be enabled, by the course suggested, always to enjoy that satisfaction, tranquillity, and peace of mind, which are the result of a conscious discharge of duty—a duty, the discharge of which affords to the truly charitable and benevolent heart more exquisite satisfaction and pleasure than is to be derived from any other source. We should then avoid every thing which might tend to render those emotions dull and our enjoyments less.

But due care and attention should be paid to discriminate between the deserving applicant and the imposter, the vile leach, who would take advantage of your generous sympathies for distress, either feigned or the consequence of vice or extravagance.

Although a mason may extend his charities to the alleviation of the immediate wants of suffering humanity from whatever cause it may have arisen, yet he should not afford the means to continue in vicious or extravagant habits. A mason's charity may be exercised in various modes other than mere donation of money, equally useful and praiseworthy. The friendless stranger ignorant of our habits, manners, and customs, may stand much more in need of advice in pointing out and recommending the course he should pursue to acquire the means of honorable subsistence, than of mere pecuniary assistance.

Masonry enjoins upon its members, as due to themselves, to the virtuous institution of which they are members, to lead temperate and regular lives. They are directed to subdue the passions and restrain every unfortunate propensity, permitting no interference with the discharge of known duty. Of all the imperfections or vices to which frail mortals are subject, intemperance is probably the most baneful, producing debasement of intellect and rendering us less capable of filling the several stations assigned us with propriety. A habit of this kind, once acquired, grows and increases in strength to such a degree, as to be seldom overcome. It is a vice which excites and calls up without control the most hateful passions of our nature, and not unfrequently leads to some unfortunate catastrophe. Man alone of all God's creation degrades himself below the station assigned him by his creator, abandoning or destroying reason, that peculiar characteristic by which he is pre-eminently distinguished above the rest of created beings, rendering himself an object of pity and contempt to every beholder. What can excite more pity and regret in the breast of the compassionate, than the sight of a man, possessed of sensibility of heart and refinement of feeling, and every way calculated to be a useful citizen and an ornament to society, a victim to intemperance! Such instances not unfrequently occur. Let us therefore labor diligently in our several stations, keeping always in view as models for example the characters of those great and illustrious masons who have preceded us to the mansions of eternal bliss. Let our whole conduct and deportment be such as may convince the world of the benign influence of masonry, and show that we are masons, not in name only, but in spirit and in truth, shewing by your quiet and peaceable deportment as citizens, by your love to each other, your upright, correct, and honorable deportment in the world, by doing unto others as you wish them to do unto you, by neglecting no opportunity of being serviceable to your fellow creatures, that masonry is something more than a name. By a steady course of this kind we shall stop the mouths of all the enemies and opposers of the institution.

Of all those persons who have not been favorable to the institution of masonry, the female sex would be the least inclined to oppose it, were they correctly informed of its principles and precepts in regard to themselves. Although they do not participate in the immediate labors of the Lodge, being already endowed by Divine Providence with feelings more exquisite, sympathies more tender, they are peculiarly fitted and disposed to acts of kindness, charity and benevolence; they need none of those inducements of excitements of masonry, which are necessary and proper for rough and more unfeeling man.

We love the breast, that kindly feels
The griefs which mortals know;
We love the lip, whose accent heals
The wounds of tearful woe.

The eye, that beams with pity's gem,
Is bright to every view;
Its lustre shades the diadem,
Or ruby's sparkling hue.

The form that flies to misery's aid,
To dry the Orphan's tear,
Is grace combined with ease displayed
Unrivalled by tempeer.

Woman! while these unite in thee,
We own thy magic still,
And every heart tho' proudly free,
Is vanquished at thy will.

This lovelier part of creation are never forgotten by a mason in the Lodge. No inconsiderable part of his labor is intended for their safety, welfare, and happiness. And it is no small consolation to a mason, while travelling the rugged path of life, to reflect—that, should it be the will of Providence to remove him from the guardianship and protection of those to whom he is connected by the dearest and most tender ties, he still leaves behind him a society of honorable men, who are bound by no ordinary ties to watch over, guard, and protect them from harm.

But, brethren, as all our labors here below are but preparatory to our admission into the celestial Grand Lodge, may we all, when our labors here are ended, have made such a proficiency as to be found worthy and qualified to gain admission into the presence of the Grand Council of Heaven, there to reap and enjoy the fruits and rewards of a well spent life, in a happy and glorious immortality!

A GOOD RETORT.—When the Constitution was at Malta, in 183—, a portion of her officers attended a ball given by the Governor at that place; which, by the way, was the residence of the Grand Master of the famed Knights of Malta. During the evening, as one of the officers was conversing with a lady of the place, a very forlorn, but, nevertheless, what ladies would call a splendid looking officer, in a scarlet uniform of the English army, passed by. 'Oh!' says the lady, 'do introduce me to that splendid man.' It happened our officer was acquainted with him, so he crossed over and made known the lady's wishes. Upon hearing them, our would-be Brummel drew himself up to his full extent, and muttered in the drawing tones of fashionable parlance. 'Ah! indeed! trot her out! trot her out! at the same time settling down his cravat and putting on a most killing attitude. Of course after such an answer, the American officer ascertained the lady's wishes before the introduction. 'Never mind, never mind,' says she, 'show him here.' This the officer was doing; and as he approached with the exquisite, the lady putting up her eye to his, and surveying the creature from top to toe, at the same time motioning back with her hand, exclaimed: 'Ah! ha! he w-o-o-t do—he w-o-o-t do! trot him back! trot him back!'

POETRY.

There is a beauty, and a charm in poetry: It coincides with the higher principles of our nature, and ennobles the mind by the exhibition of sublime conceptions. It is the precursor of philosophy, and the intimate companion of truth. It is the language of the soul, and is spoken throughout the dominion of nature. We can read it in the stars and measure its metrical feet in the harmony of celestial scenery. We can feel its potency in the mountain solitude, and hear its voice in the stillness of nature's wilderness. The roar of the foaming cataract can be in unison with the loudest note of the boldest heart, and the undisturbed quiet of the domestic circle harmonize with the emotions of the most timid mind, for there is poetry there. We are led by its syren voice to do homage at the shrine of greatness, and directed to look to the far distant pinnacle where she lights the torch of immortal fame. The sympathies and tender sensibilities of man are among his noblest attributes, and the poet leaving the enchanting appearance of external nature looks within his own bosom and finds the intellectual lever that can move the world—by the application of his genius can he tune the harp, and with language strike the chord that will vibrate as long as truth shall live, for should it be "crushed to earth it will rise again." He must hold communion with his own feelings, affections, and desires as well as converse with the laws that rule, and the rich variety, that diversifies the surrounding universe; and the more intimate that communion, the more pathetic the poetry, and the freer that conference the more enchanting the diction, for it is but the transcript of nature in her various forms. Could we converse according to the inspiration of passion, we should do it in the language of poetry. When man was in a primeval state, and white robed innocence was the guardian spirit there could have been no language but that of poetry—all was prompted by feeling—all was extatic—from the centre to the circumference of Eden's garden no discordant note was heard to disturb the harmony of man's rich inheritance. The warbling of the running brook—the carol of the feathered songster—and the roaring base of the potent yet harmless quadruped, could carry a trio without disturbing the tranquillity of the lovely scene. And could the lords of that little Paradise converse with less sensibility than the inferior orders of creation?—Whence could they have derived their language, and what could it have been but the echo of nature? Even the conference between Eve and the serpent must have been in the sublime strains of poetry, gentle yet persuasive. But when the die was cast, and all those pleasures were about to be hid from her enraptured vision, the deepest passion of the soul was excited to the highest pitch, and she burst forth in another metre, noble, wild, and almost frantic. And

"Must I leave thee Paradise?—thus leave
Thee native soil, these happy walks and shades,
Fit haunt of Gods?"

And even Milton's thoughts "in a fine phrenzy rolling" could scarce embody forth the workings of her grief so fierce, so uncontrolled. Again the wild woods of America with all their beauty and loveliness, were the companion of the red man—their sacredness was never disturbed by the loud hilarity around their watchfires, for the wilderness inspired, and the mountain freely echoed back the joyful strain. The haughty chieftain, with all the dignity of nature's nobility could touch the heart by the melting sweetness of his Eloquence.

The shrill but exciting war whoop meets with a response in every savage breast, while it speaks volumes to the timid enemy. A few whiffs from the pipe of peace is as effectual in staying the tide of war as the long negotiated, and systematically elaborated treaties of more civilized nations.

We have said that poetry was the intimate companion of truth, and although we live in a matter of fact world and cannot continually float in the elevated regions of an enchanting fancy, yet they are not antagonistic, but mutually unite in forming the character, refining the sentiments, and correcting the taste; and where they do not unite, the mind either plods over every day's dull scenes, or revels amid airy nothings without the intrusion of the disappointments that agitate society. The one is below the dignity of man—and would place him on a level with the brute, the other would elevate him beyond the confines of his destined sphere of action and assimilate him to the celestial intelligencies. The great chain of animated creation proceeding downward with no disconnected and unequal links from the Uncreated himself, requires that man, to preserve his order should be allied in spirit to the Heavens, and in body to the earth. His corporeal system is brought into being—performs like operations—is sustained and decays in the same manner as the brute. But its tenant reflects the bright image of Deity—acts in a higher function—feeds on richer food—and never dies. The one derives enjoyment from sense alone—the other has an inexhaustible fountain of intrinsic pleasure. And the poet whose descriptions are not according to nature, whose ideal forms are contradicted by the experience of the senses, cannot communicate pleasure to the mind, that sees the beauty, and feels the force of truth.

ENGLAND'S HEIR APPARENT,

The Disciples of Democritus have had no richer treat in the way of provocatives to risibility, than the minute particulars given in the English papers of the circumstances attending the recent accession to the royal family. Mighty as we must admit the power of woman to be, and loyally submissive as we are to her sweet sway, we are in the habit here in the wild west of conceding the flowery field of the affections as her empire, while we take upon ourselves the rougher duties of political life; and consequently the connexion of crown and coronets, sceptre and sweetmeats, regal pomp and red petticoats, is to us neither more or less than laughable: but added to this we have the spectacle of a great and grave nation in ecstasies at the unique shape of the cradle of the infant Adelaide. But why should we laugh. There is a dark side to every picture. The wise can never rejoice without trembling at the birth of any human being, much less when that being is the heir apparent of a throne, and when that throne is tossed by the restless moving of a people upon whose necks it is a grievous burden. So at least thought an old Chartist of most benevolent feelings and some foresight, with whom we had connexion yesterday through a mental magnetic channel which we cannot describe. He muttered as follows:

A child is born, and England's towers
Peal forth a welcome on the air
That else is vocal made for hours
With cries of famishing despair.
The royal mother's couch to spread
The poor have paid their only bed.

Another to the royal brood
Of princely drones is added now,
Another mouth to fill with food
Earned by the Subject's reeking brow,
Aye! from the mouth of hunger torn
To glut the high and noble born.

A Princess born! and gaudy hues
Bedeck the spires of town and tide;
And now a mighty nation views
The suckling girl with loyal pride!
O how it gilds oppression's chain
This glory of a woman's reign!

The condescending Queen has said
(To show for art her favor thus)

Her infant's cradle must be made
In fashion like the Nautilus.
O might she learn like it to ride
Nor lift the lofty sail of pride!

O might she, when the storm shall come
Which soon on tyranny shall pour,
But find a safe and quiet home
Upon some far, unshaken shore,
Or sinking from the scene of strife
Repose unknown in humble life.

THE GATHERER.

NIGHT.

Let any one who is fond of sublime emotions, take his hat and staff, and climb a hill, by a moonlight midnight. There is a part of that dust of earth, which gathers sadly upon our spirits during our daily commune with this sordid world, cast off at every step.—The very act of climbing has something ennobling in it, and the clearer air we breathe, the elevation we attain, all gives the mind a sensation of power and lightness, as if it had partly shaken off the load of clay that weighs it down to the ground. But still more when with solitude—the deep solitude of the night—we rise up high above the sleeping world; with the bright stars for our only companions, and the calm moon for our only light—when we look through the profound space, and see it peopled by never ending orbs—when we gaze round the extended horizon and see the power of God on every side—then the immortal triumphs over the mortal, and we feel our better being within us.—The cares, the sorrows, the anxieties of earth seems as dust in the balance weighed with mightier things; and the greatest earthly ambition that ever conquered worlds and wept for more, may feel itself humiliated to the dust in the presence of silence and solitude, and space and millions of eternal suns.

A Fancy Sketch.—How calmly he sleeps. A blossom of two soft summers—innocent and pure; the pillow is not fairer than that white brow; the first rose of spring time is not more delicately tinted than that round, transparent cheek. How beautiful to gaze upon; those glossy ringlets lie not more still than is the peace of the young heart within. Not a shadow has yet broken the morning sunlight of existence" and a calm as of angels rests softly upon the infant's path.—"Tis beautiful indeed; what heart can see the sleeping babe and not feel a calming purifying emotion steal over the troubled waters of the spirit. And the young mother; with what a blushing pride does she pause over the cradle of her sleeping child. Ah! that kiss—so fervent, so sweet so full of love—so—
B-a-a-a a-a-a! O-o-o-o-o-o-o-a-a!

A hem! Mrs. Smith, hadn't you better call the nurse and let her take the child out.—Richmond Star.

Female education.—The Boston Transcript talks like a father about educating young ladies. Only hear him:

"This bringing up daughters to think of nothing but dress, and finery, and balls, and parties, and beaux, is not discharging the duties of a mother who wishes the welfare of her children. Send them into the kitchen. Teach them to wash, and to cook, and to scour. It won't hurt them; it will do them good, both mentally and physically. Such duties need not interfere with their lessons in the polite accomplishments of fashionable life, but will make them more active, more healthy, more blooming, more beautiful than ever, apart from the intrinsic value of the qualifications a head of a family in after life."

A gentleman by the name of Stubbs, was found in Philadelphia, on Christmas eve badly—"shot in the neck." We would respectfully caution those who may feel interested, to handle fire arms, very careful on New Year's day, on account of accidents!

Jesse Smith, his wife, and three children were hurried to death, on the 22d inst. at Berkshire, Tioga county.

POPULAR TALES.

From the London Metropolitan.

THE DUKE OF —; OR, THE FORCE OF CONSCIENCE.

As I was one day riding from Catania to the beautiful village of Freecastagne, in company with Signor L——, of the former place, and his lady, about four miles from Misterbianco, we passed a large, but half ruinous villa, at no great distance from the public road. The lady testified a desire of visiting it, to which Signor L—— replied, "that he supposed she wished to see the blood of the marchesa; a curiosity which," he said, "he was little inclined to gratify, as he liked neither dreadful sights nor horrible tales; it was, besides, getting late, and he by no means approved of going out of his way for the purpose of spoiling his dinner. Hearing this, and perceiving there was some strange story annexed to the house, I joined my vote to that of the signora, so that Signor L—— being fairly in a minority, was obliged to concede the point. We accordingly stopped and knocked at the door; but no one appearing, were about to retire, when a peasant, who happened to pass, told us that it was some time since the custode had been withdrawn from the villa; but that if we were desirous of seeing it, he would procure us the keys from the priest of the neighboring chapel, in whose possession they were now kept. On our accepting his offer, he ran off and returned in twenty minutes with the chaplain, a respectable old man, who held the keys in his hand. After we had exchanged compliments, he told us that the building was fast going to ruin, as none of the family to whom it belonged, that of the Marchese L—— had inhabited it since the cruel death of the marchesa many years before, the particulars of which he supposed we were acquainted with. My companions had heard the story imperfectly related; but the fact being altogether new to me, I earnestly pressed the grey headed priest to favor us with the recital. He replied that it was a long narrative; but that after we had seen the villa, if we would adjourn to his house, and take such refreshment as he could offer, he would endeavor to satisfy our curiosity. Even Signor L——'s wonted phlegm being moved, we gladly accepted the proffered hospitality. The old man turning the key in the rusty lock with some difficulty, and not without assistance, at length set open the heavy portal. The house presented nothing extraordinary in itself, nor indeed any thing that could compensate to Signor L—— for the delay of his dinner. The apartments, as in all houses of Sicilians of rank were numerous and spacious. The furniture was old fashioned, and falling to pieces from age and neglect. Our guide made no remark as he conducted us through a long suite of rooms until he reached a chamber with an alcove. At one end was a portrait of a lovely young woman, about twenty-four years of age, represented in a standing position, fondling a Maltese lap-dog, which she holds in her arms; an air of melancholy is perceptible in her beautiful features. "This is the marchesa, said the old man with a faltering voice; "it seems but yesterday since I conversed with her in this very chamber; in that alcove stood the bed in which she was murdered, and there," continued he, trembling violently,—"there is her blood!" pointing to a long dark colored streak, and several large spots visible on the stone floor. I started back, shuddering involuntarily, for I was treading on the very spot he indicated. After contemplating for some time the interesting portrait of the unfortunate marchesa, we retired to the abode of the worthy priest, eager to hear the melancholy story. Having put before us a collation of fruit, with some excellent wine from the Falde di Mont' Etna, he began his recital in the following terms.

"About thirty five years since, the villa you have just visited was inhabited by the Marchesa L—— and her niece. The aunt, who was an elderly lady, had no children, and her husband having died some time before, the family estates had fallen to his nephew, so that the widow had little except her jointure to subsist on, which induced her to fix residence in the country, for the sake of avoiding expense. The niece, who, as you have remarked, was extremely beautiful, attracted the admiration of the Duke of

M——, a nobleman of vast possessions, who, though no longer in the prime of youth, being nearly forty, boasted of a person still remarkably handsome, and indeed looked several years less than his real age.—He came frequently to the villa, and it appeared that his attentions were by no means displeasing to the younger lady, whilst his consequence and influence in the neighborhood rendered him also a welcome visitor to the elder: he had besides, been acquainted with the family ever since his childhood. The duke had a suit of importance in Palermo, and his affairs had, for a long time, rendered his presence necessary in that capital; but, unable to separate himself from the society of the younger marchioness, he put off his departure from week to week, and from month to month until his legal advisers sent word that the cause would be immediately lost, unless he came himself to support it. At length, he reluctantly tore himself away from the object of his affection, promising that his stay should not exceed three or four weeks. As many months passed, but his affairs still detained him; the delay excited no suspicion in the lady, as his letters were filled with the warmest protestations of unalterable affection.

"It happened one day, towards evening, that a most violent tempest took place; the rain descended in torrents—the thunder and lightning were incessant.—The bells of the adjacent chapel were set ringing in order to implore a cessation of the storm. The terrified ladies were praying in the saloon, surrounded by their domestics, when a loud and continued rapping was heard at the door; it proved to be a gentleman travelling in a lettiga, who requested the favor of shelter until the violence of the weather abated; this the marchesa readily accorded, and ordered the traveller to be shown into a room on the ground-floor, where he might remain as long as he thought necessary. But when, on the night coming on, and the storm continuing, the stranger made known that he was the Advocate of S—— of Catania, on his way thither from Palermo, and that he had taken the road of Misbianco, in order to visit his uncle, a canon, who resided there, the ladies to whom his relation was well known, immediately sent word, that as there appeared no likelihood of the tempest abating for the present, they should be glad of his company to supper, and that he might subsequently pass the night in the apartment he then occupied, and proceed to Misbianco in the morning.—The invitation was gladly accepted. Supper was served. The ladies found their guest, who was a handsome young man of about twenty-five, a very agreeable companion; whilst he, for his part, was much struck by the captivating beauty of the younger marchesa. The conversation, as usual between persons almost perfect strangers, ran on indifferent topics for a time, until the younger lady, anxious to obtain some information respecting the duke from a quarter likely to be impartial, asked the stranger, as if casually, what detained the duke, their neighbor, so long in Palermo; she supposed he found the gaiety and bustle of the capital an agreeable change of the sameness and dullness of the country. The guest replied in the same tone, that he had heard that business had taken him to Palermo. "And keeps him there still?" inquired the lady; "it doubtless is of much importance." "As for his law affairs," rejoined the advocate, "I know little of them; I believe it is business of a very different nature which detains him; the lately arrived prima donna has, they say, made sad havoc with his heart." The marchesa turned pale, and bit her lip with jealousy and vexation, as the young man continued. "I am told she is under his protection, so M—— is likely to be long deprived of the presence of its duke." In vain the young lady endeavored to repress her mortification, affecting indifference and even gaiety. An experienced eye would soon have detected the emotions with which she was agitated.—Her aunt noticed her confusion, and inquired the cause, but received an evasive reply. In the mean time the weather, which had grown milder, suddenly broke out with increased violence, and the conversation was arrested by a flash of vivid lightning, followed by a clap of thunder appallingly loud, and a noise as if the whole fabric were shaken by an earthquake, and was falling to the ground. The servants came running in great consternation to say that one of the wings of the building had been struck by lightning.—The aunt rose from her seat in alarm; the niece within whose bosom raged a tempest still more furious than that without, took the opportunity of giving vent to the emotions with which she was convulsed; she tore her hair, rent her dress, and went into violent hysterics. When she was removed to her own apartment, the young lawyer retired, expressing his sorrow for the state of the lady, and wondering at the extraordinary effects of her alarm. In the morning he took leave of the aunt, who apologized for her niece being invisible, saying, that she had not yet recovered from the consequences of her terror on the preceding evening. The advocate promised to call on his way from Misterbianco, where he intended spending a few days with his uncle. But he did not wait for his return to Catania, to find the road back to the villa; for the very next day the canon came to thank the ladies for their kindness to his nephew, whom he, of course, brought with him. The younger marchesa was much recovered, and received the attentions of the advocate with apparent satisfaction; whilst he, in turn, became every moment more captivated by the beauty of the lady.—Instead of three days' stay at Misterbianco, he remained that number of weeks, and was a daily and welcome visitor at the villa. At the end of that period, it appeared that pride had come to the assistance of the young lady, or that the youth and amiable qualities of Don G——, the advocate, had made an impression on her heart; forgetting her noble but unfaithful lover, she became the bride of the young lawyer, who was a person of considerable property, and not dependent on his profession for support. The aunt made an express proviso that she should not be deprived of her niece's society, but that they should reside with her at the villa; Dona G—— going to Catania to transact his affairs as occasion might require.

"This agreement did not prevent Don G—— taking his bride immediately after their union to Catania for the purpose of introducing her to his relations; but their stay in that city was shorter than they had at first intended. The lady, a person of family and distinction, was invited to all the fetes and parties given by the nobility; whilst the husband, not enjoying a similar advantage, according to their ridiculous etiquette, who was not admitted into their society: an exclusion mortifying alike to both, who disgusted by this absurdity, soon came to the resolution of returning to their villa at Misterbianco, which was only a few miles distant from Catania.

"The marriage had been settled and took place so suddenly, that the confidential servant of the duke, left for the purpose of transmitting his letters to the marchesa, had only time to apprise his master that the banns had been already published, and that the marriage would take place before the receipt of the letter. On receiving this unexpected intelligence, the duke threw aside all concern for his affairs, and returned without the loss of a moment to Misterbianco. His arrival occasioned no little apprehension with the lady; but for several days she neither saw nor heard from him. At length, one morning, a polite note was left to the villa; it was from the duke, requesting the company of Don G—— and his lady to a fete, given to celebrate his return to the country. The marchesa testified some repugnance to accept the invitation, but her husband observed, that after the uncivil treatment he had received in Catania, it would be impolite towards the duke, who was superior to the prejudices of the Catanese nobles, to decline availing themselves of his attention. In fact, they went, and were both received with marked attention by the duke, who took an opportunity during the evening of whispering to the marchesa, in a sarcastic tone, that she had done well to exchange a nobleman for an advocate; to which the lady replied, with a similar expression, that an advocate was at least a more respectable person than an actress. The duke colored at the retort, but made no reply at the time. Some time after, renewing the conversation, he inquired the name of the person from whom she had received this information; the marchesa told him that every thing being now finished between them, it would be prudent, on both sides, to bury the past in oblivion, a proposal in which the duke seemed to acquiesce with some reluctance. The party at length broke up, and Don G—— and his lady returned to the villa, both contented with the events of the evening; Don G——, on account of the distinction shown to him by their noble host; and his wife, because her apprehensions of the duke's re-sentiment and ill-will were much diminished. Don G—— continued to attend to his affairs in Catania, and was sometimes detained there several days in succession. During one of these temporary absences, a note was brought to the marchesa, requesting her to lose no time in proceeding to Catania, as her husband was prevented from returning home, and wished to see her immediately. On her arrival she was cruelly shocked to find him in prison! he had been arrested on a charge of falsifying legal documents, and was next morning to be removed to Palermo, for the purpose of having the matter duly examined into. Vexed, annoyed as he was at this calumnious accusation, conscious of his innocence, he apprehended no danger from it, nor any more inconvenience than a forced journey to Palermo, and a temporary absence from his wife; still he was anxious to ascertain from what quarter the insidious blow had proceeded. He, therefore, recommended her to remain quiet and composed in the country, without entertaining any doubt of his ultimate honorable acquittal from the disgraceful charge. Three or four weeks, at most, would, he said, restore him to his home. He was transferred to Palermo.—Thrice the time he computed sufficient to have insured his liberation had passed, and he still languished in a dungeon; not so much as having been brought into court for a hearing! In vain he petitioned the judges and the sovereign—his supplications were unheeded or rejected: in the meantime he was suffering much in his pecuniary interests from the large sums he found it necessary to lavish on the heads and subalterns of the tribunal. He was sure, he said in his letters to the marchesa, that he had some powerful enemy unknown to him, and he began to fear that without the protection of some person of influence at court, he might remain for years, perhaps for life, in a prison; he recalled to her memory the kindness and professions of the Duke of M——, and recommended her earnestly to apply to him in this emergency. The necessity of the same measure also occurred to his wife, but for a different reason, for she suspected the duke to be the secret enemy, of whose ill offices her unfortunate husband complained. After much deliberation she resolved to throw herself on the generosity of her former lover. On presenting herself at his residence, she was received with much affectation of politeness. The duke declared himself ignorant of the cause of her husband's prolonged imprisonment, but dwelt on the imprudence of her having despised the affection of a powerful nobleman for a plebeian husband, unable to protect himself. He, notwithstanding undertook to procure the release of Don G—— without delay, but on one sole condition—shocking to the ears of a virtuous mind. The lady replied with spirit, that she had taking Don G—— because she esteemed and loved him; that she would not purchase his release on the terms proposed by the duke; but would trust to the mercy of Heaven, and the justice of her sovereign, to which she was resolved to apply. She then left the house, the duke making no effort to detain her, and she returned home. Still that nobleman, whose passion was increased by his repulse, did not despair of bringing her to his own terms. Don G——, in the meantime, wrote again, saying that he had finally succeeded in obtaining an audience, but so numerous were the suborned witnesses, and so prejudiced the judges against him, that he began to despair of ever proving his innocence. His fortune was fast melting away, from the vast bribes he found himself under the necessity of lavishing on his venal judges, and other concomitant expenses. He again pressed her to entreat the duke in his favor. On the receipt of these afflicting tidings, the health of the marchesa began to give way. The duke continued to visit at the villa, and to intrude himself on her, whenever he had an opportunity; nor as a friend of the family, and of her aunt, was it in her power always to refuse him admittance. He pretended that he had done much for her husband, and would do more, but that it depended on herself to serve him effectually, and to procure his release. He spared neither pains nor expense to corrupt the domestics, and it was from her own maid that he had ascertained that it was from Don G—— that the marchesa had obtained her information respecting the opera singer.

MISCELLANY.

TOUGH TRIPE.

A sort of original character of a servant girl, belonging to this neighborhood, engaged as dairy maid at Craignish, in Argylshire, last summer, and the first night after going home, as the family had supped on tripe before she could get her work in the byre bro't to a close, Kate was told by her mistress that she would find her share in a pot on the fire. Impelled by a pretty sharp appetite, which the fresh air of the Highlands had imparted, Kate approached one of the two pots on the fire, carrying it off into a corner, and then and there commenced an attack on what she conceived to be about a square yard of tripe. She found it darkish in the color, and about the toughest piece of provender which had ever encountered her ivory, but as she was young and blate, and, moreover, had never before tasted tripe, she felt ashamed to reject that of which she had been told all the family had partaken, and, therefore, tore away at it, now with her teeth, now her hands, and, at times, breaking it over her knees, till she managed to bolt the whole of it; inwardly ejaculating "it was mair like the hide, than the inside of any beast ever she saw."

All night her horrible night-mare moans so loudly indicated that Kate's digestive powers were being severely tested, that the guid wife cannily administered a bead of the small-still aqua to master the tripe. It was found next morning, when the household assembled at breakfast, that Kate had taken the wrong pot from the fire, and had swallowed the dish clout, which had been left in the water to wash the dishes! Kate thinking it was a trick, her blood got up, and she seized an old clout, with which she unceremoniously dislocated the shoulder blade of the farmer's eldest son, and shouting as a sort of warcry, that "naeboddy suld make a ropswark o' her stomach," let skelp at all, and sundry, and charged them from one room to another, till she fairly put the whole establishment to rout. A reconciliation was ultimately effected, but till the day she left the house, "the brawniest chiel" among them dared not mention the word "tripe" in Kate's presence.—Ayr Adv.

THE ELSSLER.—The editor of the Richmond Star has had considerable to say about this dancing woman since her visit to Richmond, and, after due consultation with his Ephraim, we presume, pronounces her a humbug. We give his last article on the subject, the concluding part of which, while it does credit alike to his heart and head, is a severe rebuke to those who have filled her pockets with gold, while many a needy child of want was suffering for the crumbs which dropped from their tables.

"She floated about like a fair, but very voluptuous looking spirit, and cut her toes hither and thither, and swayed her body to and fro, in a way which was a caution to all inflammable young gentlemen, grey headed or not. The lovely creatures, who graced the scene, looked on enchanted, and made all bright with their smiles, the vast crowd of men shouted and applauded with all their might, and the beautiful dancing woman, giving them an extra flirt or two which set them off in a perfect agony of delight, made her bow,—the curtain dropped, the dear Fanny, tapping her Wring-your-neck-off, upon the shoulder, said, 'dere, dere is de one thousand dollars almos—now let us go.' But the audience said no, and they shouted, and screamed, and thumped for her to come out, and

At that moment, in an obscure hovel, open in many parts to the cold, biting winds, without fire, alone sits a poor woman, holding to her chilled bosom her sick and dying babe, while upon a rude pallet of straw, lay two shivering little children, her children too. Her eye was heavy with watching, her cheek sunken with hunger and suffering, her heart filled with the very gall and bitterness of life. Still how truly, oh! how truly, answered that heart to the pang of a mother's love, as she gazed into the innocent face of her dying babe; how fast flowed tears from eyes which had known little but weeping and sorrow through many a weary day—how deep and fervent was the prayer which came up from the very fountains of privation and grief. There was no heart near to sympathise, no kind hand to aid, no soft voice to sooth—the physician's healing heart—charity's angel arm, came not to soften the dying moments of her poor babe, and as life flickered and wavered in its fair urn, and the sobs of the mother sounded in that solitary room, as in the agony of her grief she exclaimed, 'a few pence had saved thee to me, my sweet babe,' as the sleepers on the pallet of straw murmured in their uneasy slumbers, 'Mother dear, give me some bread'—as the keen wind came through the crevices, and she clasped the dying child to her bosom, at that moment, a dancing woman a stranger with her wealth of thousands, and her ingots of gold and silver—made her last graceful bow, and took the princely sum which was hers, for a few moments pleasant labor.

As the spectators gave their last shout, the babe's innocent spirit winged its flight to heaven, and the mother gazed in despair upon all that remained to her, of the innocent prattler, whom she so dearly loved.

'Such is life.'

AN UNCOLORED ACCOUNT OF A COLORED DUEL.

A duel between two darkies—a regular built affair, conducted according to the most strict and punctilious provisions of the code of honor, came off one morning last week. The fight took place with pistols, of the most approved fashion, at sunrise, on a small branch of the Metairie road. We do not know what the origin of the difficulty was, except that one of the parties, to use the phrase of one of the spectators, was "crossed in lub by de oder and dat him Dina must hab satisfashun."

We have learned from one who was present at the combat, the particulars, as they transpired. They were substantially as follows:

After having taken their stands, one of the seconds noticed that owing to their position, the sunbeams set his principal a winkin and rolling his eyes. This was a sufficient ground for interfering and he called out to the other second with.

"I say nigga, I put my weto on that possishun.—Its again de rules ob all de cokes ob hona I'be eber seen. De frection ob de sun shines rader too sebere and makes my principal roll him eyes altogeder too mnch."

"Wy, look here, didn't we chuck up a dolla for de choice ob ground, and didn't I get him myself?"

"Yes, I know you did; but den fair play 's a juba and I'se no notion ob seein my fren composed upon and lose all the advantage."

"Well nigga, I'se no notion to; I'se just as good a right to hab no notion as you is, and I sists'on settlin the matter just as we is—and—"

At this juncture a friendly cloud settled the matter at once by stepping between the sun and belligerents. The two, first causes their position and all the little preliminaries being settled, each took his pistol ready cocked from his second. Both manifested a tolerable degree of spunk, although a bluish paleness spread over their cheeks. The second who was to give out the fatal order which might send them both out of this world, now took his ground, Raising his voice he began:

"Gentleman' your time am com'

Both signifies their assent.

'Is you ready? Fiah, one, two, three.

Bang, pop, went both pistols at once one ball raising a dust in the middle of the road, while the other took a slantindicular course in among the bystanders, fortunately without hitting any one. It was now time to interpose, and one of their seconds set himself about it. After a little conversation the challenged darkey stepped forward and said to his antagonist,

'Nigga, is you satisfied?'

'Yes.'

'So is I, and I'se glad to get off so. Next time dey catches this nigga out on such a foolish exhibition as dis, dey hab to fetch me, dat will for sartin.'

'Dem's my sentiments, exactly,' retorted the other. 'When your mortal instrument of death went off, I declare I th'ot I was a gone child: but I'se so happy now gosh, let's shake hands and go back to our abocations.'

In five minutes time all hands—enemies, friends, darkies, whites, and all—were on the road home to work, perfectly satisfied with the sports of the morning.—N. O. Pic.

A GRAVE MATTER.—During the Canadian difficulties, some two or three years since, our readers will recollect that an outrage was committed by certain individuals belonging to the British authorities, in the destruction of the Steam Boat Caroline while in our waters, and the murder of one or more of our citizens. Remonstrance was made to this act by our government, and the affair has since been sleeping quietly in the arms of the British ministry, who we believe, feel no disposition to wake the matter up. Some time after this outrage, the Grand Jury of Niagara, found true bills for murder and arson, against those concerned; and on such a bill a man by the name of M'Leod, has been arrested on our own territory, and after an examination has been committed for trial, for the crimes of murder and arson. These we believe are the facts of the case. Since the committal of M'Leod the Governor of Canada has laid the subject before the British minister, Mr. Fox; now at Washington; and Mr. Fox has formally demanded the liberation of M'Leod, as a Subject of her Majesty, urging that the act for which M'Leod is confined was an act of the government, which it is pretty evident they mean to justify. Mr. Forsyth, our minister, replies to Mr. Fox, in a calm and dignified manner, and with a firmness, which will call around him every American heart and arm. Mr. Forsyth assumes the ground, that the general government cannot interfere if it had the disposition—that murder and arson have been committed in an independent state,—making the culprit amenable to the laws of that state alone. The affair may now be looked upon as of grave import. If M'Leod is legally tried and convicted, according to our laws, he must suffer the penalty, though fifty British empires should threaten us. Eternal Justice requires it; and American honor demands it. The idea held out by Mr. Fox, that in time of peace, armed ruffians can invade our territory, burn our vessels, and murder our citizens, upon the mere authority of a villainous commandant, is monstrous. Mr. Fox will learn different things before he leaves us; and Sir Knight M'Nab, if we ever catch him will find, that the spurs he earned from his Sovereign in directing these murderers on our frontier, will afford him no protection, if he ever places his foot on it.

We sincerely hope that M'Leod may establish his innocence on his day of trial—both for himself, and the unhappy consequence it may lead to. The rash and premature acts of England in this discreditable affair, have in a measure committed her. England cannot escape from the dilemma in which she has placed herself, with honor. She knighted M'Nab, for the same act, which will hang M'Leod, if it is proven against him. She has justified and rewarded the principal; can she permit in honor, punishment to be inflicted on the accessory? Will our government—dare our government interfere with the execution of a State law? The question at issue involves serious considerations; and although we should in common with the mass of our countrymen, deprecate a collision between the two countries, yet we trust, that no American bosom will respond to inglorious compromise, when the honor of the country calls for ACTION.

A RURAL CEMETRY.—The general consideration that our city has of late bestowed upon this subject, argues so healthful a tone of public sentiment, that we with pleasure seize this opportunity to offer our mite in its favor. Nor can we withhold the expression of our approbation of the very eloquent remarks made a few evenings since upon this matter by the Rev. Drs. Wyckoff and Potter. Their object, in making them was to enlist the energy of the citizens in procuring a lot of ground, which could be tastefully fitted, as an appropriate resting place for the dead. They showed and we think rather conclusively, that Albany is far behind many of her sister Cities in manifesting that complete respect for the dead which both duty and affection prompt. Laurel Hill, Mount Auburn, and even the burial grounds of many of our surrounding villages, Poughkeepsie, &c., were severally pointed to as setting examples which it should be ours to emulate. They showed that from time immemorial, that in proportion as civilization had progressed, the respect for the dead had increased. The rude mound of the barbarian had, by the fostering hand of improvement, become exchanged for the graceful column and the stupendous pyramid; and the graves that were before made only to be forgotten, were now the haunt of the bard, and the resting place of the pilgrim. The gentlemen could not say that Albany had kept pace with this commendable spirit—its burial place, from chilling neglect, had assumed that repulsive appearance which is calculated to repel the reproach both of the relative and the stranger.

At the instigation of Dr. Welch, another reverend gentleman who has taken a great interest in this matter; a large committee was formed, comprising many of our most influential citizens, to take into consideration the practicability of getting not only a suitable and congenial spot, but one consistent with the requirement and means of the city.

On several occasions we have heard it suggested, that Tivola Valley would probably be the situation decided upon. We would most seriously object to choosing a place so near the city. Besides the rapid growth of Albany, whose commercial and manufacturing establishments would before many years encroach upon its sacred limits, it would also by its proximity to the city, become the resort of those who will carry there the hilarity of the Bar Room and the grossness of the debauch. This is a result which it is all desirable should be guarded against. Boston has very judiciously selected her place for depositing the "dust of the loved" at a distance of seven miles from the turmoil of business. This is too far for him to go, who has a wish only to gratify idle and worthless propensities: none proceed there but those who look upon the spot as possessing religious sanctity. We might urge other objections, to selecting the Valley than its nearness, but our limits will not permit. We shall content ourselves by suggesting that at a greater distance, will probably be found situations quite as eligible and far better suited to the kind of cultivation which such a spot requires.

CHANGE.—The Catholic Register and Freemans' Journal (also Catholic) have been united and enlarged, under the title of the New York Freemans' Journal and Catholic Register. These papers have been conducted with ability, and we have every belief that in the consolidation, of the two, that the new paper will lose none of its deserved high character. By the by, en passant, the Protestant Vindicator, would lose nothing by borrowing a little of the spirit of its "Popish" contemporary.

CHURCH ETIQUETTE.—We have been somewhat surprised at a short correspondence, which has recently passed through the press of our city, relative to a certain neglect committed on the part of one of our churches in not supplying an old gentleman and styled himself "a stranger," with a seat. However averse we may be to making comments upon matters of this kind, we still think, that as the subject has already been much "talked about" and is evidently "one of those evils too much practised in this community," without danger of giving great offence, we may thereupon hazard a few remarks. In the first place we do not admire the spirit with which the accusation has been met—we also think that some other replicant would have exerted quite as much influence in allaying the troubled waters. The complaint, which had been publicly made, was, by the Sexton, publicly replied to. Whether on any other occasion he would have been made the prominent organ of the church, we do not pretend to say; nor do we discover any great impropriety in vindicating himself, so far as he is personally implicated; but we nevertheless think the charge of a sufficiently grave nature to warrant a reply from a higher source.

Although we are not aware of the particular merits of the above mentioned case, yet we are free to confess ourselves acquainted with those of a very similar character. In numberless instances—perhaps not in the same church—have we seen persons met with a like repulse. They have not only "passed into the aisle," but through it, without receiving the courtesy desired. One would suppose that members of churches would take an especial gratification in receiving a visitor, whether stranger or not. Acting in accordance with profession we have always believed to be quite consistent with the inestimable privileges of Christianity—besides experience has taught us to think that those men who act consistently are generally good men.

THE LEGISLATURE of this state convened on Tuesday last, in this city. Peter B. Porter, jr. was chosen speaker. Mr. Porter, is an affable business man, and will no doubt wear the honors of his station with credit to himself, and the House. As usual, there were 999 applicants for the offices of door keeper, from all parts of the state—and just 997 of the hungry expectant, returned home, some 50 or 60 dollars mints, in the way of travelling expenses. If our future legislatures would put their faces against these foreign applicants for door-keepers and wood-sawyers, we believe it would be better for all concerned. Those who can afford to come three or four hundred miles for the office are not entitled to it; and those who cannot, certainly should not be encouraged to leave their homes, with so much uncertainty. These petty offices belong to Albany; and should be given to some needy and deserving men among us. There are plenty of such on both sides of party.

NEWSPAPER POSTAGE.—The Richmond Whig contains some severe remarks on the proposition of the post-master general to increase the postage on newspapers 100 per cent. The Whig expresses too much party bitterness, upon a subject which will affect every newspaper in the land. However, the puerile suggestions of the post-master general in this matter, have scarcely elicited a remark from the press; so supremely ridiculous has the proposition been received. The force of the philippic of the Whig is therefore lost.

AMBITION.

Who e'er hath heard Ambition's stirring call
With heart unwakened by its magic tone?
What lowly peasant in his humble stall—
What king exalted on his regal throne?

How oft the bugles' martial blast hath breathed
Gigantic feelings through the warrior's soul,
While—visioned laurels round his temples wreathed—
Fancy led forth to conquer and control.

How oft the statesman's eloquence of fire
Hath flam'd some list'ner with aspirings grand,
Now fain to make a senate feel his ire
Or thunder mandates o'er a wond'ring land.

Ambition! thine 's a wild tumultuous sound,
But musical to man—He feels a God
Then stir within, and deems whole nations bound
To gaze astonished and obey his nod.

From some high throne he'd frown his awful power
Or scathe with sword as on a whirlwind driven,—
A cloud black risen in the sunshine hour—
A meteor's glare amid the calm of even!

Nor crime alone,—Ambition can inspire,
To godlike actions the puissant mind,
Fill the pure bosom with seraphic fire
To shed celestial blessings on mankind.

STANZAS.

BY MRS. E. C. STEDMAN.

"May we ever find in the sympathizing friendship of a congenial soul, compensation for the ills inflicted by a cold and heartless world."

SENTIMENTS OF A FRIEND.

"A cold and heartless world, in sooth, is this!
And he who seeks for pleasure 'mid its throng,
Drinks not at the perennial springs of bliss,
And knows not where true pleasure doth belong:
Oh! earth is all a desert, save the green
When friendship's living streams make glad the scene.

There sheltered from the withering sun of mirth,
'Congenial souls' their mutual healing yield
For thorns which, lie in every path of earth, [shield!
From whose deep wounds, there's no escape nor
And while the balm of sympathy pours forth,
Each deems a friend a Pearl of priceless worth!

He is but poor who makes that wealth his boast
Which 'taketh wings,' and bears itself away—
Who hath when wounded, but his gold at most,
The anguish of the spirit to allay!
And he is rich, tho' earth may deem him poor,
Whose treasure is, a friend, that will endure.

A friend be ours!—to joy when we rejoice—
To weep with us, whene'er 'tis ours to weep;
To cheer the day, with blest affection's voice,
And charm with dreams of kindness e'en our sleep:
May Friendship's prayer commend our souls to God,
And consecrate our home beneath the sod.

CONFIRMATION.

The young are bending low before Thee now,
In the first freshness of their joyous youth;
Time's hand hath never dimmed their beauteous brow,
Nor the world's touch destroyed their spirit's truth.
The loved and lovely! they before Thee bow—
O Father; tear them and be present now.

And here are those o'er whom the blight hath passed,
Who hope, if youth be hope, no more may see;
Who at Thy feet the weary soul have cast,
And given the failing spirit all to Thee.
The gift despise not! as Thy word hath spoken,
Thou wilt not let the bruised reed be broken.

And here are those whoe'er passed the vernal morn,
And reached the evening of their mis-spent days;
Long o'er this wretched world they roved forlorn,
Plucking the sharpest thorns that mark its ways:
In pity hear, forgive their long delay,
The wanderers have returned—Behold, they pray!

THE DYING YEAR.

BY HENRY MORFORD.

A dirge goes past on the sounding blast
As the north wind hurries by,
And the spirit's wail on the sighing gale
Moans through the wintry sky.
Hark! the passing dirge of Time is borne
On the fierce wind cold and drear,
The knell of days that can ne'er return,
The knell of the Dying Year.

It has passed along since the cheerful song
Rung out for its natal day;
O'er earth and sky it has basted by,
Nor paused on its hurried way:
Full many a smile it brought us then,
And the sigh it has left us here;
The hopes and fears of the sons of men
Have passed in the Dying Year.

And many a smile that has shone awhile
On the lips of the young and proud,
Hath flitted away, with the grave and gay,
Like the sunbeam from the cloud.
Glad voices have passed away from earth,
That gave us the Christmas cheer:
Pale sorrow has pulled their hour of mirth—
They have died with the Dying Year.

The fading gleam that Hope's pale beam
Round our path awhile hath shed,
It has passed and gone, and its knell rung on
The dirge of the early dead.
We have heaved the sigh for the loved that sleep,
We have wiped the pearly tear.
And spirits we loved around us keep
The watch of the Dying Year.

Hark! the dirge is rung for the souls that hung
On the hope of early bliss,
In a world more fair they have gathered there—
They were all too bright for this.
They waned as the changing season passed,
With the leaf grew pale and aere,
They sunk 'neath Autumn's chilling blast,
They died with the Dying Year.

Time's tireless wave to the silent grave
Is bearing us ever on,
In the steps to tread of the early dead,
Where the Dying Year hath gone.
Hark! the passing dirge of Time is borne
On the north wind calm and drear—
The knell of days that can ne'er return,
The knell of the Dying Year.

THE MINSTREL'S GRAVE.

If e'er a pure, a sacred tear,
From pity's beaming eye can flow,
'Tis surely when death's stroke severe
Has laid the son of genius low:
Each ardent friend, each former foe,
His bier with precious dew-drops lave,
And mirth assumes the garb of wo,
And weeps upon the minstrel's grave.

The trivial throng, whose fickle praise
His strains sought vainly to engage,
Now mourn too late his slighted lays,
And wet with tears his hallowed page;
The timid maid, the studious sage,
Deplore his fate whom none can save,
And blooming youth, and hoary age,
Sigh sadly o'er the minstrel's grave.

His fondest pride, his magic lyre,
Hung on the laurel must remain,

And none shall dare to wake its fire,
And none shall rouse its strings again;
Save when they breathe a mournful strain,
As passing winds the branches wave,
To tell the thoughtless and the vain,
They wander near a minstrel's grave.

No cypress sad, nor gloomy yew,
O'er his loved tomb shall darkly cling,
But weeping beauty there shall strew,
The fairest flowers of the spring;
Soft gales around shall fragrance fling,
Fresh flowrets o'er his tomb shall wave,
And nightengales shall sweetly sing
A requiem at the minstrel's grave.

THE HEIRESS TO HER LOVER.

Fallen ere long shall my fortunes be,
Yet my faith is firm—I will go with thee!
I yield not weakly to fancy's trance,
Or the fitful flame of young romance,
I dwell with a calm unshrinking mind
On the scenes that I seek and leave behind:
My future fate in a glass I see,
And my choice is fixed—I will go with thee!

I know that my kinsman will withhold
The lavish stores of his promised gold,
I know that with vanished wealth will end
The fleeting love of each summer friend,
And that all the crowds who court my eye,
Will coldly and carelessly pass me by;
Joyless and vain was their praise to me,
Light is their blame—I will go with thee!

I know that I soon must lay aside
My splendid garments of costly pride,
And oft from my books and lute repair
To con the lesson of thrifty care;
I know that my days of frugal toil
Will but be cheered by thy voice and smile,
Yet that smile, that voice, a spell shall be
To bless my lot—I will go with thee!

I have thought on this hour with many a tear,
In the timid weakness of woman's fear;
It comes, and I rise the test above,
In the dauntless strength of woman's love;
Gaze not upon me with looks so sad,
My step is firm, and my eye is glad,
This last, last sigh for my home shall be,
Past is the trial—I go with thee!

The following piece of true poetry, replete with the very spirit of hope and beauty, is from the gifted pen of the late Mrs. Hemans:

DEATH.

"Why should not he, whose touch dissolves our chain,
Put on his robes of beauty when he comes
As a deliverer? He hath many forms,—
They should not all be fearful? If his call
Be but our gatherings to that distant land,
For whose sweet waters we have pined with thirst
Why should not its prophetic sense be borne
Into the heart's deep stillness, with a breath
Of summer's winds, a voice of melody,—
Solemn yet lovely?"

LIFE.

The past, what is it but a gleam
Which memory faintly throws:
The future, but a fairy dream
That Hope, and Fear compose.

The present is the lightning's glance,
That comes and disappears:
Thus life is but a moment's trance,
Of Memories, Hopes, and Fears.

CIRCULAR.

The Most Worshipful the Grand Lodge of the Republic of Texas, of Free and Accepted Ancient York Masons,

TO THE MASONIC FRATERNITY,

Dispersed over the superficies of the Globe, send greeting: Health, Peace, Union.

BRETHREN,

The Grand Architect of the Universe, at the creation of the world, said, "Let there be light and there was light." a physical, and a moral and intellectual light. The physical light was produced by the appearance of that great luminary which travels from the East to the West, "the majestic sun." the sublime body of physical creation. Moral and intellectual light has its origin based on the same principles; it originated with the creation of Man in the garden of Eden in the East, and progressed by propagation, by the sons of Noah from Mount Ararat to Tyre, Sidon, to the quarries of Zeredatha and the plains of Lebanon, and to Jerusalem, in the West; Egypt, Ethiopia, and the Delta of the Nile, in the South; from whence, carried to Europe by the Phœnicians, Greeks, and Romans, disseminated among the Teutons, the Gauls, and the Britons; from thence it took its flight over to our Western Hemisphere, extending from the eastern shores of the United States, its illuminating rays pierced through the dark and dense forests, the wide plains, and the lofty mountains of the far West, and the scorching South, establishing on its onward march the altars dedicated to Virtue, Friendship, and Order, on the summits of the Green Mountains, the Blue Ridge, and the Alleghanies in the East, the plains of the Ohio and the Missouri in the West, branching out to the Deltas of the Mississippi, and the La Platas, the plains of Tenoxtitlan, Nicaragua, and Arequipa, and to the summits of the Andes in the South.

The rapid progress it is making through the instrumentality of the descendants of the tribe of Judah, the disciples of the Widow's Son, and the pupils of Pythagoras are such, that the time is not far distant when its benign influence will dispel darkness, idolatry, and superstition from the face of the earth by barbarian tribes inhabited, and by the laws and customs of the dark ages governed portions of our Western Hemisphere, and the altars erecting, as living monuments of the Grand Architect's wisdom and beneficence to man, will supercede and drive from the face of the earth the sacrificial altars, yet visible beacons of barbarism on the heights and the cliffs of the lofty Popocatepetl, the Chimberazo and the Pichincha, as they did from Horeb, Zion, and the Himalaya.

To test the probability of the premises above cited, let us recur to the history of the times and the countries, and more especially to our own, the analysis of which is the object of the present communication.—In the address of our Most Worshipful Grand Master, a copy of which hereby accompanies, you will see it fully developing, for which reason we abstain any further investigation of the merits of the case, and we would in addition thereto only observe, that the object of this Grand Lodge is, in virtue of the annexed resolution, to inform the fraternity at large, that, "The light shineth in the darkness, in this new-born Republic, and that the darkness comprehendeth it not."—That the principles of the fraternity are cultivated and their practices inculcated and are propagated by worthy craftsmen, within the bounds of our ancient landmarks, and that this Grand Lodge desires that the labors of the Craft within this Republic be crowned with success, producing an abundant harvest of rich and wholesome fruit for the moral, intellectual and physical benefit of worthy Brother Sojourners who may come among us, either to visit or remain permanently with us, or whom the chances of war may carry among us into Babylonian captivity, or be thrown upon our shores by the boisterous billows of the seas, at the same time, to entitle to a perfect reciprocity of feeling, sentiments, and treatment, any of our Brethren who, by the vicissitude of human life, may go into far and distant countries, and into foreign lands, among strangers, they may not be as strangers, but recognized as belonging to the house-hold of the faithful.

The general Constitutions and Laws of Masonry will be the landmarks of this Grand Lodge in the direction of its own labors, and in the government of the Lodges subordinate to its jurisdiction, and on no account will they be removed or pefaced knowingly or willingly. The Constitution of this Grand Lodge a copy of which hereby accompanied, will demonstrate the order in which the duties and labors of its Officers and Members, and of the Lodges subordinate thereto are defined, and whose faithful execution will be the constant care of this Grand Lodge.

Finally Brethren, while this Grand Lodge cherishes the best desires to preserve the Masonic customs and usages immutable, and to cultivate the most cordial and fraternal feelings of brotherly love and friendship with all worthy Masons individually, and with all regularly and constitutionally organized Masonic institutions, superior and subordinate, collectively, cannot but invite all transient worthy Masons as visitors to her assemblies, and to those of the Lodges under her jurisdiction; but on this occasion, while hailing every worthy Mason with the utmost rejoicing, for their Masonic intercourse, it must freely and frankly declare its determination of enjoining upon the Craft, within its jurisdiction, that none but those Sojourners, shall be recognized as worthy of our Masonic intercourse, protection and relief, as may come duly qualified and properly vouched for by the Lodges of which they have been members previous to their coming among us, or by other testimonials of similar category. The peculiar position in which our country is placed, like unto the Canaan, whither men of all tribes and nations, from all parts of the habitable globe, resort, makes it necessary and incumbent upon this Grand Lodge to send forth its Edicts to the Centinels that guard the avenues of her Temples, and to those stationed at the passages of her "Jordan Rivers," that no Ammonite should be permitted to pass, unless he be duly qualified and pronounce the mystic word, at whose sound the gates will be uplifted.

While this Grand Lodge, in the discharge of the sacred duties incumbent upon it, will faithfully adhere to the principles herein laid down, will also enjoin upon its own household the conformity to the same principles, and will, by all due means, endeavor to emulate the Craft within its jurisdiction, to the perfection of Masonic virtues, intelligence and brotherly love towards the fraternity at large. And that the Supreme Architect of the Universe may prosper and bless the Fraternity, is the fervent prayer, of, Brethren,

Your Brothers and Companions.

Given under our hand and the Seal of the said Grand Lodge, this 25th of February Anno Domini, 1839.—Anno Lucis, 5839.

Attest, GEORGE FISHER, G. S.

Whereas, The public morals of the people of Texas, as a nation, have, on many occasions, been unjustly traduced in the public prints, by the enemies of our common country, in foreign countries; and, whereas in the opinion of this Grand Lodge, the conduct and comportment of the Members of the Masonic Fraternity under the jurisdiction of this Grand Lodge, have been more or less embraced in the aforesaid calumny, and, whereas, the duty of this Grand Lodge is to support and sustain, by all just and honorable means, the good name and reputation of the Craft, and to cherish the fraternal feelings, and to cultivate brotherly love and friendship with all worthy Brother Masons dispersed over the superficies of the globe; Therefore,

Be it Resolved, by the Grand Lodge of the Republic of Texas, in Grand Communication convened, That the Grand Secretary give information, by suitable and appropriate Letter Circular, under the Seal of this Grand Lodge, of the organization of this Grand Lodge to the various Grand Lodges of ancient York Masons in the United States of America, the British possessions in North America, the Republic of Mexico, the Republic of Central America, and the South American Republics, also to the Grand Lodges of the various nations in Europe, affixing the signatures of the M. W. Grand and R. W. Deputy Grand Masters, and the R. W. Senior and Junior Grand Wardens, and Grand Treasurer thereto, accompanying the same with a copy of this Resolution, and a copy of the Constitution of this Grand Lodge and craving from the said Grand Lodges the circulation of this information to their subordinate Lodges, for the general benefit of the Craft.

NO. 3.

[Not wishing to mar the spirit of the following dream—narrated a few evenings since by one of our poetic brethren—we print it, as we heard it, in the "singular number"—THE 7.]

A PICTURE OF LIFE.

A summer's sun was shining cheerily upon the landscape on which I was gazing. I was then in the halcyon days of youth. My heart was beating high with the hope of unburdening the future of the many rich and pleasant objects, which were in imagination already stored up for me. All was brightly beautiful.—The subdued murmur of the sparkling rill broke upon my inattentive ear; the happy tenants of the fragrant air, breathed their thrilling notes around me; the mild and soothing breeze of summer fanned my brow, and every thing was peaceful and joyous within and around.

Filled with over-powering delight, I shut my eyes, and senses almost to the oppressive beauty of the scene, and drew within myself to luxuriate upon the unmixed happiness of my condition. Thought after thought coursed through my mind all stamped with the same character of unmingled pleasure. I was alone in the ideal world which I was forming within. No one was near to disturb or interrupt me. No sound of discord or trouble reached the spot where I stood. It was a realization of the Elysian fields with which our great classic Poet, so loved and cherished by the student, has rendered us familiar.

Thus, as I stood, I thought and meditated, and the recollections of my earlier days crowded thick upon me, when with my Vision I've sat "beneath the shade of some wide-spreading beech tree" in a summer afternoon, and while drinking in the delightful poetry and enthusiasm of this constant companion into "Sylvia's Academies," dreamed of being amid the iron-spirits of the heroic age which he has described, and warring at their sides.

I reverted to the Past and found it to have been unalloyed enjoyment; I was surrounded by the Present, and embodying in it, the idea of Paradise. I looked forward to the Future, and tried to pierce into the bosom of that bright calm azure which spread in beauty above and around me, eagerly attempting to anticipate the glorious fate which I expected it to unfold. Thus I dreamed—and as I dreamed, a short, sharp sound broke on my listless ear, which scarce woke me from my trance, but as I looked up, wondering that any discordant sound could disturb the stillness of the place, I saw a large grey spot veiling a portion of the bright sky, and hurrying along, as if borne by some evil spirit, in the direction of the place where I stood. It had a portentous look; still I remained unmoved.—but again and again, the same short, sharp sound, though louder, rang in my ear, and now as approaching nearer, the earth, so gorgeously decked with beauty, began to groan and writh, as if in the agonies of death.

My heart began to beat with apprehension. I looked round for some means of escape. Above, the heavens were dark and threatening; around me, the wind was wildly howling and raging, and the trees of the forest were twisting and whirling through the air by the force of the tempest; below me, the solid earth was quaking as in mortal fear, and threatening every instant to engulf me in her bosom. I was overcome—my knees tottered, my pulse hesitated, and the very life-blood refused to flow. I gazed in cold horror upon the ground beneath me, waiting to see it open and enclose me within it. No means of escape were open to me, the pending blow was inevitable.—I awaited it in stupid insensibility. At last, the earth gaped under my feet. I shrieked with convulsive terror, and as I sank, threw a wild glance to heaven, and in the ecstasy of despair, uttered an ejaculatory prayer to my God. I sank, and sank, till consciousness was gone! I woke again, an altered man!

TIRADE—No. 1.

OLD BACHELOR.

This singular species of animal, in the learned language of Dr. Mitchell, 'consists of two kinds'—those who are so from necessity, and those who are so from choice. The last mentioned, from being our especial hatred, may be honored by the receipt of our especial instruction; he first being so unfortunate as to come under the general epithet of "doubtful humanity," we shall of course consign to that oblivion which must inevitably follow our indifference. Here, by the way of giving the public, the lady portion in particular, a confidence in our opinions, it may not be out of place to remark, that although we are not at present in the proud possession of a "better half," that it would not be fair dealing to infer that any one of us is so very absurd as to stand remaining for any considerable period, in the same moiey condition. Likewise, we throw out this modest hint to prepare society for the generous overflowing of the heart, with which, by the glorious seven, it may be one day deluged. But this is talking about ourselves. All we mean to say is—exactly what we meant to say when we commenced—that we cannot find, in the whole vocabulary of epithets, one which will in any degree, express our opinion of him who is so thoroughly abominable as to signify that he would be a bachelor from choice. His heart is not even the virtue of flint—fire may be forced from that, nor ice—that may be melted. He is a dull, surly, companionless dog—always fretting, and forever craving for those things which he never expects to receive. His face is one of those "beacon lights" which we ever avoid: a scare-crow which nature has placed in the corn-field of existence as a warning to evil-doers. His lip never owned a smile, nor shed a tear. Whatever his condition is like, he cannot be placed in a position so elevated, as to awaken envy, or so unfortunate as to excite sympathy. He is one of those prodigious growths, that seem to have been made only to prevent the progress of others. He is naturally enough disguised with society—it will not tolerate him; he despises women—they set not their hearts upon him; he loves himself, that being the only object in harmony with his malignant reflections. The earth, the stars and the whole beautiful universe, stir not a fibre in his heart or his soul: he has but one thought and one feeling—self, all absorbing self! He is one of those accidental, non-descript, anguinely formations, which science cannot analyze and which Adam did not venture to name. Hope never visits him, despair is his only delight. He is the marble that cannot be polished, the metal which cannot be softened, the tomb-stone which no one will read. His mind is a stock, while the lizard and the serpent inhabit, around which not a spear of grass is seen, and from which arises the pestilential vapors of morbidity and corruption. To pity such a being would be to slander all the rest of mankind. He lives unnoticed, and he dies unnoticed.

FIRST YOUR LOVE.

FROM THE

Under, longing, sweet soft hope,
The golden time of first-felt love;—
The heart beholds the opening sky,
The heart in gladness, revels high,
Oh! but it ever green might bloom
The beautiful season of young love!

PHRENOLOGY ILLUSTRATED.

A gentleman who had acquired much skill in determining character from an examination of the head, was frequently invited by a neighboring smith, to examine the heads of lads to be taken as apprentices, and also of journeymen who occasionally came along. He had repeatedly condemned young gentlemen as deficient in that organization which would enable them successfully to perform the duties of that vocation, and had been singularly fortunate, in approving those only who in actual trial showed themselves really possessed of the qualities. At length a man appeared and offered his services, and the Phrenologist was called to the application of the rules of science. Upon feeling along the superciliary-ridge, and just above and behind the ears he pronounced, "I'm a valuable workman. He was forthwith employed. A few days after the scientific man was called upon by the smith. "Ha, ha, Mr. —, you made a mistake this time." "Mistake" replied he, "it cannot be possible." "O, yes you did sir." "What! do you mean to say he is not a workman." "O the best workman I ever saw, out-he drinks like the devil."

USEFUL HINTS.

Those who make candles will find it a great improvement to steep the wicks in lime water and saltpetre, and dry, them. The flame is clearer and the tallow will not "run."

Britannia ware should be first rubbed gently with a woollen cloth and sweet oil; and then washed in warm suds, and rubbed with soft leather and whiting. Thus it will retain its beauty to the last.

New iron should be gradually heated at first; after it has become inured to the heat it is not likely to crack.

It is a good plan to put earthen ware into cold water, and let it heat gradually until it boils—then cool again. Brown earthen ware, in particular, may be toughened in this way. A handful of rye or wheat bran, put in while it is boiling, will preserve the glazing, so that it will not be destroyed by acid or salt.

The finer carpets are shaken, the longer they will wear; the dirt that collects under them wears out the threads.

Woollen should be washed in very hot suds, and not rinsed. Luke warm water shrinks them.

Do not wrap knives and forks in woollen. Wrap them in strong paper. Steel is injured by lying in woollen.

REVENGE.

It happened that an Englishman traveling through Khuzistan, was received and entertained in the tent of the sheikh of an Arab tribe, his entertainer, the only member of the family at home, being a daughter, who acted as hostess in her father's absence. At night the inmates of the tent, including the stranger, retired to rest; but towards morning he was awakened by shrieks and distinguished the voice of his young hostess exclaiming that she was murdered! All rushed to the spot, where they found the unfortunate girl in the agonies of death, her breast pierced with three deep stabs of a dagger. While gazing on the dying victim, and offering vain assistance, a voice was heard from a height close by, exclaiming, "Yes, it is I! I have done it—praise be to God: and I have murdered her!" All eyes were turned to the spot, where then was seen an old woman standing and gesticulating with vehemence. A rush was made towards her, and she either ran or was borne back to the brink of the river on which the tents were pitched, from the high bank of which she fell into the deep stream; and whether she perished or escaped was seen no more. On enquiry, it appeared that this sheikh, who now had to mourn the loss of a daughter, had once had a son, who, in some former fray, had been put to death by a pehlewian (or champion) of another tribe—an event which called forth all the virulence of the existing feud. Some short time afterwards, a stranger entered the camp, and was received with the customary cordiality of Arab hospitality. Unfortunately he was recognised by some of the tribe as the very pehlewian who had put to death the son of their sheikh. What was to be done? He was now their guest, and by the laws of hospitality, and by Arab customs, could not be touched. The sheikh himself was absent, and the arguments of good faith and mercy were preponderating, when the young woman now in question entered the assembly, and upbraided the men with cowardice and cold-heartedness towards their chief. "What," said she, "shall the murderer of your sheikh's son be in your hands and yet escape?—Never let this be said—put him instantly to death, or renounce the name of men!" Still, however, a reluctance to infringe on, in so direct a manner, the laws of host and guest, restrained the hands and weapons of the men, in spite of the wrath that was boiling in their breasts; and possibly the force of that consideration might have prevailed, when the young girl herself, maddened at the sight of her brother's murderer, and the idea of his escaping, seized a sword and smote him. The sight of blood was irresistible; in a moment every weapon was drawn, and sheathed in the body of their unfortunate guest—he was literally cut to pieces. The sheikh returned, and shocked at the atrocious violation of hospitality, was furious at the perpetrators; vain would he have recalled the act or repaired the injury, but it was impossible. Time passed on, and the murder, like others of the sort was forgotten by the tribe; but not by the mother of the slain. Resolved upon revenge, she had followed the hostile camp for years, and patiently watched an opportunity, which she found not until the fatal night, when the Englishman, who relates the story, was by chance a guest in the tent of sheikh, and witness the consummation of her savage vengeance.—Fraser's Tour in the East.

A Tough Smoker.—The Philadelphia papers are cracking up an elderly gentleman of the name of Painter, residing in the lower part of the county of Philadelphia, who has smoked for sixty seven years, on an average, about ten cigars a day, making in all, a consumption of two hundred and forty thousand and five cigars, which at a cent a piece would amount to $2,405.

Not Murdered.—Much rumor told a falsehood. The Oswego Advertiser states that the girl who left the residence of Mr. Truman, in that village, has not been discovered, and that the rumor of her murdered body having been found is not true. The general opinion in that village is, that she went off with the knowledge of her friends.

If you wish to preserve fine teeth, always clean them thoroughly after your last meal at night.

In illustration of the efforts of the Temperance reform in Ireland, we give the following sketch from Mrs. Hall's Ireland:

"We entered one day a cottage in a suburb of Cork, a woman was knitting stockings at the door; it was as neat and comfortable as any in the most prosperous district of England. We tell her brief story in her own words, as nearly as we can recall them. 'My husband is a wheelwright, and always earned his guinea a week; he was a good workman, and neither a bad man nor a bad husband, but the love for the drink was strong in him, and it wasn't often he brought me home more than five shillings out of his one pound one, on a Saturday night; and it broke my heart to see the poor children too ragged to send to school, to say nothing of the starved look they had out of the little I could give them. Well God be praised, he took the pledge; and the next Saturday he laid twenty-one shillings upon the chair you sit upon. Oh! didn't I give thanks on my bended knees that night! Still, I was fearful it wouldn't last, and I spent no more than the five shillings I was used to, saying to myself, may be the money will be more wanted than it is now.—Well the next week, he brought me the same, and the next, and the next, until eight weeks passed; and glory be to God! there was no change for the bad in my husband; and all the while he never asked me why there was nothing better for him out of his hard earnings; so I felt there was no fear for him; and the ninth week when he came to me, I had this table bought, and these six chairs, one, for myself, four for the children, and one for himself. And I was dressed in a new gown, and the children all had new clothes and shoes and stockings, and upon his own chair I put a brand new suit; and upon his plate I put the bill and receipt for them all—just the eight sixteen shillings they cost that I'd saved out of his wages, not knowing what might happen, and that always before went for drink. And he cried, good lad and good gentleman, he cried like a baby—but 'twas with thanks to God; and now where's the healthier man than my husband in the county of Cork, or a happier wife than myself, or dacenter or better fed children than our own four?'"

Protection of Plants.—The Maine Cultivator states, that the best article with which to cover grape vines and other tender plants, as a protection during winter, is hemlock boughs. They turn the water, being more compact. Straw, on the contrary, which is commonly used, collects and retains the wet, and sometimes does more hurt than good. It is not so much the cold of our winters that destroys tender roots, as the wet that is suffered to freeze into ice about them.

Mullein vs Mice.—We have noticed in the foreign that the papers mullein is extensively used in the German states to prevent the depredations of mice in granaries. The plant is gathered, and the leaves and the stems placed in considerable quantities in barns and depositories of grain, and is said to effect a speedy expulsion of mice from the premises. Where trouble from this source exists, the measure, though simple in itself, might be worthy of trial.

Effects of Temperance.—When the official returns are declared—as they will be in a few days—they will exhibit these results;—That the manufacture of spirits in Ireland was less by three millions five hundred thousand and gallons in the year ending 10th October, than in the preceding year ending on the same date. The consequent loss in revenue is close upon five hundred thousand pounds sterling, or more closely 467,506l. 16s. 8d.—Southern Reporter.

A Paragraph suited to the Season.—Combe says the circumstances in which wet feet are most apt to cause diseases, are when a person remains inactive, and where, consequently, there is nothing to counterbalance the unequal flow of blood which then takes place towards the internal parts; for it is well known that a person in ordinary health may walk about or work in the open air with wet feet for hours together, without injury, provided he puts on dry stockings and shoes immediately on coming home. It is therefore, not the mere state of the wetness that causes the evil, but the check to perspiration, and the unequal distribution of blood to which the accompanying coldness gives rise.

bution of blood to which the accompanying coldness gives rise.

A RELIQUE.—The mahogany coffin which enclosed the remains of Napoleon at St. Helena, and which was exchanged for the ebony one brought from France, was cut up by order of the Prince de Joinville, and distributed in pieces to the officers and men of the Belle Poble and Favorite. Several pieces were dispensed of by the sailors, on their arrival in France, at from 300 to 500 francs each.

Distressing.—The Bennington, (Vt.) Gazette states that the children of a Mr. Down of that town, in playing "hanging" during the absence of the mother on Friday last slipped a cord round the neck of a little sister about two years old, which they hung up—the children dreading the child strangling became affrighted and ran to the neighbors for help, but on the arrival of the neighbors the little sufferer was dead.

A daughter of Mr. Joseph Hallet, jr. of Yarmouth, about two years of age, in the absence of her mother last week inhaled the steam from the spout of a teapot which was boiling upon the stove from the consequence of which she died in twelve hours.

CONGRESS.—The Pre-emption Bill has occupied the attention of the Senate during the last week. The Globe truly remarks that "the discussion on the important subject of the pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands, which began in the Senate on Monday last and has continued ever since, is one which will be read with profound attention, not merely by the inhabitants of the new States and Territories, but by the people of the United States generally."

CAUTION.—It is stated, in some of the advertisements that the bills of the Commercial Bank of Vermont, are redeemed in this city. The bank purports to be established at Poultney, Vt, and the notes are said to be very handsomely executed. We are assured that there is no such bank in existence.

FATHER MATHEW made a third visit to Dublin on the 6th of November. In three days 33,000 persons took the pledge from him. He announced that the present number of teetotalers now in Ireland amounted to three millions of souls.

A Challenge.—The officers of the Queen's Own Hussars at Montreal, have made a challenge in the sum of £1,000 to run three miles across a country within five miles of Montreal, against any three horses now in America, weight 172lb, gentlemen riders.

Extensive Robbery.—Mr. Arnold, a Merchant of Westfield, Chautauque Co., had upwards of $11,000 stolen from his Valice, when on his way to Albany. The Valice was found cut open and rifled near the Rail Road Depot at Syracuse.

Great Eclipse of the Moon.—There will be a total and magnificent Eclipse of the Moon in the evening of the 5th day of February next, commencing at 7 o'clock 9 minutes, and should the atmosphere be clear, it will present as sublime a spectacle as we seldom witness. The eclipse will commence at 7 o'clock 9 minutes in the evening. 2 hours and 6 minutes after the moon rises; it will be visible to all parts of the United States, the Canadas, the greater part of Mexico, the whole of South America, all parts of the Atlantic Ocean, the whole of Europe, and as far east as the meridian of Bombay in Hindostan, at which place the moon will go down partially eclipsed. The moon will set totally eclipsed at Arabia, Constantinople, Egypt, the countries adjacent to the Caspian Sea, and Moscow in Russia. The moon will rise totally eclipsed at Astoria, at the mouth of the Columbia River, Oregon Territory, and will be visible to all parts of the earth where the moon is above the horizon.

Milking.—A correspondent says, in answer to the enquiry for a remedy for kicking cows, that if the milker will keep his nails short, not one cow in a hundred will kick; and that the use of an ointment made of linseed oil and white lead twice, will cure cracked teats.

THE DUKE OF —; OR, THE FORCE OF CONSCIENCE.

At length, with the view of placing people of his own about her, he found means of inducing the greater part of the attendants to leave her service; a scheme which, however it inconvenienced her aunt and herself, did not answer the duke's expectation; for suspecting the cause, she was on her guard against admitting into the house persons whom she suspected might be concealed agents of the duke. The ladies, therefore, found themselves under the necessity of sending into Catania to procure other servants. As the steward, an old man, the only male domestic in the house, was on his way to that town for the above purpose, he met a young man in livery: entering into conversation with him, the other informed him that he had just left the service of the Contessa M——, and was now in search of another place: the old man, hearing this, offered to procure him admission into the service of the Marchesa L——, an offer which, after a few moments' apparent consideration, he declared himself ready to embrace. In the evening they returned together to the villa. The young man's appearance and account of himself pleasing the ladies, he was engaged at once. In the meantime, when the duke presented himself at the villa, the marchesa took care either to be invisible, or to receive him only in the presence of her aunt. Disappointed in obtaining a private interview, he took an opportunity of meeting her at the village chapel, to which, being a short distance, she went on foot accompanied by her new servant. Both parties being irritated with each other, their emotions could not be concealed from the attendant, who, at length seeing the nobleman violently and rudely seize his mistress by the arm, came to her assistance. As soon as the duke saw him, he started back in surprise, exclaiming, 'What! cavaliere, is it you? Are you her champion?' Then turning to the lady—'Indeed, madam, this is a proof of your fidelity to your husband, which I did not expect; it is now pretty clear why my devoirs have been so coolly received;' and then turning away, he went off scarcely able to repress the rage which was visible in his countenance. The marchesa attributed this to what indeed was its real cause, jealousy of her domestic, but she was not aware that the young man was in fact a son of the Baron L——, of Catania, who having a dispute with the family, and had left the house, and in order to evade discovery had disguised himself in the livery of one of the servants. As he had scarcely any money with him he might perhaps have returned to his parents in a few days, but his meeting with the marchesa's steward, and his engagement with her, prevented the necessity of his doing so; as he thought it only a frolic which it was in his power to put stop to at any time. But it happened that the young cavaliere who was only eighteen years of age, was detained in his menial occupations by the love which he had immediately conceived for his beautiful mistress; a fact no more suspected by her, than was his real condition; though indeed there were many who afterwards supposed that the young man had fallen in love with her whilst in Catania with her husband, and that he had, therefore, adopted the ruse of disguising himself as a servant in order to enter the house.

'Some time passed after the adventure of the chapel. The duke was still a constant visitor at the villa, intruding himself, whenever he had an opportunity, on the lady's privacy; high words were heard between them, and she was often observed to be in tears, and to show signs of terror on his leaving her. One night after the family had retired to rest, the marchesa's cameriera, or lady's maid, came to the chamber of the new servant, begging him to come immediately to the assistance of their mistress, who was calling for help. Losing no time in doing so, on his way to her apartment he met the duke coming from it; he appeared no way discomposed, but coolly said, 'Cavaliere, I have kept your secret, have the goodness to keep mine.' He then left the house.

'The health of the afflicted and harassed marchesa daily declined; sleep fled from her eyes; a slow nervous fever gradually emaciated her frame: the change in her appearance did not escape the observation of her aunt, who attributing it solely to the unfortunate circumstances of Don G——, little suspected how much her valued neighbor, the duke was concerned in the alteration. At length, unable to sustain the incessant persecutions of that nobleman, the marchesa resolved on removing to the house of her husband in Catania, where she hoped to remain unmolested under the roof of his relations. She could not keep her intention so secret but that the duke learnt it from her maid. Enraged at her thus attempting to escape him, he came instantly to the villa, forced himself into the lady's presence, and was overheard to load her with the most virulent reproaches, until indignant at the outrage, or terrified at his violence, she rose and left the room. The duke instantly threw himself on horseback, and rode back with precipitation to his own castle. This scene, far from causing the marchesa to abandon her design, only served to convince of the necessity of leaving the neighborhood without further delay. Their departure was accordingly fixed for eight o'clock on the following morning.

'Eight o'clock came,—the lottigas were at the door, the elder marchesa was in readiness, but her niece did not make her appearance: after waiting some time, the servants being elsewhere employed, the aunt went herself to see the cause of her delay; not receiving any reply on calling her, and the room being still in the dark, she withdrew the curtains, supposing her still asleep; and dreadful to relate, beheld her unhappy niece bathed in her blood, already a corpse. The piercing shriek and heavy fall of the aunt, as she swooned, drew the servants to the chamber. The body of the unfortunate marchesa was examined; she had received a stiletto wound under the left breast which having pierced her heart had caused instantaneous death. The blood which had streamed from the bed-clothes had formed a lake on the floor, the melancholy stains of which, as you have witnessed remain uneffaced to this day.

'Whilst the afflicted aunt and the household were in the dreadful state of consternation consequent on so horrible an occasion, it was remarked that the new servant had disappeared; but his livery had been left behind: it was stained with blood in several places, the cuff of the right sleeve, in particular, seemed to have been steeped in gore. In this deplorable emergency the marchesa knew no one to whom she could so naturally apply for advice and assistance, as the duke of M——, so long the friend of the family. A servant was accordingly despatched to acquaint him of the lamentable event, and to entreat his immediate presence at the villa. The duke received the appalling intelligence with surprise and horror; he did not, however, seem to think his presence could be of much service to the distressed aunt; but the domestic desirous of bringing him to the villa; saying in answer to his questions, that he did not believe that the lady was yet dead, the duke started, and in great agitation inquired whether she had spoken, and ordered his horse to be saddled immediately. On his arrival he found the marchesa and the family anxiously expecting him. When he heard that the lady was already dead, he refused to enter her apartment; and being informed of the flight of the servant with the circumstance of the livery left behind being stained with blood, he declared his opinion that he only could have committed the murder, and informed the aunt that the supposed domestic was no other than the son of Baron L——, of Catania, who must have had his reasons for living as a menial in the service of her niece; he was certainly enamoured of her, and had probably assassinated her in a fit of jealousy. The duke undertook to bring him to justice for the horrible deed; and leaving the marchesa, he gave directions to the police to search every angle of the country for leagues round. It was not long before the unfortunate cavaliere fell into the hands of his pursuers; he was arrested in a fundaco, or road-side inn, on the way to Palermo, where he was taking some refreshment: he prevaricated, and showed signs of confusion when arrested, and on being informed of the cause, testified extreme horror. To questions put to him, he replied that he had left the service of the marchesa so abruptly because he had reasons for not wishing to return to Catania; and he afterwards added, that his mistress had, on the preceding evening, told him that she was on the point of proceeding to Catania next morning, and, that it being her intention to reside with the friends of her husband, she should have no further occasion for his services. With regard to the livery, he had left it behind as not belonging to him, it being in fact that furnished him by the marchesa. His assertion of course did not obtain much credit; he was conveyed to Palermo, and lodged in prison preparatory to undergoing his trial which took place in due course. The circumstances against him, his flight, his livery stained with blood, his confusion on his arrest, were considered by the judges proofs of sufficient weight to justify his condemnation; still, there being no other than circumstantial evidence, they forbore condemning him to death. He was sentenced to the galleys for life. Whether it was owing to the intercession of his family, compassion for his youth, a secret impression on the minds of his judges that he had been hardly dealt with, or perhaps suspicion of the duke, is not known; but after the expiration of five years he received a free pardon, and the king presented him with a commission in the army. The tenor of his conduct was such, that he acquired the esteem of his brother officers, who readily believed his assertions of innocence. It happened soon after his appointment, that the regiment to which he belonged was ordered down to Catania. On passing through Misterbianco, as he was marching with his company, who had lived in the service of the duke recognizing him, called out in a loud voice, 'His majesty is likely to be well served when his troops are officered with the refuse of the galleys.' Galled at the allusion, the cavaliere turned round, and recollecting the person, 'It is true, I have been in the galleys, but your master ought to have been there; tell him so.' 'I am no longer,' replied the other, 'in the service of his excellency, but notwithstanding, I will do you the favor to carry him your message. The duke hearing this, testified his surprise at such audacity, and instantly proceeded to the colonel of the regiment, requiring him to punish the young man for his insolence. The colonel, a Neapolitan, with whom the cavaliere was a favorite, and who either did not believe him guilty, or, perhaps, as is too common in those countries, did not think an assassination for jealousy a crime entailing great dishonor, told the duke that it was out of his power to oblige him in this particular; the cavaliere was an officer, and as his majesty had forgiven his supposed offence, no one else had a right to taunt him with it. If the duke felt aggrieved, he had no doubt the cavaliere would give him satisfaction as a gentleman. The duke an excellent swordsman; and a man of unquestioned courage, after commenting on his condescension, embraced the proposal, hoping no doubt to rid himself of his rival. When the circumstance was mentioned to the cavaliere he declared himself ready to afford the required satisfaction to the duke; but as they were now in the neighborhood of the villa, in which the horrible murder for which he had so unjustly suffered was perpetrated, he would only do so in the house, and in the very chamber, in which the unhappy marchesa had been so foully murdered. The duke turned pale at the announcement, trembled as if seized with palsy, and retracting his challenge, declared that his rank and condition did not permit him to measure swords with a convicted felon; but the inconsistency and suspicious vacillation of his conduct being pointed out to him by the colonel, he again agreed to the meeting; but on condition that permission for its taken place should be obtained from the court of Palermo to which he undertook to write. Duelling being prohibited by the laws of Sicily, the duke imagined that his application would be rejected, and that he would be thus released from the dilemma of fighting in the chamber of the murdered marchesa, or of incurring the suspicion of being the assassin himself, by refusing to do so; but to his surprise, the requested permission was, in compliment to his rank, immediately accorded by the court; and no further subterfuge was open to him.

'On the appointed day they met in the fatal chamber that you have just visited—the cavaliere, bold and confident in his innocence; the duke, though, as I have said, a renowned swordsman, pale, trembling, and in a state of trepidation and confusion, which excited the surprise of those who had always known him as a person of approved courage: his language was incoherent, his knees bent beneath him. As he drew to put himself on his guard, his hair stood on end, his eyes seemed bursting from their sockets, and dropping the point of his sword, he fled round the apartment in a state of frenzy, exclaiming: "There—there she is; save me, save me!" His friends approaching, endeavored to remove the horrible impression under which he laboured; declaring at the same time, that as the duke was evidently seized with sudden illness, the affair ought not, and could not proceed for the present; but the officer maintaining that it was the consciousness of guilt that so dreadfully agitated his adversary said, that he would not suffer the present opportunity afforded him by providence, of establishing his innocence in the eyes of the world, to be lost. He would consent to let the matter rest if the duke would before all present, (for he did not expect him to confess his own guilt.) solemnly affirm that he knew the cavaliere to be innocent of the crime for which he had been condemned. By this time the duke had considerably recovered his presence of mind, and replied, that dreadfully as he had been effected by finding himself, for the first time since the horrible deed, in the very chamber in which a person so dear to him had been cruelly murdered, and foreseeing which, he had been desirous of avoiding a meeting on an ill-chosen spot, still he would never consent to an avowal by which he could not acquit the cavaliere without entailing suspicion on himself. Those who knew him were well aware that his agitation proceeded from no other motive than that to which he attributed it; the affair might proceed.—In vain affecting composure, he again took his stand; again his tremor returned, again his eyeballs glared fixedly in their sockets; mustering all his resolution, he desperately put himself on his guard, thrusting at random, and forgetting to parry. The duel, under these circumstances, would of course have been again suspended by the seconds, but before they had time to interfere, the duke had already received the blade of his opponent in the left breast. He fell instantly, shrieking hideously, covering his eyes with his hands, and calling on some visionary being to keep off; exclaiming at the same time, "Yes, yes! I murdered her; then pointing to a recess behind the door—"there is the bloody poniard." His friends declared it absurd to pay any attention to the ravings of a person perhaps dying, certainly at the time not in possession of his senses and carried him immediately out of the fatal apartment. The hurt, when examined by the surgeon in attendance, was, to the surprise of all, found to be by no means serious, being a simple flesh wound, the sword having glanced against one of the ribs, which had preserved the vital parts from injury. In the meantime, the cavaliere and his party searched anxiously in the spot indicated by the wounded man, for the weapon with which the bloody deed had been committed. Their efforts were for a long time unavailing; at length, remarking that one of the stones appeared loose, they extracted it from the wall; and in the cavity behind, found not only the poniard incrustated and stained with blood, but also pistols and other arms, evidently secreted there by the duke, with some keys, which being applied to the locks, proved to be those of the different doors leading to the chamber of the murdered marchesa. Thus, not the shadow of a doubt remained as to the innocence of the much-injured cavaliere, or the guilt of the unhappy duke.

"Soon after the murder of his wife, the unfortunate Don G—— had been released from prison, and had returned to Catania but not until he had expended the greater part of his property in defending himself against this unjust persecution. The duke afterwards, confessed that it had been his design to have procured his detention in perpetual imprisonment, as a punishment for the calumny, for such he maintained that it was, that he had insinuated into the mind of the marchesa respecting the opera singer; but his rage against the husband gave way before the jealousy occasioned by the appearance of the cavaliere in the service of the marchesa, to whose infidelity, and not error, he then attributed her marriage with Don G——.

"After his wound, his companions lost no time in removing the duke to his own palace, where he slowly recovered the use of his reason. But when the Duke of M—— rose from his couch, he was greatly changed from the man who had so lately entered the villa, for the purpose of fighting with the cavalier. He made a deed of gift of the whole of his property to the next heir, the present duke; and shut himself up in a convent of Carthusians; where, after a due noviciate, he took the vows. On the cavaliere, who had suffered so much from his duplicity and guilt, he settled a provision of two ounces, Sicilian money, per diem, a very comfortable provision in that country. He also directed that Don G—— should be reimbursed for all the expenses incurred during his long imprisonment, which had gone near to ruin him.—But the gifts of the penitent duke were rejected without hesitation, both by the cavaliere and the husband who refused to put themselves under any obligations to the person who had so cruelly and irreparably injured them.

"The duke founded also perpetual masses for the repose of the soul of the marchesa, and instituted a funeral solemnity which is still annually celebrated with great magnificence on the anniversary of the murder; no less a sum than seven hundred ounces being allotted for the ceremony and the munificent alms given to the poor of the neighborhood on the occasion.

"On the vigil, no peasant ventures to pass the villa. It is firmly believed; that, on that night, the spirit of the unhappy marchesa is seen to hover about the fatal spot where she so cruelly perished.

"The duke lived many years after taking the monastic vows. He died a sincere penitent; but it was long, long before all the care of his pious brethren succeeded in calming the acute reproaches of his guilty conscience."

MISCELLANY.

THE BODY OF NAPOLEON.

The latest Parisian journals contains the official account of the disinterment of Napoleon's remains, and their removal on board the frigate Belle Poule, under the supervision of Prince de Joinville, assisted by Count Rohan Chabot and Capt. Alexander, Commissioners appointed, the one by France and the other by England, to superintend the exhumation.

The body appeared to have suffered little change in the twenty years which had passed since it was inhumed. The three coffins—of which the exterior one was mahogany, the second lead, and the third and last mahogany—having been cut through, and the white satin sheet which covered the body removed, the form and features of the great departed lay exposed to the view of a group of his old and faithful followers who were permitted to be present, and, of many who now gazed upon them for the first time. The features were so perfect, and retained so completely their natural form and character, that General Gourgand, involuntarily exclaimed on beholding them, "Bon! tres bon!"

The proces verbal, drawn up by Dr. Guillard, surgeon of the Belle Poule, after reciting the precautions used in opening the lids of the several coffins, continues thus:

"Something white, which appeared to have become detached from the lining, covered, as if with a thin gauze, all that the coffin contained. The cranium and forehead, which adhered strongly to the satin, were particularly stained with it, but very little was seen on the lower part of the face, on the hands, or on the feet. The body of the Emperor was in an easy position, as when placed in the coffin; the upper members were laid at length, the left arm and hand resting on the left thigh; the lower limbs were slightly bent; the head, a little raised, resting on a cushion. The voluminous skull, the high and broad forehead, presented themselves, covered with hard and yellow teguments closely adhering to them. Such appeared also on the contour of the orbits, the upper edges of which were furnished with the eyebrows. Under the eyelids were still to be distinguished the ocular globes, which had lost very little of their volume or form. The eyelids were completely closed, adhered to the adjacent parts, and were hard under the pressure of the finger. Some eyelashes were to be seen on their edges. The bones of the nose, and the tegument which covered them, were well preserved; the tubes and nostrils alone had suffered. The cheeks were full; the teguments of this part of the face were remarkable for their softness to the touch and their whiteness. Those of the chin were slightly blue, a tint they had borrowed from the beard, which had grown after death. The chin itself had undergone no change, and still preserved the peculiar type of the face of Napoleon.

The thin lips were parted, and three of the incisive teeth very white, appeared under the upper lip, which was a little raised towards the left. The hands were perfect, not having undergone the least change. Although the joints were stiff, the skin preserved that peculiar color which is only to be found in the living man. The nails of the fingers were long and adherent and very white. The legs were in boots, but in consequence of the opening of the seams the last four toes were out on each side. The skin of these toes was of a dead white, and furnished with nails. The anterior region of the thorax was much depressed in the middle, and the sides of the belly hard and sunk. All the members covered by the clothing appeared to have preserved their shapes. I pressed the left arm, which I found to be hard and diminished in thickness. As to the clothes they appeared with their colors, so that the uniform of the horse chassours of the old guard was to be recognised by the dark green of the coat and its bright red facings. The grand cordon of the legion of honor was across the waistcoat, and the white breeches were partly covered by the hat, which was placed on the thighs. The epaulettes, the star, and other decorations attached to the breast, had lost their brilliancy and turned black. The gold crown of the cross of officer of Legion of Honor had alone preserved its polish. Vases of silver appeared between the legs, one surmounted by an eagle which rose above the knees; they were found entire and closed. As there were adhesions between these vases, and the parts they touched, I uncovered them a little, the King's commissioner not thinking it right that they should be removed for the purpose of closer examination."

The proces verbal goes on to state that the above particulars might have been more full, but they were sufficient to show that the preservation of the body was more complete than circumstances of the autopsy and inhumation warranted an expectation of. It then proceeds:

"This is not the place to inquire into the causes which have to this extent arrested the progress of decomposition; but there is no doubt that the extreme solidity of the masonry of the tomb, and the care taken in making and soldering the coffin in metal, have powerfully contributed to this result. However this may be, I feared the effect of the atmosphere upon the remains, and was convinced that the best means of preserving them still longer was to exclude them from its action. I eagerly complied with the desire of the King's commissioners that the coffins should be immediately closed. I restored the wadded satin to its place, after having steeped it in creosote, and then caused all the wooden cases to be closely fastened as possible, and those of metal to be hermetically soldered. The remains of Napoleon are now in six coffins—one of tin, a second of mahogany, a third of lead, separated from that within by sawdust and wedges of wood, the fifth, sarcophagus of ebony, and the sixth, the outer case of oak."

The process of opening the tomb commenced at half past 12 o'clock on the 15th of October, but in consequence of the strength and solidity of the masonry it was 10 o'clock at night when the workmen arrived at the coffin.

[THE BACK TRACK.—Our readers are perhaps aware, that we printers do not always tell the truth; although professionally, there is as much verity among the craft, (as a lawyer would say) as "can be expected under the circumstances of the case." The following article, together with a "fair trial" of the improvement compels us to take back all we said about snow being a good substitute for eggs. We not only ask pardon of the biddies for any contempt shown to their domestic arrangements during the winter; but we think an apology likewise due to those housewives whose breakfasts we have innocently spoiled. We think, however, that snow is an improvement in making good paste—if for breakfast, season, to suit the palate, if for paper-hanging purposes, the seasoning might be omitted.]

"SNOW vs. EGGS."

From the Cleveland Herald, Dec. 19.

Mr. Harris: For your character as an editor of political paper I entertain the highest respect, but when you come to the culinary department it may be a saving of your reputation to submit your extracts to the extracts you intend to publish to the inspection of your lady. Accompanying this my lady sends a slice of pudding made according to the recipe you lately published, using snow instead of eggs. This was made to "try it." As you are a benefactor or by communicating the recipe, you certainly should enjoy the fruits of your labors.

With her compliments and mine, I remain your obliged servant.

JONATHAN GULLEDWELL.

P. S. The only objection to the pudding is the difficulty of distinguishing it from some paste we have in the house.

2d P. S. I doubt not the pudding will taste as well cold as it did hot.

N. B. Give Mrs. Gilman our thanks.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, JAN. 19, 1841.

TERMS OF THIS PAPER.—To send for a copy out of the city, $2 in advance—$2.00 if within six months, and $3, if not paid until the expiration of the year. BACK NUMBERS at all times furnished.

THE GRAND CHARTER of the State of New-York will convene at St. John's Hall, in this city, on the first Monday of February next.

JOHN O. COLE, Grand Sec'y.

Jan. 16, 1841.

MR. BOWEN, THE LECTURER.—Among the most interesting lectures we have listened to this season, was the one delivered by this gentleman a few evenings since, at the Assembly Chamber. His subject was the improvement of persons placed in the same lamentable situation with himself. In a plain and pertinent manner he began by showing how differently throughout different periods of history, the blind had been esteemed. At one time they had been considered objects of hatred to the Deities, and therefore barred of all commiseration; at others, from being looked upon as monsters, they were subjected to the most inhuman barbarity, generally resulting in death. It was not until the time of the Frenchman, Hays, that they were treated as at all sufferable beings. This benevolent individual, was the first to conceive a practical plan of ameliorating their condition. The first six he he took under his charge, became not only useful, but distinguished members of society. The lecturer himself gave a fine evidence of his own proficiency as a person in most intelligent pursuits. He showed himself a fair scholar, a correct and well-informed speaker, and was a highly cultivated man. Six years ago he was a fisherman. In speaking of the facility with which the blind progressed in matters of education, the alphabet, the learning of which was generally the work of months with "seeing children," as he called them, the blind, would accomplish in the almost incredibly short period of 15 or 20 minutes. This very desirable end was attained by passing the fingers over characters, which had previously been embossed upon paper. Their mode of reading is by passing the finger of both hands continually moving over the matter before them: the fingers of the left hand are pressed upon the word they are speaking, while those of the right are engaged in decyphering the one which is to follow. This is certainly a slow method of gaining intelligence, but one, as he justly observed, which if generally practised by "seeing men," would result in their reading less, but understanding more.

THE LAST YANKEE INVENTION.—A friend of ours, while travelling this winter on one of the West India Roads, that as the train of cars was leaving the station, the wheels of the engine coming in contact with a large block of snow, went buzzing around with a noise like any of the wheels of a steam engine. This however, was not the case, for the train started off without any delay. This result appeared somewhat singular. On enquiring the cause of the noise, the engine driver, who had been removed, his attention was directed to the block of snow, which it came within a few feet of the wheels, it was ejected from the boiler. From the style that such an invention must have swept and melted the snow before it, we can readily conceive that our friend was not far from the way. The sound compared its sound to that of a mad bull. The most curious part of the matter was, that the article had been made the subject of a lecture. Who will doubt after this, as to America being the true land of genius?

WORTHY OF NOTE AND PRAISE.—On Thursday afternoon last, Mr. M. Nichols gave the proceeds of an extra performance at the Amphitheatre, to the Mayor of our city to be by him appropriated to the aid of the late inundation. What makes this generosity particularly praiseworthy in the proprietor, is the fact that he is the greatest "sufferer" from the delay and damage occasioned by the flood, will not, we are informed, fall much short of $500, to him.

MASONRY IN TEXAS.—We acknowledge with pleasure, a package from Br. Fisher, the Grand Secretary of the Republic of Texas. As opportunity serves, we shall spread them before our readers. The circular of the Grand Lodge, will be found on our first page. In a letter to us, the Grand Secretary observes—"The accompanying documents, although old, will throw light upon the origin and progress of Masonry in Texas, so little known in foreign countries, where we are looked upon as Hottentots or Comanches. The very name of Texas, is in the ears of some people in the land of Sherry and Champagne, that they would almost exclude a Texian from entering into one of their churches on Holy Sabbath. How wrong—how mistaken—how prejudicial—how uncharitable."

CAPITAL PUNISHMENTS.—A considerable debate has been held in our Assembly on the propriety of the Governor's interfering in the case of two individuals now under sentence of death, for murder to the end, that as capital punishment may be abolished, these unfortunate gentlemen may have all the advantages resulting from a change of law. From the tenor of the debate, we are satisfied the legislature will not interfere. It is extremely regret to see any effort to alter a law recognised by the positive injunctions of the Almighty; and in this age—so indispensable to the welfare of society. We have already among us too many unchangeable villains, without attempting to open the door still wider. The notion that imprisonment will answer the purpose is visionary and fallacious. Once abolish this terrific restraint, and no man's life is of a pin's value in this community. We have too many accommodating jurors among us, without making the facilities of escape any easier.

FOREIGN ITEMS.—The packet ship Oxford arrived at New York, after a passage of 20 days. All the European papers are filled with accounts of the gorgeous ceremony which took place on the 15th ult. at the interment of the remains of Napoleon. This great pageant passed off with inconceivable splendor, and with the utmost peace and quietness.—The London Herald says, that the determination of the present French Cabinet, to maintain the armed peace, gives great offence to Great Britain, Austria and Prussia.—The Queen has so far recovered as to be able to ride out in her carriage.—The definite offer of submission on the part of Mehemet Ali, has been confirmed. There has been a very extensive robbery in the Birmingham post office.—Several destructive freshets have occurred in England, destroying much property.

A NEW SCIENCE.—Mr. Buxton, intends delivering a Lecture on "Analogy or Analogised, being the doctrine of Ontology extended—proving by incontestable analogies the earth to be endowed with animality."—On Monday evening next, at Knickerbocker Hall, at 8 o'clock.

We have not had time to examine the same, but from the testimonials that Mr. B. has produced to us, from a few literary gentlemen of this city, who have perused the same, we do not hesitate in saying that it deserves a great deal of credit, for its ingenuity as well as being very curious, and we trust that Mr. B. will meet with success in his laudable undertaking, as the admittance is only 25 cents, to admit a Gentleman (with or without a Lady.)

THE CONCORDIA is the title of a club, recently formed in this city, for the purpose of improvement in musical science. It is composed principally of Amateurs. Mr. Hatet, a gentleman of exceedingly versatile musical accomplishments, is their director. The concert given by them a short time since, gave great satisfaction to a numerous and fashionable auditory. Since the time of the old Euterpean Club, the city has not rejoiced in possessing so much concentrated skill in the "harmony of sweet sound."

THE AMPHITHEATRE.—The long-talked of pageant, of St. George and the Dragon, has at length made its appearance at this establishment, in a style of splendor unequalled in the history of Albany Theatricals. It will no doubt have a fair run.

THE FLOOD, which we noticed last week, has been greater in extent, and more disastrous in consequences, than any which has preceded it, in the memory of our oldest inhabitants. Hundreds of lives have been lost, and millions of property destroyed. The damage in the vicinity of the Croton dam, in bridges, houses, lands, &c. is estimated at $672,500, besides the loss of several lives. The destruction will be found appalling.

Four hundred dollars was realised as the avails of the Fair, recently held by the ladies of the North Dutch Church, for the benefit of the 3d Church, in Ferry street.

PERCUSSION LOCKS.—The Lieutenant Colonel of U. S. Ordnance Department recommends the use of the percussion lock for our muskets, which will no doubt be found a great improvement.

An Idea of Laziness.—Winchell, the Comedian, says he knew a man, who when he had commenced eating, was too lazy to stop.

To CORRESPONDENTS.—We shall at all times be happy to hear from our friend in Florida. If his "K's" is to be taken as an evidence of his muse, he must never allow her to slumber.

Intelligence.

Florida News.—Forty Indians captured, and ten hanged.

The St. Augustine Herald of the 31st ult. supplies the subjoined intelligence.

Capt. Thompson, of the Walter M. arrived this morning from Key Biscayne, brings a verbal report that Col. Harney, who had proceeded into the everglades with ninety men, succeeded in discovering the town of We-ki-kak, where he captured twenty-nine women and children, and one warrior, and killed or hanged ten warriors (they were perhaps shot in the attack.)

We hope, however, that they were hanged after being caught alive, for belonging to the gang which committed the massacre at Carlos-hatchie and Indian Key; they deserved neither mercy, judge or jury—nothing but an executioner; and the people of Florida have long deplored the unfrequency of such salutary retributive examples. If these Indians were hanged, their people will see we are at last in earnest.—How much blood might have been saved had ten Indians been hanged five years ago!

Col. Harney, we are told, went in at the Miami, and came out near Cape Sable. If so, he must have gone where no white man has proceeded, and discovered a singular and important water communication across the south of the peninsula.

The party returned round the coast, leaving Capt. Davidson, who is, we are sorry to say, dangerously ill, at Indian Key. Another expedition is preparing.—Official reports may be expected tomorrow by the Wm. Gaston.

We said a few days ago that the destruction of one Indian was of more importance than the taking of Beyrout. What then must be our rejoicing when forty are captured. Our market is illuminated to night the band is playing cheerily, and the people are shouting for joy.

Last night the market was illuminated, cannons fired, and music employed to add their grateful sounds to the admiration which this affair has produced.

Disaster and Loss of Lives.—The Schooner James McClung, of Philadelphia, and bound to that port from St. Thomas, sprung a leak on the 27th ult. in lat 20, and soon after sunk; the captain and crew taking the boat. In attempting to land the boat swamped in the breakers near a quarter of a mile from the shore, and four men were drowned, viz: Jonathan Drake, of Montgomery county, Pa., aged 41 years; James Chaworth, of the same place aged 31 years; and two colored men, James Jones, of Pennsaged 46 years and James Mills, of Lewiston, Del., aged 22 years.

The Newark Advertiser gives an account of a collision of cars on the railroad near Hackensack bridge. The fog was so dense as to prevent the engineers from seeing each other until it was too late. One of the locomotives was slightly damaged.

Mayor Varian, we are happy to see, is gradually recovering from his severe indisposition.

THE PACKET SHIP GARRICK.—The N. Y. papers contain the particulars of the state of this ship up to Sunday evening. She had not gone to pieces, nor was her back broken. Her hold was full of water, however, and there was one foot of water on her between decks. All the goods between decks were got out, though some were in a damaged state. The goods in the hold, it was feared, would prove a total loss.

IMMERSION.—The ordinance of baptism by immersion was administered on Saturday last by the pastor of the Baptist Society in Norwalk, Ct, through a hole made in the ice for the purpose while the mercury was ranging 20 degrees below the freezing point.

Maj. GEN. GAINES, of the U. S. Army, is exhibiting his wife as a Lectress in the several Cities of the Union. We had supposed that the vanity of an old man to show a pretty young Wife, was at the bottom of this foolery; but the correspondent of the Boston Atlas says that they make a regular business of the thing, leaving "Tickets at 50 cents" at the usual depositories! This is really discreditable to the Army and the Country. As an officer, Gen. GAINES has no right to engage in other pursuits without resigning his commission. But above all he should not be allowed to tarnish a profession in which he holds distinguished rank, by becoming an itinerant Lecturer for money.—Journal.

Death by Freezing.—On Saturday last, just before night, the daughter of George Pooker, of Hog Neck, eight years, ran out to slide on the ice, which covered a mud hole, not far from the house, when the ice gave way and she sank in the mud, her head and hands only being above the ice, where she was found the next morning.—Sag. Har. Corrector.

Burnt to Death.—An old lady, a fortune teller, was burnt to death in Richmond a few days since while in her bed—the bed was set on fire by a shooting crack-er.

Dickens, of London, the author of "Pickwick," &c., realizes £5,000 per annum from his flowing pen.

POETRY.

MASONIC ODE.

For the Masonic Register.

For the Festival of St. John the Baptist.

Companions, who have travelled o'er
The rugged road, where erst of yore
Our ancient MASTERS proudly bore
The humble badge we wear;
From north to south, from west to east,
Come, Brothers, mingle in the feast,
In honor of our Patron-Priest,
Whose name we fondly bear.

Come, all ye pilgrims of the earth,
What'er your country, rank or birth,
Come, taste the fount of Mystic Mirth—
'Twill smooth the troubled sea;
Come, in this URB the relic lies
To chase the darkness from your eyes—
Come, see the LIGHT—'twill make you wise,
And set your spirits free.

What charm has station, or renown,
A monarch's palace, or his crown,
A Papal Chair, or Pontiff's gown,
Without the faith we hold?
All is but empty, idle meed,
Compared with our MASONIC CREED,
Which, in the pilgrim's utmost need,
Supplies the want of gold.

Come then, thou pilgrim, take this KEY,
It will unlock a mine to thee,
'Twill set the mourning prisoner free,
And from his foes 'twill save:
'Twill drop the foeman's pointed steel,
'Twill make the proudest monarch kneel,
'Twill in a BROTHER'S BREAST conceal
The secrets of the grave.

Then follow well the plumb and line—
Obey your Architect Divine—
So thro' your life your works shall shine
In charity and love:
And when the Grand Omnipotent Eye
Shall lift the curtains of the sky,
And beckon to the LODGE on high,
We'll rise and soar above.

Till then, this MYSTIC KEY shall bind
Kindred and tongues of every kind,
Together in one common mind,
Of BROTHERHOOD below:
And thro' life's troubled sea of care
We'll conquer, or we'll learn to bear,
And ever bright our Jewels wear,
Thro' chequered weal and woe.

CHILDHOOD.

See that beautiful guileless creature
Sporting 'midst her childish toys;
Youth's bright vision lights each feature,
Hope's gay future swells her joys.

Light and wanton falls her tresses
'Round her brow of fairest hue;
Her lips inviting fond caresses,
Laughing eyes of purest blue.

Constant lisping—gleesome prattle.
As to each lov'd object fondly clinging,
Now hugs her doll and now her rattle—
One moment weeps, the next is gaily singing.

Unknown to her the cares that age doth bring,
The woes inherent to our lot;
She to the flowery present fondly clings,
Griefs like hers are soon forgot.

See the mother fondly viewing
Her tender offspring's sportive tricks;
Her watchful care oft renewing,
Whilst she guides her tottering steps.

Who'd dissolve this charm of pleasure,
Or creak of life's impending grief;
Youth's short hours are heaven's best treasure—
Hours like hers, are bright as brief. W.

THE KISS OF WEDDED LOVE.

BY JAMES A. BERTHELOT, OF FLORIDA.

Give me of Wedded Love, the holy Kiss,
Bestow'd with rapture, and receiv'd with bliss—
Where soul embracing soul in union sweet,
Not only lips, but hearts together meet:
Give me the kiss that wants no fancied aid
From warbling nightingale in myrtle shade;
From flow'r enamel'd, mead or secret bow'r
Beneath the moon's pale beam at midnight hour.
Be mine the kiss that's given without a fear—
That stains not honor, and that wakes no tear:
The kiss whose raptures gold can never buy,
The kiss that's ne'er remembered with a sigh:
Give me the Kiss of Innocence alone,
The hallow'd Kiss that I can call my own.

HOMES AND GRAVES.

BY T. K. HERVEY.

How beautiful a world were ours.
But for the pale and shadowy one
That treadeth on its pleasant flowers,
That stalketh in its app!
Glad childhood needs the lore of time
To shew the phantom overhead:
But where the breast, before its prime,
That carrieth not its dead,
The moon that looketh on whose home
In all its circuit sees no tomb!

It was an ancient tyrant's thought
To link the living with the dead:
Some secret of his soul had taught
That lesson dark and dread!
And, oh! we bear about us, still,
The dreary moral of his art,
Some form that lieth, pale and chill,
Upon each living heart,
Tied to the memory, till a wave
Shall lay them in one common grave!

To boyhood hope,—to manhood fears!
Alas!—alas! that each bright home
Should be a nursing-place of tears.
A cradle for the tomb!
If childhood seeth all things loved
Where home's unshadowy shadows wave,
The old man's treasure hath removed,
He looketh to the grave!
For grave and home lie sadly blent
Wherever spreads yon firmament.

A few short years—and then, the boy
Shall miss, beside the household hear
Some treasure from his store of joy,
To find it not on earth;
A shade, within its saddened walls
Shall sit, in some beloved room,
And one dear name, he vainly calls,
Be written on a tomb,
And he have learnt, from all beneath,
His first, dread, bitter taste of death!

And years glide on, till manhood's come;
And where the young, glad faces were,
Perchance the once bright, happy home
Hath many a vacant chair:
A darkness, from the churchyard shed,
Hath fallen on each familiar room,
And much of all home's light hath fled,
To smoulder in the tomb,
And household gifts that memory saves
But help to count the household graves.

Then, homes and graves the heart divide,
As they divide the outer world:
But drearier days must yet betide,
Ere sorrow's wings be furled;
When more within the churchyard lie
Than sit and sadly smile at home,
Till home unto the old man's eye,
Itself appears a tomb,
And his tired spirit asks the grave
For all the home it longs to have!

It shall be so,—it shall be so!
Go bravely trusting—trusting on;

Bear up a few short years—and, lo!
The grave and home are one!
And then, the bright ones gone before,
Within another, happier home,
Are waiting, sonder than before,
Until the old man come—
A home where but the life-trees wave;
Like childhood's—it hath not a grave!

SATAN.

BY THE REV. G. CROLY.

Prince of the fallen! around thee sweep
The billows of the burning deep;
Above thee lowers the sullen fire,
Beneath thee bursts the flaming spire,
And on thy sleepless vision rise
Hell's living clouds of agonies.

But thou dost like a mountain stand,
The spear uplifted in thy hand;
The gorgeous eye—a comet shorn,
Calm into utter darkness borne;
A naked giant—stern—sublime—
Armed in despair—and scorning time.

On thy curled lips is throned disdain,
That may revenge, but not complain;
Thy mighty cheek is firm though pale;
There smote the blast of fiery hail;
Yet wan wild beauty lingers there,
The wreck of an archangel's sphere.

Thy forehead wears no diadem,
The king is in thy eyeball's beam;
Thy form is grandeur, unsubdued,
Sole chief of Hell's dark multitude,
Thou prisoned—ruined—unforgiven!
Yet fit to master all but heaven.

ORIGIN OF MASONRY IN TEXAS.

Extracts from an Address, delivered before Holland Lodge No. 1, on its formation at the city of Houston, in the Republic of Texas, 5838.

BY M. W. ANSON JONES, ESQ.

BRETHREN.

In pursuance of the duty prescribed in the Constitution of the Grand Lodge of the Republic of Texas, the Grand Master and his Officers have this evening the pleasure of making their first annual visitation to this worshipful and respectable Lodge. We are both proud and happy, Brethren, to be able, on this occasion, to congratulate you on the prosperous and successful situation and progress of Masonry in Texas.—But a few months have elapsed since the re-establishment of this Lodge and the establishment of those in Nacogdoches and San Augustine; and the Order already boasts of near two hundred Masons in full communication, which number is now rapidly increasing by the accession of new and worthy members. The recent establishment of the Grand Lodge of the Republic of Texas, by the unanimous consent and concurrence of the three Lodges existing by virtue of Charters from our elder Sister, the Grand Lodge of Louisiana, is an era in our institution, which, binding us altogether in one friendly union, promises to our future welfare the happiest results. Union is one of the great principles in our Order; and ever has been and still is our best guaranty for prosperity and strength. The bond, now so fortunately existing, we doubt not it will ever be your wish, as it is your interest and that of the fraternity in general, to preserve and defend.

Holland Lodge has arrived at its present state of prosperity and usefulness through many and various difficulties. Originally established at Brazoria, it had but begun to shed its benign influence over a small band of devoted Brethren, when the revolution commenced. By this disastrous event its members were scattered and dispersed, and for near two years this labor was interrupted. The unfortunate Fannin, one of these, was murdered on the Plains of Goliad by the tyrant who oppressed our country, and some others died in its defence. The temple consecrated to your labors was ravaged by the enemy, and its records, jewels and furniture destroyed. The scattered fragments which desolation had spared, were gathered together in this City in October last; and, by the aid of a few brethren a new Lodge has arisen like a fabled Phoenix from her ashes, and as if purified by the fire through which she has been doomed to pass, now shines with a brighter lustre and promises long to continue a light and a beacon to the hearts of those who worship at the altars of Masonry in Texas. It has the high honor now of numbering among its members, men who are alike an ornament to society and to Masonry; men who have gallantly sustained the cause of human liberty on our fields of glory and in the councils of the nation; and more especially one, who, like our immortal Brother George Washington, has ever been "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

With such materials and such skill to use them as you possess, we have the utmost confidence that the work intrusted to your care will be properly executed, and the prosperity of Masonry be still promoted by your united and harmonious labors.

Intimately connected with the prosperity and respectability of the subordinate Lodges and of Masonry in Texas, is that general policy which it is the province of the Grand Lodge to define and establish. Previous to any remarks upon this, however, it becomes my duty to say a few words upon the subject of the creation of the Grand Lodge, the manner and objects of its Constitution, and the useful purposes which it is intended to subserve.

The history of Masonry in the United States, which has been the guide in the formation of the Grand Lodge of Texas, clearly demonstrates the right which two or more Lodges inherently possess, when they exist in an independent State, of renouncing the allegiance which they owe to the Grand Lodges from whom they derive their powers, and of forming for themselves a separate and distinct Grand Lodge co-extensive with the municipal governments in which they are established, to the support of which they will contribute, and the authority of which they acknowledge and obey. This transfer of allegiance and subordination, finds precedents in the examples of every State government in the United States, and Grand Lodges have thus been formed in all of them by the free and voluntary consent of the subordinate Lodges, who, sensible of the necessity of a government of their own, which was composed of Representatives chosen by themselves, have, in every instance, resorted to their inherent right of establishing such a government for their particular control. In this manner, and for these purposes, the Grand Lodge of the Republic of Texas has been established. Its objects are to give union, strength and harmony to the different Lodges in the Republic; to be the arbitrer in all cases of doubt or difficulty, and to determine questions which concern the general welfare and common good. The great and rapid increase of the Order in Texas, requires that it should have a common head and a separate government, from the establishment of which many useful purposes will be accomplished. Instead of being governed by a foreign and distant power, where it is not personally represented by individuals belonging to the respective Lodges, who are always best acquainted with its true wants and interests, it now has a government of its own, with which it is identified, and whose intelligent course, it is justly to be presumed, will always be such as will most conduce to the promotion of the general good.

The three Lodges which composed and constituted the Grand Lodge of Texas, date their independence of the Grand Lodge of Louisiana, from the 12th December last. Though they still continue to work under the Warrants of Masonic power, which they received from the latter Grand Lodge; yet, from the time above specified, they voluntarily transferred their allegiance, as they had an inherent right to do, to the Grand Lodge of Texas; all dues, therefore, which accrued from this Lodge to the Grand Lodge of Louisiana, up to the 20th of December last, it is proper should be paid agreeably to the Regulations of that body; since that period, however, the Grand Lodge of the Republic of Texas has been organized, in conformity with the ancient customs and usages of Masonry, and from that date is entitled to receive the established dues. So soon as it is convenient it will be proper for this Lodge to surrender the Charter, which it now holds as its authority for working, and to receive from the Grand Lodge of the Republic of Texas, a Dispensation or Charter in the place thereof. This course, adopted by all the Lodges, will place the Order upon a uniform and harmonious footing, and relieve us from all those differences of views and opinions which might arise from a conflict of Masonic jurisdiction purporting, as now, to be held over the same extent of country.

All the Lodges in the Republic of Texas owe allegiance and due subordination to the Grand Lodge of the same, and should all derive their power and authority from one and the same source. By this means it is hoped that uniformity may be established in our labors, union and harmony in our councils, and strength and stability given to our institution throughout this whole Republic. Order is nature's first great law, and has been established in Masonry, since the time when the Almighty Architect first brought system out of chaos, and light out of darkness, and it is now an essential principle of Masonry, without which it could not exist. No masonic temple can ever be raised without it.

The Constitution and Laws adopted by the Grand Lodge, will be furnished you, by our Grand Secretary, so soon as the same can be published. I need not enforce the propriety of a strict conformity to the same upon the minds of this intelligent and respectable Lodge; for you, Brethren, are already aware of it.

Masonry is yet in its infancy in Texas. Many of its members are young; and those who are older, having been brought together from different and distant States where some difference of Masonic forms and regulations exist, necessarily differ in opinion on many points not vitally essential, and, in proportion as we mingle together, will wear away and generally disappear, and it is confidently hoped that, at no distant day, we shall all harmonize in one uniform system throughout the Republic. The general policy of the Grand Lodge has been framed and adapted to this great and desirable purpose.

EMINENT MASONS.

1.] ST. ALBAN—was born at Warham, now St. Alban's Hertfordshire, England. He was the first who suffered martyrdom for the Christian religion in Britain. He was beheaded A. D. 303. The old constitutions affirm that he was employed by Carausius to environ the city of Varulam with a wall, and to build him a splendid palace. He was a celebrated architect and zealous patron of masonry. In an old manuscript, destroyed in the year 1730, the following anecdote is told of this eminent man! "St. Alban loved Masons well, and cherished them much, and made their pay right good; for he gave them ij s. per weeke, iij d. to their cheer; whereas, before that time, in all the land a Mason had but a penny a day and his meat, until St. Alban mended it. And he got them a charter from the King and his counsell, for to hold a general counsell, and gave it to name Assemblie. Thereat he was himself, and did helpe to make Masons, and gave them good charges."

2] ST. AUSTIN—After having spent some time at Rome, whither he had been on a pilgrimage, returned with forty other monks, among whom the sciences had been preserved, to England in the year 557. By these men the principles of Christianity were propagated among the people, and by their influence, in little more than sixty years, all the kings of the heptarchy were converted. He was a firm patron of Masonry, and encourager of architecture. He appeared at the head of the fraternity in founding the old cathedral of Canterbury; the cathedral of Rochester; St. Paul's, London; St. Peter's, Westminster; and many other public buildings of great merit.

3] ÆLFRED—or Alfred, the Great, youngest son of Æthelwolf, king of the West Saxons, was born in the year 849, at a place supposed to be Wantage, in Berkshire; and succeeded to the crown on the death of his brother Æthelred, in the year 871. No prince studied more to polish, and improve the moral condition of his subjects, than Alfred, and no one ever proved a better friend to Masonry. His example and powerful influence produced a speedy and effectual reformation in the dissolute and barbarous manners of his people. Hume furnishes the following particulars of this really great and good man:—"Alfred usually divided his time into three equal portions: one was employed in sleep, and the reflect on of his body by diet and exercise; another in the dispatch of business; and a third in study and devotion. That he might more exactly measure the hours, he made use of burning tapers of equal lengths, which he fixed in lanterns; an expedient suited to that rude age, when the art of describing sun dials, and the mechanism of clocks and watches were totally unknown. By this regular distribution of time, though he often labored under great bodily infirmities, this martial hero, who fought in person fifty six battles by sea and land, was able, during a life of no extraordinary length, to acquire more knowledge, and even to compose more books, than most studious men, blessed with great leisure and application, have done in more fortunate ages." Masonry claimed a great part of his attention; and he encouraged the mechanical arts of every description; invited from all quarters industrious foreigners to repopulate his country which had been desolated by the ravages of the Danes; introduced manufactures; patronised the inventor or improvement of any ingenious art, and appropriated a 7th part of his revenue to the maintenance of a large number of workmen engaged in rebuilding his ruined cities, castles, palaces and monasteries: founded the University of Oxford, and ended a glorious life, after a reign of twenty eight years, on the 28th of October A. D. 900.

4.] ATHELSTANE—was the grand son of Alfred; and like him an eminent patron of masonry. He succeeded to the throne in 924, and appointed his brother Edwin, patron of the Masons. He enjoyed the esteem of all the princes of Europe: was beloved and honored by his subjects. One blemish only, historians have been enabled to find in his character, and that is of so doubtful a nature, it had perhaps been better omitted. He was the first anointed king of England, and translated the Bible into the Saxon tongue, A. D. 930, (in the words of an ancient manuscript, written in the time of Edward IV.) "when he had brought the land into rest and peace, built many great works, and encouraged many masons, from France, who were appointed overseers thereof, and brought with them the charges and regulations of the Lodges, preserved since the Roman times." On the death of his brother, he undertook in person the direction of the lodges, and the art of Masonry was propagated in peace and security.

5] ELIAS ASHMOLE, ESQ.—a celebrated English philosopher and antiquary, and founder of the Ashmolean museum at Oxford—was born at Litchfield, in Staffordshire, the 23d May, 1617. He filled many offices, civil and military, but is more generally known as a diligent and curious collector of manuscripts.—he wrote the "history of the Order of the Garter," which obtained for him great popularity. He was elected, says his biographer, "a brother of the company of Free Masons; a favour esteemed so singular by the members, that kings themselves have not disdained to enter themselves the order." The following is his own account of the matter: "I was made a Free Mason at Warrington, Lancashire, with Col. Henry Mainwaring, of Kerthingham, in Cheshire, by Mr. Richard Penket, the Warden, and the fellow crafts, on the 16th October, 1646." Mr Ashmole gave considerable attention to the study of Masonry, and had commenced the compilation of its history. Of this, Dr. Knipe, of Christ-church, Oxford, observes; "As to the ancient society of Free-Masons, concerning whom you are desirous of knowing what may be known with certainty, I shall only tell you that if our worthy brother E. Ashmole, Esq. had executed his intended design, our fraternity had been as much obliged to him as the brethren of the most noble Order of the Garter." He died at South Lambeth, May 18, 1692.

6.] JAMES ANDERSON, ESQ.—This gentleman is known in masonic history, as one of the committee (with Dr. Desaguliers) appointed by the Duke of Montague, then Grand Master of Masons in England, to revise, arrange, and digest the Gothic constitutions, old charges, and general regulations. They were both men of genius and education, and executed the business entrusted to them in a faithful and acceptable manner. The work was printed in 1723, under the following title: "The Book of Constitutions of the Free-Masons: containing the History, Charges, Regulations, &c. of that Most Ancient and Right Worshipful Fraternity. For the use of the Lodges."

SEWING ROOM CHIT CHAT.

Bachelors are doubtless often exceedingly interested in the conversation of young ladies over their sewing, the delightful little technicalities of sewing phraseology are so profoundly and interestingly inexplicable. A plough boy listening to a scholastic disputation in Greek, may know just as much about what is going onward as a bachelor in a back parlor, when young ladies are plying the needle. "Cut it bias and stitch it up with herring bones, then take the gusset and fasten it up with a stomacher!" Now what can such talk as that mean? What is a "gusset?" Will any lady tell us what a gusset is? "Hem-stitch the gore!" What is a hem-stitch? and what is a gore? Are there any such words as these in the English language? Ought women to be allowed the use of such an unknown tongue? Why it is dangerous. Who knows what conspiracies and rebellions they may contrive and arrange within reach of our ears, before our faces under our very noses, by means of this unintelligible and mysterious language? If secret institutions are supposed to be dangerous to society, what are we to think of such an influence as this? Gracious powers! Our wives and daughters discoursing beside us in sounds that convey no meaning to our ears! A dozen female visitors chattering, and we not understanding one word of the conversation! Is it not time to look into this subject and see how far our negligence has betrayed us into danger? Why, at this very moment, who knows but the whole female race is about to rise and revolutionize mankind? Under the new administration we hope to see this subject investigated. These women should be looked to. They should be made to tell what they mean by "poplin" "gussets," and "gores," and such outlandish and unchristian words that no honest man can comprehend. "Cutting bias" may mean cutting throats for all we know. In the name of sense what are we to understand by "herring bone stitches?" What subtle mischief may there not be at the bottom of all this? Let it be seen to! In the name of safety let the women be "opinioned!"—Picayune

No. 4.

WHO ARE BRUTES?

To no being in the wide universe is the noble nature of man so obvious, as to himself: and in nothing is his great power of discrimination so apparent, as in the distinction he every where perceives between his own species and the brute creation. He arrives at it by no tedious process of observation, by no slow step of logic; but intuitively. He is not even dependent upon any higher intelligence for information upon this point. The rejector of revelation, who cares for no future, employs himself only in reference to his present state and feels only the wants of the brute, is still firmly convinced that he is something more. We ask him what has produced the conviction, and he answers that he has a soul. But has not also the brute? We can trace our term "soul" back no farther than the Latin "Anima," or Greek "Pneuma," which meant nothing more than the living principle, hence they gave not only a soul to brutes, but to plants.

A nice observer would conclude that the contempt which our lordly race is in the habit of casting upon the brute creation, was reciprocated. The impetuous and irritable farmer is frequently rebuked by a look of cool and philosophical wonder from his ox.

Why certain excesses peculiar to the genus homo are denominated brutal is unaccountable. The only animal (the hog) whose habits might be brought as a justification for the epithet, has been found by Phrenologists to be laboring under a large development of alienativeness, and is therefore wholly excepted from responsibility.

I knew one who could see the soul through the eye of his friend. I have seen the same in a horse, what human eye is so big with "high resolve?" Nor does the eye belie his real character. Who is there that has seen and has not loved his patient meekness, his noble and graceful mien, his affectionate and watchful care, his self-sacrificing devotion; he (the man not the horse) is a brute.

The Shepherd's dog is worth more to the shepherd than a man. He can place more confidence in his intelligence as well as his integrity. Man will without provocation beat his spaniel, while it lays in meek submission at his feet and licks his hand as if to wash away the stain of the unmerited insult! Which has the soul?

The bee and the beaver are better builders and the ant is a better provider than man. The bird of passage is more wise, for it knows its way to an unseen home. Which has the soul? "But," it is objected, "that by which animals perceive, remember, compare and choose, is instinct;" while the cause of the same results in man, is reason—"wonderful distinction!"—what is instinct? It seems then so far above reason that it should have a better immortality. "But" it is again said; "it is reason's peculiarity to be susceptible of education." Begging pardon of our scientific students, I believe the Dog, Horse and Elephant to be scholars more apt than they. That they cannot pronounce long Latin names will be no objection with men of common sense. If the donkey should be cited as less expert, it should be remembered that with them there are no colleges where one Ass may learn to imitate the braying of another.

We would not be understood to say that the high opinion entertained by man of his own powers, savors in the least of egotism; for it is a known rule of law that slander of a class is not slander, and a libel upon a community is no libel; and it is no more than a fair application of this rule to say that the fulsome adulation of a species is no flattery. The maxim "Let another praise thee and not thine own lips" is from a very antiquated source, and if not obsolete, was evidently intended for individual use. It is one of the beneficial results of the "division of labor" produced by civilization, that all the pleasant sensations of self-praise may be produced without any of its odium. Thus while it would be very improper for two individuals to speak half that they think of their own merits, they may "change works" and laud each other to the skies with perfect propriety. Nor do we think that man's sense of his high destiny is at all exaggerated; we only fear that he underrates that of his fellow brute. We may laugh at the Indian who thinks that in his Elysian hunting grounds but how do we know that he is wrong? From revelation? If we look for the relative position of the two classes there, we find it given with more truth than flattery, and doubtless the Divine Spirit might say now as well as in the days of Isaiah. "The Ox knoweth his owner and the Ass his master's crib, but my people do not know, Israel doth not consider."

"His faithful dog shall bear him company."

TO ———.

CAUSE AND EFFECT.

There's something in that deep blue eye,
At times so lovely, and so sad;
There's something in that high white brow
That thrilling shoots through every vein;
There's something in that beauteous cheek
And in that sweetly smiling lip,
That kindles in my beating heart:
A flame that never can expire.

WHAT WORDS MAY DO.

An article which will be found to contain some pathos, much egotism, and considerable morality.

We are more apt to say things than to consider their consequences; and we are not aware of the good or evil that our every unguarded expression produces.—The virtue as well as the necessity of kindly speaking, the following narration will serve to illustrate:—

Some months since we had occasion to visit an extensive jewelry establishment in a neighboring city, for the purpose of having a piece of plate delicately polished. The proprietors finding us somewhat troublesome, particularly as to the service required, with the avowed object of having it readily attended to, but—as we had the charity to suppose—the real one of getting rid of tedious customers; ushered us into an upper apartment, where ourselves and our wishes were made known to the mechanic who was to perform the operation.

He was a man who had apparently seen his sixtieth year. His frame evidently retained much of the vigor of manhood, but his thin locks of hair—scattered over a head that a phrenologist would call "fine"—had become prematurely white, and indicated to the beholder "an acquaintance with sorrow and misfortune."—Through a pair of spectacles, which he evidently wore to assist a feeble sight, he eyed us—for strangers as we thought ourselves—unusually close. However, as his look partook more of surprise than suspicion, we did not allow it to annoy us. Yet he evidently had some object in this scrutiny. During the few minutes of our explaining our want, and in fact, during the whole time of our stay, he seemed unnecessarily abstract—and it was with much difficulty that we made ourselves comprehended. Once, and only once, did he wake from his reverie; and that was when one of the proprietors, for the purpose of directing our attention to some curious object, called us by name. He then turned his face upon ours with as much eagerness as if he would have penetrated the very workings of our thought. This action lasted but a moment. With a less intense expression of countenance, he again busied himself with the matters before him; yet we could discover in his look of deep satisfaction that he had evidently convinced himself upon some point of enquiry which deeply interested him. We need not say that the strange conduct we witnessed in him had so far attracted our attention as to have taken a firm hold upon our curiosity.

Not many mornings after the interview above described, we were honored with a reciprocal visit from the old gentleman. He came apparently to get a more definite understanding of our wishes, though, as we shall hereafter discover, with the evident intention of satisfying himself upon a matter which more thoroughly occupied his mind. We had reason to suppose that we were however unconsciously, the cause of some of the uneasiness he so continually exhibited. After considerable hesitation, he requested that he might be permitted to see us for a moment alone.—We passed into an adjoining room.

Upon his carefully closing the door and as carefully removing his spectacles, he turned, and looking at us smilingly, yet keenly in the eye, said,—“do you not remember me?” But seeing we did not recognize him, he continued—“How should you? I am so changed, and you met me but once—then but for a moment. Still,” said he—grasping our hands with an energy which showed the depth of his emotion, yet considerably to our discomfiture—“I have often thought of that meeting with a pleasure that I cannot express; and the happiness I now experience in holding you by the hand, is a delight I had long abandoned as hopeless.”

From the warmth of the old gentleman's expressions and the ignorance on our part of meriting them, we began seriously to entertain doubts as to his sanity. Still we did not know but what we might have come in possession of some forgotten relative, or, what would have been better in times like the present, that try both pockets and souls, have, by some freak of fortune come in possession of a cotton plantation, or some such sweetener of the "bitter cup." But upon very little reflection we were satisfied the last could not be the case: such success would have been too good—yet from not having an overabundance of relatives, we did not know but the former might be the true conjecture. But again, we thought of his deficient sight. This at once solved in our minds the dilemma, and we informed him he must have mistaken us for other persons.

"No! no!" replied he impatient at our distrustful tone, "the voice, manner, look, all are yours. It can have been no others!" The certainty with which he spoke caused us to make no further reply and he again commenced.

"I am not mistaken in the name? yours is—"

"——," said we, aiding his memory.

"You resided in —— in July, 18——"

We assented.

"On an anniversary day of that month, about twilight, do you not remember meeting with a person considerably beyond your years in a loathsome state of inebriation? The old gentleman's voice trembled as he spoke.

The light at last began to break in upon us—we had an indistinct recollection of such an adventure.

"You kindly volunteered to support him on his way home—he roughly refused your kindness—do you remember, when he did so, what you said to him?" Here again the old gentleman passionately shook us by the hand, while the tears coursed down his cheeks in a stream. He continued, almost stifled with emotion. "You did not say much "my dear friend I pity you," is what hundreds, under the same circumstances, might have said. But although," continued he in calmer tones, "those words are in the mouth of every body, and have become almost meaningless; yet the tone and manner in which they were then said, made them every thing to me. The next instant I was myself. I felt as if a thousand arrows had been lodged in my heart. Ah! if I now am any comfort to my family—if I am looked upon with regard by friends—if I have any hopes for the present or the future; to that single expression, and that alone am I indebted for them all."

The old gentleman ceased. Unlike the most of heroes he has not since his reformation, surprised the world by "writing a book" or by the transaction of any "wonderful feat." He is simply an industrious mechanic—well skilled in the department he pursues; has the honor of being in full communion with the church, and we think we may safely assert that he appears quite as comfortable, as if he had seized upon the admiration of mankind, by the "vaultings of proud ambition."

ON DIT.

The memory is a net work whose meshes, irregularly expanding and contracting, suffer the lesser and sometimes more important truths to glide through and away, while at the same time, with almost palpable inconsistency, it retains the details and general principles of certain subjects with wondrous security.

THE DEAD NAPOLEON.—A Paris correspondent gives the following singular anecdote, connected with the funeral honor paid to the great Emperor:

You are aware that the convo reached Courbevois on Monday afternoon. In the night of that day two men en bourgeois, or, if you will, in plain clothes, presented themselves on board the Dorade steamer. The elder of them desired leave to approach the imperial remains. He was refused, but a whisper from him to the officer in command produced an immediate change. He was instantly admitted, and ushered to the platform. He gazed for a moment, fell heavily on his knees, and, burying his face in his hands and resting both on the foot of the coffin, he remained for twenty five minutes, weeping and in prayer—the former certainly, for his face was deluged in tears. When at the end of that time he attempted to rise, whether from emotion or that he was benumbed by the dreadful severity of the night or from both causes together, he was unable, and was obliged to call for the assistance of some sentinels who were at hand wondering at the spectacle, and who now found it was Marshal Soult.

Insanity from breaking a vow.—The Boston Post tells the following story:

A woman, laboring under an extreme degree of religious insanity, was brought up before the police on Tuesday. Some months ago, she took an oath never to drink ardent spirits, and having on one or two recent occasions, departed from her vow, the thought of it has turned her brain. When brought into court, she threw herself upon her knees, and began to pray as rapidly as she could utter the words—"O, Lord, forgive me." She was sent to the Asylum for the Insane at South Boston. She has not been an intemperate woman.

SNAKES AND SNAKE CHARMERS.

It is only on visiting, and residing for a time in India that one can become thoroughly sensible of the immense benefit conferred by St. Patrick upon Ireland, when he preached his famous

"sarin
That gave the frogs and toads a twist,
And banished all the varmin."

among which we may reasonably include snakes of all kinds and degrees. To new-comers in Hindostan, and particularly to those of nervous temperament, these creatures constitute a source of perpetual alarm.—Their numbers are immense, and no place is sacred from their visitations. Just fancy the agreeable surprise resulting from such little occurrences as the following, which are far from being rare. You get up in a morning, after a feverish night perhaps; languidly you reach for your boots, and upon pulling on one, feel something soft before your toes, and on turning it upside down, and giving it a shake, out pops a small snake of the carpet tribe (as they are called, probably from their domestic propensities,) wondering what can be the cause of his being thus rudely ejected from his night quarters. Or suppose, at any time during the day, you should be musically inclined: you take your flute from its resting place, and proceed to screw it together, but find, on making an attempt to play, that something is the matter, and on peeping into it, discover that a little serpentine gentleman has there sought and found a snug lodgment. Perhaps your endeavor to give it breath with your mouth makes Mr. Snake feel his habitation in the instrument uncomfortably cold, and, ere you are aware of his presence, he is out, and wriggling among your fingers.

Such incidents as these cause rather unpleasant starts to those who are new to Hindostanic matters, though the natives of the land, or persons who had been long resident in it, might only smile at the new-comer's uneasiness, and tell him that these little intruders are perfectly harmless. But even with the assurance of this fact, it is long ere most Europeans can tolerate the sight and presence of these snakes, much less feel comfortable under their cold touch. Besides, it is but too well known that all these creatures are not innocuous. Well do I remember the fright that one poor fellow got in the barracks at Madras. He had possibly been indulging too freely over night; at least, when he arose in the morning in question, he felt thirsty in the extreme. Yawning most volitionally, he made up to one of the room windows, where stood a large water bottle or jar, one of those long-necked clay things in which they usually keep fluids in the east. Upon taking this inviting vessel into his hands, he observed that there seemed to be but little water in it, yet enough as he thought, to cool his parched throat; and he had just applied it to his lips, when something touched them—certainly not water, whatever else it might be. He hastily withdrew the vessel from his mouth, though still retaining it in his hands, when, to his amazement and horror, a regular cobra, the most deadly and dangerous of all the common serpents of India, reared its hideously distended and spectacled head from the jar, not a foot from its disturbers nose. "Oh, murder!" cried the poor fellow, who was a son of Erin; and as he uttered the exclamation, he dashed bottle, snake and all to the ground, and took to his heels, nor stopped until he was a full hundred yards from the spot. Hero he told his story in safety, and the intruder was in good time got rid of by the cautious use of firearms.

Very different from the conduct of this fellow was that of one of his comrades in the same barracks, who was exposed to an almost unprecedented trial from a similar cause. In the vicinity of the barracks assigned to the European soldiers in India, there is usually a number of little solitary buildings or cells, where the more disorderly members of the corps are confined for longer or shorter terms, by order of the commanding officer. In one of these, on a certain occasion, was locked up poor Jock Hall, a Scotsman belonging to Edinburgh or Leith. Jock had got intoxicated, and being found in that condition at the hour of drill, was sentenced to eight days' solitary imprisonment. Soldiers in India have their bedding partly furnished by the Honorable Company, and find the remainder for themselves. About this part of house-furnishing, however, Jock Hall troubled himself very little, being one of those hardy reckless beings on whom privation and suffering seemed to make no impression. A hard floor was as good as a down-bed to Jock, and therefore, as he never scrupled to sell what he got, it may be supposed that his sleeping furniture was none of the most abundant or select. Such as it was, he was stretched upon and under it one night in his cell, during his term of penance, and possibly was reflecting on the impropriety of in future putting "an enemy into his mouth to steal away his brains," when lo! he thought he heard a rustling in the cell, close by him. At this moment he recollected that he had not, as he ought to have done, stopped up an air hole, which entered the cell on a level with its floor, and also with the rock, externally, on which the building was planted. A strong suspicion of what had happened, or was about to happen, came over Jock's mind, but he knew it was probably too late to do any good, could he even find the hole in the darkness, and get it closed. He therefore lay still, and in a minute or two heard another rustle close to him, which was followed by the cold slimy touch of a snake upon his bare foot! Who in such a situation would not have started and bawled for help! Jock did neither; he lay stone still, and held his peace, knowing that his cries would most probably have been unheard by the distant guard. Had his bed-clothes been more plentiful, he might have endeavored to protect himself by wrapping them closely around him, but this their scantiness forbade. Accordingly, being aware that, although a motion or touch will provoke snakes to bite, they will not generally do it without such incitement. Jock held himself as still as if he had been a log. Meanwhile, his horrible bed-fellow, which he at once felt to be one of great size, crept over his feet, legs, and body, and, lastly, over his very face. Nothing but the most astonishing firmness of nerve, and the consciousness that the moving of a muscle would have signed his death warrant, could have enabled the poor fellow to undergo this dreadful trial. For a whole hour did the reptile crawl backwards and forwards over Jock's body and face, as if satisfying itself, seemingly, that it had nothing to fear from the recumbent object on its own part. At length it took up a position somewhere about his head, and went to rest in apparent security. The poor soldier's trial, however, was not over. Till daylight, he remained in the same posture, flat on his back, without daring to stir a limb, from the fear of disturbing his dangerous companion. Never, perhaps, was dawn so anxiously longed for by mortal man. When it did come, Jock cautiously looked about him, arose noiselessly, and moved over to the corner of his cell, where there lay a pretty large stone. This he seized, and looked about for the intruder. Not seeing the snake, he became assured that it was under his pillow. He raised the end of this just sufficiently to get a peep of the creature's crest. Jock then pressed his knee firmly on the pillow, but allowed the snake to wriggle out its head, which he battered to pieces with the stone. This done, the courageous fellow for the first time breathed freely.

When the hour for breakfast came, Jock, who thought little about the matter after it was fairly over, took the opportunity of the opening of the door to throw the snake out. When the officer, whose duty it was to visit the cells for the day, was going his round, he perceived a crowd around the cell-door examining the reptile, which was described by the natives as one of the most venomous character, its bite being invariably and rapidly mortal. The officer, on being told that it had been killed by a man in the adjoining cell, went in and inquired into the matter. "When did you first know that there was a snake in the cell with you?" said he. "About nine o'clock last night," was Jock's reply. "Why didn't you call the guard?" asked the officer. "I thought the guard wadna hear me, and I was feared I might tramp on't, so I just lay still." "But you might have been bit: did you know that you would have died instantly?" "I kent that very weel," said Jock, but they say that snakes winna meddle with you, if you dinna meddle with them; so I just let it crawl as it liked." "Well my lad, I believe you did what was best after all, but it was what no one man in a thousand could have done." When the story was told, and the snake shown to the commanding officer, he thought the same, and Jock, for his extraordinary nerve and courage, got a remission of his punishment. For some time, at least, he took care how he again got into such a situation as to expose him to the chance of passing another night with such a bed-fellow.

It has been frequently asserted that the most tremendous of the snake tribe, the boa-constrictor, does not now exist in Hindostan, and has not done so for a considerable time. This statement is to be taken with some reservation. When our Anglo-Indian army were called to the field a few years ago, to teach a lesson to an obstinate native potentate, two of our soldiers left a temporary encampment of the troops, in order to indulge in a bathe. They had a portion of jungle to cross, and, in doing so, the foot of one of them slipped into a sort of hole. This proved to be an old elephant-trap; this is to say, a pit of considerable size dug in the earth, and covered over with branches, sticks, and such like matters, so as to deceive the wild elephant into placing his mighty weight upon it, when he sinks and is unable to get out again. The soldier got his foot withdrawn from the trap, though at the cost of his shoe, which the closeness of the branches caused to come off. Little did the poor fellow know at the moment what a fate he had narrowly escaped! But he soon became sensible of it. On looking down to see whither his shoe was gone, and if it was recoverable, he beheld a sight, which, but for the hold he had of his companion's arm, would have made him yet totter into the pit from sheer horror. Through the opening made by his foot, he saw an enormous boa-constrictor, with its body coiled up, and its head curved, watching the opening above, and evidently prepared to dart on the falling prey. Hurrying from the spot, the two soldiers informed some of their officers, who immediately came to the trap with firearms. The creature was still there, and, indeed, had most probably remained in the place for a length of time, preying on the unfortunate animals, great and small, which tumbled into its den. Ball and swan-shot, both used at once, brought the reptile's life to a close, and it was got out of the hole. It proved to be fifteen feet long, and about the general thickness of a man's thigh. The skin and scales were most beautiful. It was intended to make two cases of the skin, for holding the regimental colors, and would have been large enough for the purpose. But it was entrusted to unskilful hands, and got withered and wasted in the preparation.

The Hindoos, or at least the serpent-charmers among them, pretend, as is well known, to handle all sorts of snakes with impunity, to make them come and go at a call, and, in short, to have a cabalistic authority over the whole race. These pretensions are necessary to the exercise of their profession, which consists, in part, in ridding private houses of troublesome visitants of this description. One of these serpent-charmers will assert to a householder that there are snakes about his premises, and partly from motives of fear, and partly from curiosity, the householder promises the man a reward, if he succeeds in showing and removing them. The juggler goes to work, and soon snakes are seen to issue from some corner or another, obedient to his call. The performer takes them up fearlessly, and they meet like old friends. In fact, the opinion of the more enlightened residents in India, is that the snakes and their charmer are old friends, that he hid them there, and of course, new where to find them; and, moreover, that having long ago extracted the poisonous fangs, he may well handle them without alarm. Still, a large portion of the community, Europeans as well as natives, believe that these charmers have strange powers over the snake tribe. In Madras, however, while I was there, this belief received a sad shake by the circumstances which occurred. One of the most noted serpent-charmers about the district, chanced one morning to get hold of a cobra, of considerable size, which he got conveyed to his home. He was occupied abroad all day, and had not time to get the dangerous fang extracted from the serpent's mouth. This, at least, is the probable solution of the matter. In the evening he returned to his dwelling considerably excited with liquor, and began to exhibit tricks with his snakes to various persons who were around him at the time. The newly caught cobra was brought out with the others, and the man, spirit valiant, commenced to handle the stranger like the rest. But the cobra darted at his chin, and bit it, making two marks like pin points. The poor juggler was sobered in an instant. "I am a dead man," he exclaimed. The prospect of immediate death made the maintenance of his professional mysticism a thing of no moment. "Let the creature alone," said he to those about him, who would have killed the cobra: "it may be of service to others of my trade. To me it can be of no use. Nothing can save me." His professional knowledge was but too accurate. In two hours he was a corpse!

I saw him a short time after he died. His friends and brother jugglers had gathered around him, and had him placed on a chair in a sitting position. Seeing the detriment likely to result to their trade and interests from such a notion, they vehemently asserted that it was not the envenomed bite which had killed him. No, he only forgot one little word—one small portion of the charm." In fact, they declared that he was not dead at all, but only in a sort of swoon, for which, according to the rules of the cabalistic art, he would recover in seven days. But the officers of the barracks, close to which the deceased had lived, interfered in the matter. They put a guard of one or two men in the house, declaring that they would allow the body to remain unburied for seven days, but would not permit any trickery. Of course, the poor serpent charmer never came to life again. His death, and the manner of it, gave a severe blow as, has been already hinted, to the art and practice of snake-charming in Madras.

SKETCH OF TRAVEL.

From the London Metropolitan.

AMUSEMENTS OF THE PASHA OF EGYPT.

"Sans un petit brise d'amour
On s'ennuie même à la cour."

The approach to the ancient city of Grand Cairo is enchanting; contrasted with the barren sands of Alexandria, it appears a terrestrial paradise, and the eye of the traveller rests with delight on the broad majestic hills, its verdant fields, and their groves of graceful palms and sycamores.

The city itself is a most miserable place, and although containing a population of three hundred thousand souls, does not possess a single street that in Europe would be deemed worthy of that appellation. Most of the public buildings, and even some mosques of great magnificence are situated in mere lanes, while the dirt and rubbish with which they are encumbered render walking almost impossible. What most surprises the European at Cairo is the singular contrasts it ever moment presents to his view, and the opposition in the manners, costumes, garb, and complexion of the inhabitants to every thing similar in his own country.

The pasha resides in the citadel. The new palace that he has constructed is unquestionably the most splendid in the Turkish empire; its internal decorations combine the magnificence of the East with the classical taste of the West—the talents of some of the first artists from both quarters having been employed in its establishments.

The only objects worth seeing in the vicinity of Cairo, though very different in their nature, are—1st. The ancient sepulchres of the caliphs, which by good judges are considered as the purest specimens of Saracenic architecture; their elegant domes peering above the groves of cypresses, and glittering in the sun, produce a magical effect. 2nd. The shabara, the favorite palace of Mohammed Ali, about three miles from Cairo, on the banks of the Nile. The palace itself is small, but the gardens are vast and magnificent. In the middle of an orange grove is a kiosque, one of the most elegant and fantastic creations that, even in the East, the eye can light on. Ascending by a magnificent flight of marble steps, you enter a beautiful portico; when this portico is past, a beautiful quadrangular colonnade of white marble is discovered, surrounding a piece of water, upon which there are two or three barges, gilded in the most costly manner, and attached by silken cables to the columns. A highly ornamented balustrade surrounds the whole, from which several flights of steps lead down to the water, guarded by statues of crocodiles, of colossal dimensions. Off this colonnade are several splendid apartments, the entrance to which is concealed by purple curtains of silk and gold, that beautifully contrast with the dazzling whiteness of the marble columns.

It is here that the pasha comes to repose from the toils of the divan, and to recreate among his women. Happy the Circassians who are admitted to the kiosque—it is considered as the highest mark of favor that their haughty master can show them. The pasha takes great delight in rowing them about the piece of water, and, on reaching the middle he upsets the bark, lightly clad in a calico caftan and a juba. He has no difficulty in reaching the colonnade by swimming, where he throws himself on a heap of luxurious cushions spread for his reception, and contemplates the scene with an air of mock gravity, while the black eunuchs are seen precipitating themselves from the balustrade into the water, to rescue the half-drowned Odaliskoe.

How strictly in character with Turkish barbarity is this cruel diversion of the pasha's! Mohammed's virtues, it would appear, are, after all, but merely superficial, for if we only penetrate their polished exterior, we discover a core of unenlightened barbarism. Like all his countrymen, he looks upon the loveliest part of the creation as the mere instruments of his brutal pleasures, as inferior beings in the scale of creation, brought into this world to please him by their beauty, and to gratify his caprice.

What a fine subject for a picture in the hands of a skilful painter the above scene would make! The splendid kiosque with its marble colonnade, the black forms of the eunuchs skimming the glassy surface of the wave, to rescue the terrified Circassians, who in their fright, expose those charms which modesty seeks to conceal; while the haughty pasha is seen on his luxurious couch, feasting his eyes on their half-naked charms, and their cries.

The court of Egypt fully realizes the vivid descriptions of oriental grandeur and magnificence that we read of in the eastern tales, and carries back the mind of the spectator to the days of Haroun Alrachid. The Nubian guard, mounted on beautiful white Arabian horses—their splendid dress of scarlet and gold—and their jet black and glossy skins; the functionaries and pages in their rich costumes; the pipe bearers, with the gilded appurtenances of their office, present an ensemble of oriental and picture-que that dazzles the imagination. Mohammed Ali is both costly and magnificent in his habits; he is fond of fine and richly caparisoned horses, and of lofty dromedaries, and he spares no expense to gratify his favourite taste.

The court is never so brilliant as during the feast of the Beiram, when the pasha retires to the shabara, and shuts himself up among his favorite women. At this time, the apartments, are brilliantly illuminated, the colonnade filled with the pasha's officers, some reclining, smoking on the rich divans, others conversing and examining their costly arms. At night, when the moon rises, silencing with her rays the glassy surface of the placid water in the centre, you may behold groups of young Turks, in their blood-red shawls, casting an envious and voluptuous eye on the element still warm from the charms of the beautiful Circassians; while the breeze from the Nile wafts the sweetest perfumes, and the air resounds with the delicious strains of Mozart and Rossini, played by the military bands of the pasha. The effect of such a scene is more in character with the legends of fairy land and romance than with the sober realities of the nineteenth century.

To obtain a clear view of contemporary history is always difficult, but the future historian will unquestionably rank Mohammed Ali as one of the most extraordinary men of his age. He has shown, that in the hand of a skilful politician the most different means may be applied to the same ends. In Egypt, a studied aggregation of every abuse that can tend to desolate and oppress, to break the spirit of a nation, to damp its industry, had for centuries been in full operation. The difficulties he has had to overcome were immense, and his labors have evinced the power of a single mind in overcoming obstacles when inflexibly applied to the pursuit of a single object.

When we were at Cairo, pioneers were at work constructing a carriage road between that city and Alexandria, and since our return to England, we understand that a diligence, on the plan of the American stage coaches, has already been sent out, for the purpose of running between the two cities. But the most important feature in the history of Mohammed's career is the labors of two English engineers, who, by boring have discovered water in several places of the desert. The absence of this element in those immense regions has been the greatest barrier to the civilization of Africa, and directly proves how correct were the conjectures of many learned antiquarians, that the ancients were acquainted with the art of procuring this necessary element. Indeed it would be difficult to account otherwise for the immense and magnificent ruins that strike the eye of the traveller, in various parts where, at the present day no water exists.

The person of Mohammed Ali is imposing—a dark piercing eye, a clear marble oriental complexion, a long white beard that imparts a patriarchal air to his whole exterior, and a benignant smile. The spectator, while gazing on him, can scarcely imagine that he is looking on a man, who conceals the most profound dissimulation under the guise of frankness, possesses steadiness to pursue his ends, flexibility to vary his means, and the art of coloring his own ambition with the most specious pretences of justice and public utility. But it must be recollected that Mohammed is a Turk, and we ought to measure him by the standard of his own country, ere we too hastily form an erroneous estimate of his character.

THE GATHERER.

Resisting Temptation.—Three Indians in the vicinity of Green Bay became converted to the temperance cause, although previously given to "put the enemy in their mouths that stole away their brains." Three white men formed the charitable resolution of trying their sincerity. Placing a canteen of whiskey in their path, they hid themselves in the bushes to observe the motions of the red man. The first one recognized his old acquaintance, and with an "ugh!" and making a high step, he passed on. The second laughed, saying "me know you!" and walked round. The last one drew his tomahawk, and dashing it to pieces, exclaimed, "ugh! you conquer me—now I conquer you."

Illuminating Apparatus.—For the purpose of rendering distant stations discernable by during the trigonometrical survey, Lieut Drummond has constructed an instrument in which a globe of quick lime is exposed to the flames of alcohol urged by oxygen gas in the focus of a parabolic reflector. The lime under this treatment, when the experiment is made in the most perfect manner, emits a light eighty three times as intense as that given out by the brightest part of the flame of an Argand lamp; and this, concentrated and reflected by the mirror, has enabled the officers employed in that survey to connect very distant stations in the night time, in the most satisfactory manner.—Eng. Paper.

THE TELESCOPE.—The son of a spectacle-maker of Middleburgh in Holland, happening to amuse himself in his father's shop, by holding two glasses between his finger and thumb, and varying their distance, perceived the weathercock of the church spire opposite to him much larger than ordinary, and apparently much nearer, and turned upside down. This new wonder excited the amazement of the father; he adjusted two glasses on a board, rendering them moveable at pleasure; and thus formed the first rude imitation of a perspective glass, by which distant objects are brought to view. Galileo, a philosopher of Tuscany, hearing of the invention, set his mind to work in order to bring it to perfection. We can now view the magnificent system of the planet Saturn, by means of this instrument as distinctly as if we had performed a journey eight hundred millions of miles in the direction of that globe which at the rate of 50 miles an hour, would require a period of more than 1300 years to accomplish.—Dick's Ch. Phil.

New Lock.—A Mr. Williams, of Bristol England, has invented a lock without a keyhole. The means by which it is opened can be made in any variety of form—as a ring, a seal, a pencil case, or attached to a case whip or watch-key, or seal. The lock itself can be applied at a much lower price than any other English patent lock, and its advantages are that it is impervious to dust or wet, and cannot be picked.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.—We have on sundry occasions expressed our views upon this subject, and we hope not altogether without avail. It is in our legislature at present a topic of great interest, and there appears so strong a bias in favor of its abolition, that we feel we should not be doing justice to ourselves or our readers by withholding our opposition to such a measure. We are satisfied that it is not rightly appreciated by the people, who are too apt to leave the entire consideration of laws to their representatives.—Was it properly understood, they would pause long before they sanctioned a measure which is so materially to affect the vast interest of community. Therefore we say, agitate the question. If it shall then be found just, let capital punishment be struck from our statute books.

We have felt ourselves called upon particularly at this time from the introduction of resolutions in the house of Assembly praying for delay in the execution of two persons now under condemnation until this matter should be settled upon. These resolutions were the production of Mr. O'Sullivan, well known as one of the editors of the Democratic Review and at present a member of the lower house. However much ability the gentleman may have displayed on other occasions, on this, his heart has got so far the mastery of his head, we think as to give a considerable evidence that his views are not always to be relied upon. It is time that gentlemen like himself began to reflect upon the results there course is calculated to produce. They should remember the case of the king, who, in the abundance of his sympathy, had pardoned a man for murder at eight different times; but while signing his death-warrant for the committal of the ninth, was asked by one of his subjects whether he, the king, or the condemned, had been the cause of the destruction of the last eight lives. Of course his majesty was non plussed. So we think will be Mr. O'Sullivan and others when they look upon the amount of crime they are striving so to sanction. Take off the restraint, and the next instant outrage rises superior to justice.

The fallacy of substituting imprisonment for death, has been so repeatedly shown that it is wonderful that men of character and power can still be found countenancing its doctrines. Even Tuscany, possessing the mildest government, and the purest peasantry, has found indispensable the restoration of her capital punishment laws. In Louisiana, the only one of our states which has abrogated this necessary restraint, capital crime has increased, allowing for the increase of population, from fifty to seventy five per cent.—There is but little doubt that that State, like Tuscany, will have to return to those laws, which although severe, are the only preventive of murder. Some cry that they are "relics of a barbarous age." Because it originated in a barbarous time must it necessarily be corrupt. Experience does not say so. Others, with a less show of honesty, say their object is to inflict severer penalty, and speciously institute a comparison between the continual horrors of perpetual imprisonment, and those cut short by immediate death. This is well enough in talk, but what is it in practice? Suppose a man contemplating murder, would he sooner be arrested from the committal of the diabolical act, by thoughts of imprisonment or death. One brings with it the terrific dread of being sent unprepared to meet the offended majesty of heaven, while the other is full of hope, that he may have such time given for repentance as will wash away the guilt.

We are no greater lovers of this sad punishment than Mr. O'Sullivan and others—we look upon its infliction with eyes quite as full of tears—we approve of it only from a firm conviction of its necessity.

HILLHOUSE THE POET.—The death of this gentleman, is an irreparable loss to American literature.—Both in this country and Europe his productions have been esteemed as possessing the double merit of being sound in principle, at the same time full of poetic energy. His mind was of too pure a character to pursue a popular course; this accounts for his works not having been as extensively read as those of many of our less powerful authors. Those, however, who have taken pleasure in reflecting upon what they have read, justly place him among the first writers of the age.—The design as well as the glowing imagery of "Haddad" and "Percy's Mosque," have in our language scarcely been surpassed. When our literature shall have become so complete, as to warrant collecting and arranging in a durable form, we shall then see the dramas of Mr. Hillhouse placed, as they deserve to be, in the very front rank. He died the present month at his residence N. Haven, Ct. Commencing the year with the death of such an individual, brings with it a feeling of sadness which we hope not often to experience.

A correspondent, writing from Liberty, Missouri, says:—"We had a procession on the anniversary of St. John, and including visiting brethren, our number exceeded 80, and all the right-kind of brethren. This effort, considering we are bordering on the confines of civilization, may be taken as something of an evidence, that the good spirit has not ceased to exist, at least in our own section of country."

The brethren of Borodino, Onondaga co. are about holding a meeting to take into consideration the propriety of petitioning the Grand Lodge of this State, for a Charter to commence labor at that place.

JACOB TEN BROECK VAN VECHTEN, Esq. for several years the Grand High Priest of the Grand Chapter, of this State, died in this city, on Tuesday last, after a distressing and protracted illness of nearly three years.

The incipient steps have been taken to form a new Lodge in this city, by the name of Washington Lodge, No. —. Geo. S. Gibbons, W. M. John Owens, S. W. and James Steward, J. W. A dispensation to commence labor, will we understand, be immediately applied for. The new Lodge, will embrace a portion of Mount Vernon Lodge, together with several brethren, at present not members with any Masonic body.

Mr. Whale's Grand Fancy Ball, comes off on Wednesday evening next, at Stanwix Hall. If we are to take the programme, as published, as any evidence, it will be a splendid affair.

New German Dictionary.—The learned lexicographers, the brothers Grimms, have been induced by the King of Prussia to settle at Berlin, in order to undertake a dictionary of the German language.

MR. HOFFMAN.—I am pleased to discover symptoms of life among the literary gentlemen of Albany. The absorbing incidents and topics of the late political campaign, seemed to have at least suspended animation, in those from whom we might have expected contributions for the gratification and improvement of the friends of science and literature; but the last numbers of the Register justify the expectation that a new impulse has been given to some of our writers, who evince the power and disposition to give us something better suited to our taste than dry and unprofitable political discussions. The combination of the "7" to amuse and instruct us, is a favorable indication; and I hope they will follow up their well begun labors, and thus give increased value and interest to the Register, as well as exercise to their fertile pens. While they hold up to view in their true colors the disgusting displays of the inflated egotist, and point us to the unpretending modesty of the meritorious author, while they deal "equal and exact justice" to all, and give us the labors of taste, talent and genius, the public will appreciate their efforts, and award to them their approbation. Let them go on, and so long as they pursue their course they appear to have marked out for themselves, you may well be proud of their acquaintance, and value as others do their contributions for your paper.

Intelligence.

The following, from the Boston Herald, is a pretty fair specimen of what we are coming to. If we prove McLeod guilty, we will not only hang him like a dog—but our "dam'd countrymen" will make crow's meat of any man who takes his part.

IMPORTANT FROM THE FRONTIER.—We learn from a gentleman who arrived in this city last evening at 12 o'clock, in whose veracity we think we may depend, that another most cowardly attack has been committed on the Disputed Territory, upon three American gentlemen by some fellows calling themselves 'mounted patrols.' It seems that the gentlemen above named viz.—Thomas F. Templeton, George Cady and John H. Kenwick, were proceeding from Bangor to Canada, and on their arrival near Madawasca, a party of armed British soldiers met them. Mr. Cady inquired of one of the soldiers, the most direct road to take. He gave him the necessary information, when four others came up and asked Mr. Cady some impertinent questions as to the object of his journey; Mr. C. replied very properly and proceeded to turn the horses into the road, when one of the squad stepped in front of the carriage and asked what the feelings of the people were in relation to the burning of the Caroline. Mr. Templeton said they were very naturally indignant at such a distasteful act, and that every true American warmly expressed a hope that McLeod, the leader of the offenders, should suffer the severest punishment of the laws of the country. "If McLeod burnt that old hulk," replied the soldier, "he deserves our thanks, and if a hair of his head is injured, you and your damned countrymen will be made to repent in dust and ashes." The gentleman made no other reply to this insolent remark than to request the leaders to allow them a free and unmolested passage.—But four or five of the cowards seized the reins, and charged the gentlemen as "spies," and refused to let them pass unless they subjected themselves to a search. The gentlemen remonstrated upon this unparalleled proceeding, and as they were unarmed, not having even a cane to protect themselves with, they were unable to offer any resistance. One of the ruffians then seized Mr. Cady by his throat and attempted to pull him from the carriage, the other two gentlemen threw the soldier from the carriage who fell prostrate in the street. The whole party then came up and made a dreadful attack upon the gentlemen, during which Mr. Cady was knocked down with the butt of a musket, and Mr. Templeton received a severe wound in the shoulder with a bayonet; Mr. Kenwick attempted to escape by running, but one of the party fired upon him, and he received a ball in his right thigh—he fell to the ground from the wound. At this stage of the crisis one of the officers came up, and checked further hostilities. He immediately procured assistance, and had the wounded gentleman conveyed to the camp and medical aid immediately procured for him. After which they were by their request taken to the town from which they last came, where a deposition was drawn up and the facts above recorded sworn to.

Mr. BACKUS, the Deaf and Dumb Printer, whose life was consumed by the conflagration at Canajoharie, has just returned from a visit to New York, Hartford, Norwich, Boston, &c., with the means of resuming his business, and making his houseless family comfortable and happy. Never did benevolence dispense its blessing more worthily or with a more liberal hand.—He desires us to tender, for himself and his wife, their mute but heartfelt thanks for the generous sympathy which has so abundantly relieved them.

Mr. BACKUS hopes to get out the first number of the "MONTGOMERY PHOENIX," which is to rise from the ashes of the RADII, by the middle of February.—In that paper he will make particular and appropriate acknowledgments of the kindness and generosity of his fellow-citizens.—Journal.

Late and important from Texas.—The last running steamship Neptune, Capt. Rollins, arrived yesterday from Galveston, bringing dates from that city to the 31 inst.

The news from the frontier, if true, is highly important. A letter had been received at Austin from San Antonio which declares positively that it is the intention of the Mexican Government to invade Texas. According to the letter the loan of $3,000,000 lately obtained by Mexico is to be expended as follows: $2,000,000 towards purchasing and arming two steamships to act against the Texian navy; the balance to be applied in carrying on operations by land: Gen Arista to have the command of the invaders. His first object is to take possession of Galia and San Antonio, and then propositions will be made to the Texian Government of course the latter will not accept.—New Or. Pic.

Shocking Accident.—A man named Henry Cramer was killed instantly yesterday forenoon at the mills of Mr. John H. Catkamier, in this village. He was engaged in oiling the machinery near the large cog wheel when his coat was caught in the cogs of a small wheel and he was drawn in, the cogs passing downward across his body from shoulder to hip, forcing out his heart, liver and entrails—and mangling his person dreadfully. The small cast iron wheel was broken by its action upon his body. He was a German by birth, and has been in this country about 2 years, during which time he has lived with Mr. C. His age was 35 years and he was a steady, industrious man. He has left no family, nor has he any relative in this country.—Poughkeepsie Tel.

AN EXTRAORDINARY MAN DEAD.—It is stated that Francia, Dictator of Paraguay, died on the 29th of September last. A junta of five members of the legislature have succeeded him in the government. Francia caused himself to be declared Dictator in 1814, and his management of the affairs of the government over which he presided, was marked with wisdom to the day of his death. He was truly and extraordinary and worthy TYRANT—for tyrant he was in the most extreme sense of the word.—N. Y. Standard.

WAR.—The Montreal Transcript spits fire after the following fashion:

"The government of England will protect McLeod from infamie and a thousand American lives will be sacrificed for every hair of his head, if harm befall him."

Keep easy man, for if McLeod is guilty, he must suffer, and "no talk back" about it either.—Atlas.

A deaf and dumb man of Lopurville, who has been educated at one of our northern asylums, having satisfied himself, on some reading on the subject, that his infirmity might be remedied, recently punctured the drum of his ear with an instrument of his own, and restored the lost sense. The most remarkable feature in the case is that, from not being able to articulate a sound at the time of the operation, he acquired the use of the language in a few hours, and in four days was capable of taking part in a sustained conversation.

Melancholy Event.—On Monday evening last Mr. James Smith, of Mountjoy township, met with his death in a sudden and unexpected manner. We understand he went to descend into the cellar, and the steps having been removed contrary to his knowledge, he was precipitated to the bottom, and died instantly, supposed from a dislocation of the neck.—Geltyburg Sen.

Fishing Bounty.—Between Thursday the 31st, and Wednesday, the 6th inst., $61,000, were paid by the Collector of the Port of Barnstable, to the owners and crews of 260 cod fishing vessels.—New Bedford Reg.

MASONIC SONG.

When a Lodge of Free-Masons are cloath'd in their Aprons,

In Order to make a new Brother ; [Stands,
With firm Hearts and clean Hands, they repair to their
And justly support one another.

Trusty brother take care, of Eave-droppers beware,
'Tis a just and solemn occasion ;
Give the word and the blow, that workmen may know
There's one asks to be made a Free Mason.

The Master stands due, and his Officers too,
While the Craftsmen are plying their stations ;
The Apprentices stand right for the command
Of a Free and Accepted Mason.

Now traverse your Ground, as in duty you're bound,
And rever the authentic oration,
That leads to the way, and proves the first Ray
Of the Light of an Accepted Mason.

Here's Words, and here's Signs, and here's Problems and Lines,

And here's room too, for deep speculation ;
Here Virtue and Truth are taught to the youth,
When first he called up to a Mason.

Hieroglyphics shine bright, and here light reverts light,
On the Rules and the Tools of vocation ;
We work and we sing the Craft and the King,
'Tis both duty and choice to a Mason.

What is said or is done, is here truly laid down,
In this Form of our high installation ;
Yet I challenge all men to know what I mean,
Unless he's an Accepted Mason.

The ladies claim Right to come into our Light,
Since the Apron they say, is their Bearing ;
Can they subject their will ? Can they keep their Tongues still ?

And let talking be changed into hearing.

This difficult task is the least we can ask,
To secure us on sundry occasion ;
When with this they comply, our utmost we'll try
To raise Lodges for lady Free-masons.

Till this can be done, must each Brother be mum,
Tho' the fair one should wheedle or tease on ;
Be just, true and kind, but still bear in mind,
At all times that you are a Free-mason.

"THEY THAT SEEK ME EARLY SHALL FIND ME."

BY WILLIS G. CLARK.

Come, while the blossoms of thy years are brightest,
Thou youthful wanderer in a flowery maze---
Come, while the restless heart is bounding lightest,
And Joy's pure sunbeam trembles in thy ways ;
Come, while sweet thoughts like summer buds unfolding,

Waken rich feelings in the careless breast---
While yet thy hand the ephemeral wreath is holding,
Come---and secure interminable rest !

Soon will the freshness of thy days be over,
And thy free buoyancy of soul be flown---
Pleasure will fold her wing, and friend and lover
Will to the embraces of the worm have gone.
Those who now love thee, will have passed forever,
Their looks of kindness will be lost to thee---
Thou wilt need balm to heal thy Spirit's fever,
As thy sick heart broods over years to be !

Come, while the morning of thy life is glowing
Ere the dim phantoms thou art chasing die---
Ere the gay spell which Earth is round thee throwing
Fade like the crimson from a sunset sky !
Life hath but shadows, save a promise given
Which lights up Sorrow with a fadeless ray---
Come---touch the sceptre---win a hope in Heaven---
Come---turn thy spirit from the world away.

Then will the shadows of this brief existence
Seem airy nothings to thine ardent soul,
And shining brightly in the forward distance,

Will, of thy patient race, appear the goal !
Home of the weary ! where, in peace reposing,
The spirit lingers in unclouded bliss---
While o'er their dust the curtained grave is closing,
Who would not---early---choose a lot like this !

RICHES, PLEASURE AND GLORY.

O haste not to the gilded shrine,
Where Fortune throws her favors round !
Let nobler views thy soul incline
To turn where higher honors shine,
And truer wealth is found.

O seek not for the rosy bower,
Where Pleasure fills the sparkling bowl !
O yield not to her witching power---
For when she gives her richest dower,
She chains the captive soul.

And think not yonder brilliant scene,
Illumed by Hope, all meant for thee,
The darkest clouds will intervene,
And grief appear where joy has been,
And frowning Misery.

Tempt not the wild and steep ascent,
Where proud Ambition waves her plume,
There Guilt may scowl or Care torment,
Repentance raise the vain lament,
And Malice seal thy doom.

O do not think that Glory's crest,
Though bright it shines, brings nought of care !
Bliss never builds its halcyon nest
On wild ambition's stormy breast,
Nor sheds its radiance there.

Then what is all that mortals deem Enchanting, lovely, bright, or dear ?
Life's gayest space is Fancy's dream---
Its brightest glance a fading beam,
Dissolving in a tear.

All things on earth must change or die :
That beautiful but drooping flower ;
In beauty's fairest, freshest dye,
When morning opened met the eye,
But faded in an hour.

Still cruel Disappointment tries
To stab young hope when up she springs ;
Or if, indeed, too high she flies,
She bids her blackest clouds arise,
And round her tempest flings.

O Life is but a winter scene !---
A thorny, wild, and toilsome way.
With some sweet spots of cheering green,
Or sunny hours that intervene,
To break the clouds away.

But never were the trifles here
Designed to satisfy the mind.
The spirit, in its high career,
Is fashioned for a nobler sphere,
And will not be confined.

THE IMPRISONED.

He started from his sleep. The chain
Clanked on his stir-ling limb,
The fatal truth came back again,
Like an ectoed curse to him.
Chained and alone---his proud heart rose,
Like a tided river then :
And his curse went forth as the Samiel goes,
To the doomed abodes of men.

Ye've bound your gyves upon the hand,
And fettered down the form,
And trampled on the free-man's land,
With his father's blood yet warm.
Ye've bound me where the sun is not,
Where the star-light never falls,
But ye humble not the kingly thought
That mocks your guarded walls,

The soul, the godlike soul is free,
Its glory is not dim,
It gathers sterner energy
From every tortured limb.

Dream ye that feelings nursed as mine
Are touched by human ill ?
The form beneath its chains may pine,
The soul is mighty still.

And heavier ye may bind the chain---
My spirit shall not quail ;
Though madness revel on my brain
The heart shall never fail.
Ye cannot crush---for it the deep,
And burning sense of wrong,
Through every weary hour, shall keep
Its thirst of vengeance strong.

That sleepless vengeance ! it will come---
A whirlwind upon earth.
The dungeon stone---the very tomb
Shall send its summons forth.
The injured spirit sleepeth not,---
It may not be confined---
The tyrant's hand hath never wrought
A fetter for the mind !

MIND.

BY WM. LEGGETT.

Let others praise the hue
That mantles on thy face,
Thine eyes of heavenly blue,
And mein of fruitless grace ;
These charms I freely own,
But still a higher find ;
'Twill last when beauty's flown---
Thy matchless charm of mind.

The damp of years may quench
The brightness of thine eye ;
Time's icy hand may blanch
Thy cheek's vermillion dye ;
Thy form may lose its grace ;
Thy voice its sweet control ;
But naught can e'er efface
The beauties of thy soul.

What's beauty but a flower
That blooms in summer's ray ;
When pours the wintry shower,
Its charms will fade away :
The mind's a rich perfume
That winter can not chill ;
The flower may lose its bloom,
But fragrance lingers still.

Stars gem the vault of heaven
When day's last hues decline ;
As darker grows the even,
With brighter ray they shine :
Thus, in the night of years ;
When youth's gay light is o'er,
More bright the soul appears,
Than ere it shone before.

The leaves when autumn blusters,
Forsake the tree and die,
But failing, show rich clusters
Of fruitage to the eye :
Thus time, in flying, snatches
Thy beauty, but displays
One charm that all o'ermatches---
A soul that ne'er decays.

MASONIC CELEBRATION.

The anniversary of St. John, falling on Sabbath the Liberty Masonic Lodge, held the usual celebration on Monday the 28th. A number of affiliated members were in attendance from the adjoining counties, swelling the procession to about eighty persons. The day being fine, a large concourse of citizens from the country witnessed the pageant. The spectacle was new to many—being the first of the kind on so large a scale in upper Missouri.

Of the services at the church we are unable to speak not having been able to force an entrance beyond the door. With our characteristic modesty we held back till the house was crowded to overflowing, and then had to turn away disappointed. From a passing glance obtained through a window the display of beauty and fashion must have been highly imposing, and our eyes did sparkle to obtain a nearer view. Our readers will therefore suppose what they please of gay dresses, and dimpled cheeks, and lustrous eyes, and coral lips wreathed in smiles,—we cannot help them.

The addresses by the Rev. Messrs. Rennick and Hogan are spoken of in the highest terms, being eminently appropriate, and producing a feeling of deep solemnity throughout the assembly.

The dinner prepared by Mr. Huggins was superb. The table fairly groaned with eatables. We are sure at the time we did not think we operated on the viands and delicacies, more than was fairly our duty, and would be complimentary to our host, but an intolerable headache for the last three days, tells a different tale.

The sociability and genuine good feeling evinced, spoke volumes in favor of the Institution, and has left an impression upon our memory never to be erased. The proceedings throughout were conducted, with great order and decorum, and went off with an eclat, highly flattering to all concerned. In a word we anticipate the happiest results from the celebration, softening down asperities, and promoting the kindly and better feelings of our nature—while our hopes are accelerated that ere long the great principles of peace, charity and good-will, shall obtain an abiding place in every heart, binding the family of man in one vast brotherhood.

ADDRESS

Delivered before Aurora Lodge, No. 48, at Portsmouth, Ohio, December 27, A. L. 5839.

BY G. S. E. HEMPSTEAD.

WARDENS AND BRETHREN.

While I, with gratitude and pleasure, acknowledge the numerous instances of your friendship and confidence: permit me again to claim your indulgence, while I direct your attention to a few of those important duties which as members of the craft are enjoined upon you.

As pilgrims from the East you are assembled, as brothers and companions in fellowship and Brotherly Love, you are convened to commemorate the social relations which bind you together as Masons.

Time will not permit us to go into an extensive exposition of the history of our order. It is sufficient for the present to know that its origin is so remote, that there is no clue by which we can fix the period when it did not exist. It has survived the reign of barbarism, the rude shocks of Gothic violence, the convulsion of exterminating war, and the savage fury of bigotry and persecution. It has withstood the thunders of the Vatican, the proscriptions of imperial despotism, the terrors of the Auto da Fe, and the tortures of the Inquisition. Our society has seen the North pour forth its Barbarian swarms, she has seen myriads from the Baltic, like the overflowing of the mighty deep, quaff the delicious products of Italy. She has beheld the destruction of the arts, and the expiring throes of the gods of Liberty. She has seen consuls and Patricians drag the chains of Gothic bondage, whose triumphant banner waved over the prostrate eagle. She has seen Mahomet arrayed in blood, riding in triumph. She has seen the cities which he set in flames, the countries which he ravaged and destroyed, and the miserable distress of all the inhabitants of the earth, and yet, my friends, she survives. The angel of desolation has not yet flapped his wings over her, her port or incense still exhales its odors, the cherubim still protect with their wings the altar and the ark, and Aaron's rod still buds and blossoms. Why, it may be asked, has she not shared the fate of societies, systems, cities, nations and empires? I answer, because her vestments are unspotted, her precepts pure, and her pretensions humble. Although her principles are based on the immutable laws of truth, and justice, although she justly claims such high antiquity, and has survived the persecutions of barbarism, the anathemas of the church the denunciations of Popes, the edicts of emperors and kings, and the infuriated malice of political jealousy and intolerance; How is it that any are found so steeled against truth and justice as to entertain prejudices against our order? Why is it that an institution, so humane in its design, so mild and peaceful in its movements, should excite the suspicions, the envy and the censure of mankind? As we are just beginning to emerge from the torpor of that deadly simon of fanaticism, bigotry and political intolerance which has but lately passed over us; it may not be unprofitable to inquire to what these withering attacks upon the craft are to be attributed and what are their effects?—The perpetuity of our institutions; and the history of her persecution is conclusive evidence that her precepts and principles have never raised up a single enemy against her; but the imprudence, inconsistency or negligence of her professed friends and followers have been the cause of all her troubles. Those who have been placed as guards, have been unfaithful, and by falling asleep upon their posts, have permitted unprincipled and base intruders to enter the temple and mar its beauty. To the numerous, incautious and unworthy admissions of our brethren of a sister State, may be traced the troubles and persecutions; which for the last twelve years have vexed the brotherhood; but, fortunately for the craft and the world, these evils work their own cures, and during the persecutions which invariably follow indiscriminate admissions, the craft is purged of its dross, the chaff is sifted from the wheat, and the lodge comes forth like gold seven times tried in the fire to convince the world that although she has enemies even among her own household, yet her precepts and her principles will sustain her as long as time shall last. Masons have frequently failed, and come far short of their duty; and while humanity remains in its present fallible state, perfection is not to be expected. No, my friends, when the millennial trumpet shall sound, then may societies be formed, whose members will be free from reproach; until then, let us labor and strive to bring ourselves and all with whom we are associated as near to perfection as possible. To do this, we must require a strict compliance with the precepts of the order, from all who are within its walls, and permit none to pass the threshold without the strictest scrutiny. Permit no candidate to alarm this lodge until discretion, candor, and independence shall have passed upon his merits. The mere fact that you know nothing against an individual is not sufficient evidence to justify you in admitting him to the privileges of the order. You should require some positive evidence in his favor before you extend to him the right hand of fellowship. The duties which as Masons we are bound to perform are numerous and important, easy to understand and not difficult to discharge. They are comprised under three heads: those which we owe to our God, those which we owe to our neighbors, and those which we owe to ourselves. To elucidate them all or even to name them is not our present attention. We will call your attention to a few of them, and leave the rest to be explained and enforced by our lectures and charges.—Every Mason, my brethren, who uses the name of God, in any other manner than with that reverential awe which is due from a creature to his creator; is not only guilty of highly unmasonic conduct, and places himself upon a level with the lowest dregs of humanity; laws which as a mason he is most solemnly bound to obey and support; we should either expunge from our lectures and charges this prohibition to use the name of Deity irreverently; or evince by our conduct that we do not regard it with indifference and contempt. We must remember that eye which ornaments the insignia of our order is intended, to impress upon our minds the omniscience of the Almighty; that he is omnipresent, that he will scrutinize our acts and apply with exactness the square to determine with certainty whether the sword of justice shall save or destroy.

Charity is one of the leading virtues and prominent duties of masonry. That charity which pours the oil of joy into the wounds of the faithful, heals the broken hearted, comforts the distressed, supplies the wants of the needy, and receives with open arms the widow and the orphan, those who have lost comfort, their only stay and support. It is the duty of charity to wipe the tear from sorrow's weeping eye, to restore the faded blush of health to the woeful cheek, and give the welcome hand of friendship to the wandering child of poverty and distress.

Do you hear the faint whisper of complaint, the distant wailings of misery and woe, fly with winged speed as the messengers of consolation and relief; let the widowed mourners and fatherless victims of wretchedness and want bless the hour which bestowed on them the franchise of the lodge.

Are there any who have lost their companions, their protectors? Let every brother, who wears the badge of innocence and purity, the mantle of zeal and fidelity, be a solace in the hour of affliction, a companion in adversity, a participator in the cares and perplexities of this nether world. Are there any who need the hand of a kind, indulgent and affectionate father: who are compelled to buffet the rude billows of the world, and contend with the angry and conflicting passions of a careless, unfeeling community: in every one let them find a father and a protector, let not one arm be unstretched that can guard them against the rude and callous blasts of a selfish world. Are there none, my brethren, who need those acts of charity and benevolence? If there are none now, there may be before tomorrow's sun sinks in the west and with his dying beams gilds the horizon, yes, ere aurora ushers in another day, the veil of oblivion may drop from its suspension and shroud beneath her sable mantle the heart of many generous, many a faithful, many a feeling brother. And is it not presumable, among the number who may thus early become tenants of the tomb, there may be some who will be compelled to leave behind the companions of their bosoms, the partners of their cares, the participations of their joys, and the pledges of their love? Many of you can realize what such a separation as this would be, and it is to you I address myself. Placed in this disagreeable situation, then, and then only would those who survive experience the benefits, which flow, pure as the waters of the crystal fountain, from the ordinary and salutary provisions of our order.

Brethren think on these things; let the charitable hand of masonry be extended to cheer the drooping spirit of the disconsolate and the afflicted, for remember, with what judgement ye judge, ye shall be judged, and with what measure ye meet, it shall be measured to you again.

Before we leave this subject permit me to mention

[The editor of this paper is not a Mason.]

one species of charity which is attended with many social benefits, and without a good degree of which harmony cannot be long preserved in any lodge. I mean that charity which restrains us from thinking and speaking too unfavorably of each other. Mankind are too prone to indulge in this species of uncharitableness; to ascribe the worst of views and motives to those who differ from them in the common occurrences of life. The organization of the mind and the structure of society will create a variety of opinions, and if these do not disturb public order or endanger public welfare, ought we not to give credit to others for the same purity of views which we are conscious of possessing ourselves. That it is, the tree is known by its fruit: but, brethren, if you be under the influence of personal feeling or are governed by impulse, let me caution you, to judge not lest ye be judged.

He who connects himself with all mankind: I mean when he embraces and practices the golden precepts of the order, he is recognized and known as such, at the Eastern, the Western, the Northern and Southern boundaries of the world. And when thus connected, and that too by the strongest ties which can possibly bind man to man, he ought to imbibe and practice such principles and governing rules as will promote his own interest and at the same time advance the good of the whole. In our ordinary transactions we should ever walk on the level and act on the square. Moral rectitude, correct deportment, a strict adherence to truth, and a proper regard for every thing calculated to advance the interest of mankind; in conjunction with a decent respect for the religious opinions of all will ever have the effect to promote the prospects and welfare of every mason. And, brethren, while discharging the duties which we owe to others, let us not be unmindful of those which we owe to ourselves; ever remembering that in proportion as we respect ourselves and our own rights, in the same proportion shall we have the respect and protection of others.

I have before remarked that by the careless and unguarded introduction of strangers among the workmen, our ancient and honorable institution has been brought into disrepute among the pious and candid. This is a matter in which we are all interested and one which requires our utmost diligence and attention. To obviate the difficulties which must ever result from this source, we have only one rule, which is to mark well the entering in of the house with every going forth of the sanctuary. At the building of King Solomon's temple there were guards placed at the East, South and West entrances, to see that none passed or re-passed except those who were duly qualified. In like manner the officers of this lodge are placed as guards in the moral and Masonic temple to scrutinize carefully the general character of those who present themselves as candidates for the mysteries of our order.

Does any one offer himself who is possessed of a covetous disposition, is he desirous of monopolizing all to himself? mark well the entering in of the house, admit him not, he will have no affection for the general good. Is he often in difficulty with his neighbors, dictatorial and arbitrary in his opinions: always first in his own cause and right in his own eyes; mark well, if he be admitted he will have no respect for the opinions of others and no regard for good order and subordination. Does he spend his time idly, is he intemperate in his habits, neglectful of his family; mark well the entering in of the house—he is not a good husband and he can never be made a good Mason. Is he addicted to lewd company or does he advocate their principles; mark well the entering in of the house: for of such an one, says our first most excellent grand master, "He goeth straightway, as an ox goeth to the slaughter: as a foal to the correction of the stocks, till a dart strikes through his liver, as a bird hasteth to the snare, and knoweth not that it is for his life." Is he cruel, oppressive, overreaching his neighbor; mark well the entering of the house—if he be admitted he will have no attachment for the object; heaven born charity is a stranger to his bosom: the poor and destitute will never find a home under such a roof. Does he often speak reproachfully of his neighbor, trumpeting abroad the faults of others; mark well, a brother's character is not safe on his tongue.

Does he speak lightly of religion and deny the inspiration of the Scriptures? Mark well, the entering of the house, let every gate be duly guarded; for if you take from our order the authenticity of the Holy Bible; that greater light in Masonry, total darkness must ensue. If the unhallowed foot of the Atheist presumes to step upon our pavement, spurn him from hence, for he can never frame to pronounce the Shibboleth of masonry; and if by his duplicity he should gain admission and should dare to approach the veil of the sacred tabernacle where incense burns to the Lord day and night—let the guards be assembled, drive him from thence, for he is not a true descendant of any of the twelve tribes of the children of Israel. The introduction of such characters is calculated to produce confusion among the workmen; they are not fit materials for the masonic edifice; they are neither oblong or square, there is no part of the building to which they can be applied; neither can any of the working tools of the craft be adjusted upon them. If you use the twenty-four inch gauge, there is no division to be found, no part for God, no part for charity; bring the plumb line to them, they neither stand upright before God or man; lay upon them the square of virtue, put the mallet and engraver's chisel into the hands of the most skilful workman and no appearance of friendship, morality, or brotherly love can be found; lay upon them the level and who would be willing to be placed upon a level with them; lead them to the circle of benevolence, present them with the precious jewels, they have no eyes to see them, they will cautiously avoid them; point them to the rounds of Jacob's ladder, they cannot climb, for heaven born charity has no habitation within their bosoms; use the trowel, there is no cement of brotherly love and affection, for they always daub with untempered mortar; such materials have not the mark of the craft upon them, they are unfit for the masonic edifice, and ought to be thrown over among the rubbish.

Let us, Brethren and Companions, this day, while we encircle the altar of virtue, pass an irrevocable decree of exclusion against every vice and impropriety, which has ever intruded itself within the walls of any lodge; let us raise the cautious hand of repulsion against the approach of profligate infidelity, and with salutary discipline terminate the evil use of untempered mortar.

Then, my brethren, and only then may those who occupy the porch of the temple realize the many valuable and important principles of divine truth, which are there inculcated. Impressing these well upon their minds they may advance to the inner chamber, there to obtain rules by which to reduce them to practice; then shall the folding doors of the sanctum sanctorum be opened to them, when they will be presented with a rich treasure of theoretical and practical morality, which if their hearts have kept pace with their understanding will convince them of the unlimited power of the Lion of the tribe of Judah. They may now be presented with a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth, saving him who receiveth it; and here will they be convinced that punishment, however slow, will overtake the unfaithful and the negligent; many important religious and moral obligations may be here unfolded to them, and they will, in the language of an ancient companion, be required to "lay aside all malice, and guile, and hypocrisies, and envies, and all evil speakings." If they have obtained the confidence of the craft, and are well skilled in the work, they shall be instructed in the art of governing themselves, and those over whom they may be called to preside.

Having attained this eminence, let them be carried back to the completion of the temple; when the capstone was brought forth with shoutings of grace, grace be unto it: the ark safely seated; the most excellent masters prostrate before the Eternal, praising his goodness and mercy; the fire of heaven burning not only upon the altar, but in the hearts of the faithful and true.

Finally, brethren, let them be exalted to the top of Pisgah where the glory and goodness of the most excellent high priest of our salvation, shall be laid open to their views, let their pass word be, "the Lord our righteousness and strength;" place upon their breastplate, faith, hope and charity—faith in God, hope in immortality, charity to all mankind and love to God supremely. Let them be divested of the vices and superfluities of life, and thus put on the mitre and the robe, up on every part of which is engraved in letters of gold, "HOLINESS TO THE LORD."

THE GATHERER.

FATHER SULLIVAN.

On board the steamboat to Boulogne, an Irish gentleman gave us, on honor, a specimen of a sermon which he declared he heard Father Sullivan, of Baltimore, deliver. Father S., says the narrator, was a worthy stout man, with a red face, who found his parishioners rather slack in paying their Easter dues, and he took the following simple means to quicken their apprehension. Preaching to them about the gathering-time he said,—“My christian hearers and worthy parishioners, we must all die. You must die Tim Hearty, though fat and big you are; and you must die Mistress Hennessy, though you are a likely and decent woman. You must die, Ned Casey, though you have slated your new house; and I must die, though I am a priest of the parish, and have the care of all your souls—the Lord between you and harm—to account for the great and last day. Eh! then, I am thinking, honest men, what account I will be able to give to God Almighty of ye all, from the top to the bottom of the parish. I will have to walk at your head on the day of judgment, carrying all your sins on my back, and standing before Goodness to excuse you from the devil and his angels, who will be roaring and stirring the fire to roast ye—the Lord spare ye from his hands. Eh! then, when I'm at your head, Goodness will ax me, 'What kind of a congregation have ye here, Father S——?' and I will say, 'Pretty like other congregations, my Lord.' Goodness will then ax me, 'How are they off for drunkenness, Father S——?' and I will answer, 'Mighty decent please the Lord.' And so Goodness will go through the ten commandments, and the precepts of the church, and the cardinal virtues, and the seven deadly sins, and may be it is a good character I will be able to give ye, my Christian hearers. But when Goodness axes, 'How were they off, Father Sullivan, for paying their Easter dues?' what answer shall I give to that, ye blackguards? Now mind me, honest men, next Sunday, will be Easter-day, and let me see what an answer I'm to give the Lord.—London paper.

"SHE HAS LEFT ME."

There is something inexpressibly touching in an anecdote related in a London paper, of an artist. He was an American, and had come hither, (he and his young wife) to paint for fame—and a subsistence.—They were strangers in England; they had to fight against prejudice and poverty—but their affection for each other solaced them under every privation every frown of fortune. They could think, at least, "all the way over," the great Atlantic: and their fancy (little cherished here) had leisure to be busy among the friends and scenes they had left behind. A gentleman who had not seen them for some length of time, went one day to the artist's painting room, and observing him pale and wan, inquired about his health, and afterwards regarding his wife. He answered only, "She has left me," and proceeded in a hurried way with his work. She was dead!—and he was left alone to toil, and get money, and mourn. The heart in which he had hoarded all his secrets, and all his hopes, was cold: and fame itself was but a shadow! And so it is that all we love must wither and die away! 'Tis a true saying, yet a wholesome moral belongs to it. The thread of life is spun; it is twisted finely, and looks as if it would last forever. All colors are there—the gaudy yellow and the sanguine black—dark as death; yet it is cut in twain by the shears of fate, almost before we discern the peril.

BUNYAN AND THE QUAKER.

Bunyan had a native turn for wit and repartee which appears in the following story. Towards the close of his imprisonment, a Quaker called on him, probably hoping to make a convert of the author of the Pilgrim. He thus addressed him, "Friend John I am come to thee with a message from the Lord, and after having searched for thee in all the prisons in England, I am glad that I have found thee at last."—"If the Lord hath sent thee," returned Bunyan sarcastically, "you need not have taken so much pains to find me out, for the Lord knows I have been a prisoner in Bedford jail these twelve years past."

MONASTIC EDUCATION.

In an age like the present, when the civilized world, upon one side of the Atlantic, is distinguished for its profound researches, into all the departments of science and letters, and upon the other, for its rapid marches in invention and improvement of almost every description connected with practical life, it becomes a question of moment whether the seclusion from society, suffered by the students of the one, be as beneficial in its general effects upon the world, as the domestic and more natural life enjoyed by the other.—Upon no one point has there hitherto been an opinion so unanimous among the learned of the professions.—All have united to a member, in maintaining that the cells of the cloister, the secluded rooms of a college, and the attic of a distant retreat, were essential to the thorough mental discipline, upon which eminence in subsequent life, so directly depends. Aside from the world, and its cares and vexations, has been supposed to be the only condition, which could gain to the student distinction in any profession. Upon this opinion, all the institutions of learning have been established and conducted. The society of those alone occupied with similar subjects of investigation has been permitted, and that only for purposes of intellectual culture. Such are the schools of Germany and France. In our own country, while relics of the forms of the eastern world are still entailed upon us, there is far less even in our most strictly conducted halls of science, of exclusion from society, than is felt by the German students. The consequences of the different modes of training, as well as educating, are among the records of history. In the land which has given being to a mental philosophy, that excites the admiration, and at the same time the pity of the world, men are found capable of sustaining an amount of intellectual labor almost incredible. Men are there met with, whose researches are only limited by the volumes of their immense libraries; whose aliment is knowledge, and whose lives are an almost ceaseless feast; who can name to you the myriads of beings that crowd around us upon every side, and who can tell of their distinctive habits and peculiarities, with whom the mysteries of science are familiar;—but with all this, men who with scarcely an exception, have so etherialized all the doctrines of common sense and of the scriptures, as to become the fountain of absurdities in the affairs of every day life, and a nation of infidels. Wives are degraded from the rank of companionship with their husbands to the station of servants, and men are alone the representatives of the race. Who ever heard of a Somerville, or a Hemans among the ladies of Germany? Turn to our own country. Three or four years at the farthest is the whole period of life at college, and large proportions of this time are spent at home. Young men become sufficiently acquainted with the great principles of science, during their course at our institutions, to make in after life such men as Washington, Franklin, Fulton, Rittenhouse, Whitney, Rumford, and Bowditch;—men who have contributed more to ameliorate and bless the condition of mankind, than all the students Germany ever knew. They have been permitted to live enough among men, to know that there is a world around us, which can be made productive of happiness, if it is known, and which if not known, may keep us in constant pain. Among us, women are educated and made fit companions for men. The social affections are cultivated, the intellect is made the instrument of man's nobler nature,—his feelings; the fireside is a scene of joy, smiles gladden the countenances of youth, and the bible is revered. Honors are open to men of industry and genius, and arts are promoted. Invention is encouraged, and every discovery converted upon its announcement to the world, into an engine of good to the community, and to the nation. The reverse of this is in a great measure true of the country which proudly and justly claims to be the sun of literature and science to the world; and if these are among the consequences of the different systems of training, the superiority of our own, becomes sufficiently apparent.

GALLANTRY OF A BLIND MAN.—Bowen, who had the misfortune to lose his sight at an early period of life, in a public lecture which he recently delivered in this city, told to a delighted auditory numerous lively and instructive anecdotes, in which he himself had been the principal actor. From among the number, we have taken the liberty to select the following. He was a guest at an evening party. A Lady present, who from Mr. B's wearing spectacles, was not conscious of his misfortune, took occasion to express her aversion for the blind—they were so helpless! Feeling the remark rather keenly, he determined upon taking a little revenge upon her ladyship. Accordingly he slipped out of the room, and by the aid of a friend, succeeded so well in disguising himself, that on his return he was not recognised. He was now introduced to the company as Mr. W——, a student on a respite from Cambridge, well known to be the son of one of the wealthiest and most aristocratic persons in that section of the country. We suppose "money" in this case proved to have "a power and a dominion." To leave the impression that he was able to see, he seized a book, which as good fortune would have it, turned out to be a Mathematical Treatise by Newton; and he soon appeared so intently absorbed in its contents as to have altogether forgotten the presence of company. The lady was not long in manifesting an interest in the young student, by sundry inquiries about his prospects, etc., and fell in raptures about the profound love which he discovered for books. It had grown somewhat late; and she was preparing to return home, he volunteered to act as her escort. From her ready acceptance of his proposal, it seemed exactly to accord with the lady's desires. Their way was through a pleasant rural region. The stars and the scenery around them, were naturally topics of discussion; in all of which Mr. B. appeared to take so amiable an interest, that his companion felt not only assured of his capacity to see, but also to feel. Of course, the journey was short. The beauty of it was that she did not learn until several weeks after, by whom she had been gallanted; when she did, she was constrained to declare that blind persons were not quite so helpless as she supposed. To crown the whole, in a fit of determination to be revenged on herself, she accepted the first proposal of marriage that was made to her, which was by a blind man. Mr. B. in his exceedingly pleasant manner, said he did not know whether he ought to congratulate himself upon not being the happy individual.

POLITICAL PROGRESS.

"Thus we find in the progress of the human race, that the simple authority of the family chief passes through a species of oligarchy into a practical democracy; and ends at no very distant period in the nomination of an hereditary sovereign."

There are many reasons why the doctrine of "the progress of the human race should be always a popular one, and more why it should be so at the present time. Aside from our vanity, we can now have no idea of living without "going ahead." It matters not that we are dwarfs in body and cowards in soul, that our models are all of antiquity, that we have no poet like Homer, no philosopher like Plato, nor christian like Paul; we must still admit the "progress"—it is treason to doubt it. We must advance if our neighbors have to recede to make it apparent. We must advance, if, as a good old deacon would have it, we "advance backward."

It is convenient under these circumstances that we are not confined to any definite standard. As in the vast space that surrounds our globe, there is strictly no such thing as up or down, and each individual is at liberty to point upwards in this direction or that according to his longitude; so in morals and politics all are right in insisting upon the "progress of the human race," according to their own ideas of progress, and it must be conceded to each one who claims it, that "he is the man" and that wisdom would die with him were he not kind enough to give it to the world in a book.

Thus Mr. Russell has found that the "progress of the human race" is through a democracy, and to be perfected in that political system when the Executive, being hereditary if not despotic, may be a woman or a babe, and commonly is an idiot. It may seem strange to some, in the light of Mr. Russell's theory, that almost all of the barbarous nations of the world are monarchies; but it should be remembered that they have existed long enough to arrive at perfection, while we are an infant people, and might doubtless take profitable political lessons from the inhabitants of Congo and Hindostan.

At all events the opinion of one so eminent in the eyes of Colleges and Reviews, and whose histories are our School Books, should be approached with reverence, and if apparently absurd we should attribute it to our ignorance and his unfathomable profundity.

A HINT TO GIRLS.—We have always considered it an unerring sign of innate vulgarity, when we hear ladies take particular pains to impress us with an idea of their ignorance of all domestic matters, save sewing lace or weaving a net to encase their delicate hands. Ladies by some curious kind of hocus pocus, have got it into their heads that the best way to catch a husband is to show how profoundly capable they are of doing nothing for his comfort. Frightening a piano into fits or murdering the king's French may be a good bait for certain kinds of fish, but they must be of that kind usually found in very shallow waters. The surest way to secure a good husband is to cultivate those accomplishments which make a good wife.

PHILLIPINAS.—We object to this one sided game—this finding a double almond, sharing it with a lady, and then having to pay a forfeit when next she encounters you. It's worse than robbery—no foot pad ever cried "stand and deliver" with so much nonchalance, as do the girls shout "Phillipina?" If you say it first, the little devils have such funny ways to get rid of prying; sometimes they will give you a kiss—that's something—sometimes they will let you beat them to a ball, or concert, and sometimes they pay up like men—very unwillingly. But the most audacious piece of swindling we ever knew, heard of or conceived of, was perpetrated on us. We phillipinaed a girl, just as slick as a whistle; and she acknowledged caught, and promised us an Annual. The next day she sent us an almanac for 1841!

POPULAR TALES.

From the London Metropolitan.

THE NUPTIALS OF COUNT RIZZARI.

At La Bruca, a romantic village situated between the cities of Syracuse and Catania, stands the baronial residence of the Dukes of La Bruca, a magnificent old edifice, which about fifty years since was the scene of the tragic event I am about to relate. The duke, its proprietor at the time, had an only daughter, of about eighteen years of age, possessed of unusual beauty and accomplishments; these, and the large property to which she was heiress, made her hand eagerly sought after by almost all the young men of family whose birth and fortune could entitle them to the honour of so high an alliance. From amongst these her father would gladly have permitted her to select a suitable companion. But her affections were inalienably engaged by the second son of Count Rizzari, of Catania, an intimate friend of the duke. The favorite lover was about the same age as the young lady, and had, ever since her recollection, been the companion of her childhood. A cadet with little or no fortune, was a match to which, if there had been no other obstacle, the pride of the duke would never have consented; there was, moreover, the further impediment, that the young man was intended for the church, and consequently destined to celibacy. The cause of the lady's aversion to her other suitors was soon evident to both families, who were equally anxious to put a period to inclinations likely, if unchecked, to terminate in the misery of both parties. The count resolved to remove his son from the spot where, enchained by early associations and excited by the continual presence of the beloved object, there seemed but little probability of his overcoming his misplaced passion.

Young Rizzari was accordingly sent to Rome, in order at once to finish his studies, and obtain the advantage of an introduction to individuals of rank and influence in the church. An ecclesiastical life was not Rizzari's natural vocation, and he resolved internally not to embrace it, trusting to chance and time for the birth of some event favorable to his hopes and passion. Indeed, it soon proved so, beyond what his most sanguine expectations had led him to anticipate. His elder brother, who had married subsequently to his departure, died, unexpectedly, without issue, a few months afterwards. Though really attached to his brother, the vast change in his circumstances and prospects prevented his feeling the loss so acutely as would otherwise have been natural. On receiving a summons to attend his afflicted parents, he lost not a moment, as may be imagined, in returning to Sicily. The heirs of families of distinction are never permitted to enter either the military or ecclesiastical professions, and in event of the younger brother's succeeding to the prospect of the paternal inheritance, the vows, if taken, are usually dispensed with by the court of Rome. The young count thus saw in an instant both impediments to his marriage unexpectedly removed. His father, at his solicitation, soon proposed to his friend the duke, the union of the two families in the persons of those respective heirs; an offer which was accepted with pleasure by the duke, and with delight by his daughter.

An early day was appointed for the nuptial ceremony, which the Duke determined should be celebrated at his feudal residence at La Bruca. Invitations were issued to all the nobility of the neighborhood for many miles round. Of such extent were the preparations, that a fête so magnificent as that intended had not been heard of for many years. The whole country was in motion. Congratulations poured in from every quarter, and all seemed interested in the happiness of the young couple. But there was one person, the Cavalier—, [at the request of the friend who favored me with the anecdote, I suppressed his name, that of a noble family at present existing in splendor in Catania,] who did not participate in the joy and satisfaction manifested by others. This individual, who was remarkable for his wealth, his accomplishments, and his handsome person, though still in the flower of life, was of an age which doubled that of the intended bride of the young count. One of her most impassioned admirers, he had during the residence of Rizzari at Rome, made proposals to her father. His family and wealth sufficiently recommended him to the duke, but having prevented his daughter from choosing the objects of her affections, he resolved at least not to force on her a match disagreeable to herself; and, therefore, whilst he testified his own readiness to accept the offer, referred the cavalieri to his daughter for a final answer. She at once gave him a negative so decided, as to have extinguished hope in any bosom smitten by a passion less consuming and uncontrollable than that of the cavalieri. Undeterred by refusal he continued to press his suit with an importunity, and even violence, which instead of removing difficulties, soon heightened indifference into aversion; yet, calculating on the apparent impossibility of her being united to the object of her early flame, he relied on time and absence for obliterating from her heart the impression made on it by young Rizzari, and assiduously persevered in his unwelcome attentions. Great then was his rage and disappointment at the death of the elder Rizzari; and the arrival, proposal, and acceptance of the younger as a husband of the lady, whom self-love had persuaded him was sooner or later destined to be his own. Tortured at once by all the pangs of an unrequited passion, and by a devouring jealousy, proud and vindictive by nature, even beyond the wont of Sicilians of rank, the favored lover became the object of a hatred too deadly to be depicted by language, and the cavalieri was heard to threaten a vengeance as terrible as were the bad passions which raged with such irresistible sway in his own guilty breast.

Soon after the acceptance of Rizzari, the cavalieri disappeared from Catania; some said he had retired to one of villas in the neighborhood, others that he had gone abroad; in fact no one knew whither he had betaken himself. The happiness of the lovers left them little time to think of the cavalieri and their fancied security did not permit them, for a moment, to fear, or even dream of, the effects of his disappointment or resentment.

The happy day at length came; the marriage was celebrated in the village chapel, which was thronged to excess by rich and poor, noble and peasant. At the very moment when the enraptured bridegroom placed the emblematic circle on the slender finger of his lovely bride, a contemptuous and discordant laugh, so loud, so long, and so strange in its expression, that it resembled rather that of a fiend than that of a human being, was heard far above the hum and murmur of the assemblage in the chapel. Such extraordinary rudeness instantly drew the attention of all present; but to their astonishment, although the ominous peal still continued, it was impossible to ascertain the individual from whom it proceeded. When it at length ceased, the ceremony continued, and the affront, if it was meant for one, was soon forgotten in succession of circumstances of a more agreeable nature.

Every room in the superb old mansion, the bridal chamber excepted was thrown open to the assembled hundreds: neither expense nor labor had been spared, that could in any way add to the luxury and magnificence of the occasion.
